INTRODUCTION.

IN the wide range of modern inquiry, there is no study meriting a higher place than that of History. Hence it is that it forms such an important feature in educational literature, and that so many works of this description are being constantly placed before the eye of the public. Every one of these may, at least, be supposed to possess some claim to popularity; but that which is the most comprehensive in its treatment, and which brings its information down to the veritable passing year, must be acknowledged to have no mean title to take a foremost place in public estimation. Such a History is the following. Its pages, however, must not be considered as a mere record of past events, partaking of little more than the naked forms of registers and chronicles; but as a faithful and full narration of national occurrences, with their causes and effects, placed before the reader in the order in which they happened. This is what History should be; and this is what the following one is. A résumé of the scheme of that of England may here briefly be considered.

Beginning about the eleventh century before the Christian era, we find that Britain was known to the Phœnicians and other commercial nations, whose localities were on the shores of the Mediterranean Sea, and who traded to it for tin, lead, and other productions. At the earliest period of which there is any record, it was inhabited by a race whose language was nearly the same as that spoken by the various tribes of people settled in most of the countries of Western Europe. These called themselves Celtiaid—a native word, signifying inhabitants of the woods, and from which was derived Celtæ and Celtic, the Latin and English terms for these races, who seem to have held a speech in common. Like the savages of New Zealand at the present day, they tattooed and stained their bodies with a blue colour, to make themselves still more hideous and frightful than nature had made them in the eyes of their enemies. This practice, even after it had been discontinued by the more civilised continental tribes, prevailed in Britain, and led these to designate the inhabitants of this island their brethern Brithon. This expression, signifying the painted people, was adopted by the earliest Greek writers as the real designation of the people; and subsequently came to be varied into Britannia, Britain, Britons, &c. The island itself, however, was called by the natives Alwion, which means the country of Gwion, the deity who took the highest place in their estimation, and whose name was afterwards Grecianised into Alouion, and Latinised into Albion. From this, it may be observed, that the common derivation given of Albion, from albus (white), is erroneous. Julius Cæsar was the first general who invaded this island, and Julius Agricola its final Roman conqueror. The former came fifty-five years before, and the latter seventy-eight, after Christ. He held it for seven years, and was as much distinguished for courage as for humanity.

The Roman occupation of Britain extended over a period which embraced from B.C. 55 to A.D. 420, not very far from 500 years; and as centralisation was the characteristic sign of the Roman system of administration, all the governmental departments centred in, as well as emanated from, the Emperor. Subordinate to him was the Prefect of Gaul, who included Britain within the limits of his jurisdiction. Next to him was a Vice-Prefect, who ruled over Britain, divided into five provinces, each having a President or Consul. These provinces, again, were sub-divided into cities, ninety-two of which existed in the island under the Roman domination. The officers who administered the local affairs of each city were called the Curiales—men possessed of landed property, and capable of performing all municipal duties, from those of the gatherer of taxes, to those of the chief magistrate. Further than this, here, it is unnecessary to detail.

The Roman dominion in Britain terminated in A.D. 409; after which, the Britons, having frequently had their country devastated by inroads made by the Scots and Picts, applied for help to the Saxons. These had visited them before, and now, with two leaders called Hengist and Horsa, came to their assistance. This was in A.D. 449. These Saxons, from their great physical strength, courage, and valour, were the terror of all the German nations around them. Vortigern was the British king who invited them to come to his assistance; and having landed in the most eastern point of Kent, then the Isle of Thanet, in A.D. 449, they obtained a settlement, and, according to their agreement, had an abundant supply of provisions and clothing. As there is still amongst us a lingering regard for the memory of these brave old warriors, we may for a few moments, direct attention to their original abode.

"During the second century," says Adam Scott, Esq., "the barbarous tribes that inhabited the sea-coast to the north of the Elbe formed a great confederacy, calling themselves Saxons, or short-swordsmen—a name which, afterwards, became common to the nations from the mouth of the Rhine to the extremity of Jutland. They lived by pillage and piracy, and burned the Roman fleets which were sent against them. Their audacity increased as the Roman power diminished, and they began to colonise places which they had depopulated. The principal tribes were distinguished by the titles of Jutes, Angles, and Saxons—properly so called. The Jutes dwelt in the peninsula of Jutland, and the Angles south of them, in Schleswig and Holstein, down to the town of Flensburgh. In Holstein there is still a district called Anglen, which is believed to be the real 'Old England,' the original seat of the tribe (the Angles) that gave its name to South Britain. The Saxons proper were below the Angles; probably occupying the whole breadth of the country from the shores of the Baltic to Friesland. The language and robust form of the Saxons prove them to have been of the pure Gothic or Teutonic race. All their chiefs claimed descent from Wodin, the deified ancestor of the Teutons, who flourished between 200 and 300 years after the Christian era, and whose capital (real or traditional) is still shown at Stigsund, near Stockholm, the present capital of Sweden."

When the Saxons landed in Britain they worshipped many gods and venerated images; but in A.D. 596 they adopted the Christian faith. In that year, Pope Gregory, surnamed the Great, undertook to send missionaries among them, and convert them to Christianity. Accordingly, a monk called Augustine, with forty others, entered upon the mission, and landed in the Isle of Thanet in the year 597. Ethelbert, the then reigning sovereign, received them favourably, became himself a convert, and, shortly afterwards, openly espoused the Christian religion. A church at Canterbury, which had, in the Roman times, been erected, was put into a state of repair, and ample possessions attached to it for the maintenance of its ministers. Upon the site of this church the present cathedral stands; and soon after this the rest of the kingdoms in England embraced Christianity, and almost became as deeply involved in the darkness of superstition as they had been before in the night of idolatry.

As day succeeds day, so, in the following history, reigning authorities follow each other in the proper order of their accession to the dignity of the crown. Here, therefore, we will confine ourselves to noticing some special events, with the manners of each epoch, rather than exhibiting a connected narrative of many particulars, by which the unity of history is preserved and characterised. At the very outset of this plan, however, there is an historical error, which, though only verbal, may as well be indicated, on account of the familiarity of the term, to readers of English history. It appears in what is called the Saxon Heptarchy. "As this means seven independent governments, it must be rejected, however familiar by usage, because an idea is thereby conveyed which is erroneous. At no period of our history were there ever seven kingdoms independent of each other. As the Anglo-Saxons warred with each other, sometimes one state was absorbed by another; sometimes, after an interval, it emerged again. If that term ought to be used, which expresses the complete establishment of the Anglo-Saxons, it should be Octarchy. If not, then the denomination must vary as the tide of conquest fluctuated. If the collective governments are to be denominated from the nations who peopled them, as these were three, the general term should be Triarchy: but it is obvious that Octarchy is the appellation that best suits the historical truth." Having firmly established themselves in all the most favourable districts of the island, the Saxons began to quarrel among themselves. They had no others to quarrel with, the Britons being so completely reduced to subjection. The precedent of making war upon a neighbour was given by Ethelbert, the fourth in succession from Hengist. He invaded, though unsuccessfully, Cealwin, King of Wessex, in 568; and this example was imitated by others. By this means divisions multiplied to such an extent, that in the year 700, there were no fewer than seventeen principalities—seven of them governed by Saxon princes, and ten by Celtic chiefs. No part of the country was so much divided against itself as Northumbria. Here war seems to have been the chronic condition of the land until the Northumbrian dynasty was extinguished by the Danes in 867.

A social condition such as the above description suggests, could have neither time nor security to pursue such occupations as lead to progressive improvement. "Before the Saxons arrived in Britain, there was no political power, of any wide extent, vested in any one individual, excepting during hostilities. A chieftain was then elected to head the nation; but his rule expired with the urgency that had given it birth, and all the chiefs were alike again. All the earlier chiefs claimed descent from Woden, and appear to have been the priests as well as the lawgivers and leaders of their tribes. These chiefs were called ealdormen, aldermen, or, in plain English, eldermen. When the title Cynge, or King—probably derived from the Celtic words cen or cean, head or chief—was adopted in Britain, it does not appear to have been restricted to the leaders or chiefs; as we read of five kings of Wessex being killed in one battle, who, consequently, could only have been subordinate chiefs. When the word 'king' came to denote sovereign power, then the subordinate chiefs resumed their native appellation—aldermen; which continued until the Danish conquest. This alteration of designations rendered it necessary to create another; one to distinguish King of kings, or one who was as much above the kings as each king was above his aldermen. When this dignity was conferred on Ella, the first King of Sussex, he was styled Bretwalda, emperor or monarch of all Britain. These were elected by their peers, the sovereign kings; but the succession was not continuous, there being only seventeen bretwaldas between 490 and 570, and then an interval of 157 years. They seem to have been elected to wield the united Anglo-Saxon power against a common enemy, and, also, to prevent warfare between the respective kings; in which respect they wholly failed."—Let us briefly review the progress of the Saxons in Britain.

The foundation of what is designated the Heptarchy, was laid by Hengist, who, having lost his brother Horsa in one of the many battles fought with the Britons, assumed the title of King of Kent, of which he had become the sole master. This was in A.D. 458. The success of these Saxons in Britain, induced other chiefs, of the same nation, to pursue their fortunes by making an invasion of the island. Accordingly, in 447, Ella landed with a numerous following. He defeated the Britons, and in A.D. 491, founded the kingdom of Sussex. In 495, Cerdic, another Saxon chief, landed, and in 510, had been so successful as to found the kingdom of the West Saxons. Others from the same country landed, at different times, on the east coast of Britain, and founded other kingdoms. So the progress of invasion and settlement went on till the heptarchy or seven Saxon kingdoms were formed. Each of these had its own succession of kings, the larger number being in the state of Northumberland, which had twenty-four. The smallest was in Sussex, which had five. The duration of these kingdoms was, also, unequal. The West Saxons had the longest, and the East Saxons the shortest existence. The former endured 389, and the latter 219 years. The portion of Britain occupied by them came to be called England, from the Angles, the most numerous and powerful tribe of the Saxons. This name was given to the country by Egbert, the seventeenth and last King of Wessex, or the West Saxons. He died, sole monarch of the kingdom, in A.D. 837.

The first landing of the Danes in Britain occurred in A.D. 787, just 338 years after the landing of Hengist and Horsa in the Isle of Thanet. These Northmen landed near one of the "King's towns" in Dorsetshire, murdered a mayor, slaughtered and plundered the inhabitants, returned to their ships, and, no doubt, to their country. From this time the depredators of the north were constant visitors. They were actually hostile to the English—for this name had now come into use—considering them as nothing less than apostates and recreants from the warlike virtues as well as the religion of their common ancestors. These invaders, however, were not all Danes. "Although popularly called Danes and Northmen, they were composed of the tribes, or peoples, who lived on the coasts of Norway and Sweden, of Jutland, of the island of Zealand, and those adjacent. The general aspect of the north, in the eighth and ninth centuries, was remarkable for two peculiarities especially fitted to produce a race of pirates. These were, the numerous petty chieftains or kings who ruled in its various regions, and the sea-kings who swarmed upon the ocean. In Norway these chieftains were called fylki, and ruled over a district which could furnish twelve ships, containing sixty or seventy well-armed men. The sea-kings were called Vikingir, which may have meant 'kings of the bays,' and afterwards Her-kouger, or 'kings of armies.' They, without a yard of territory or visible nation, with no wealth but their ships, no force but their crews, and no hope but from their swords, visited every district which they could reach, making it the theatre of their enterprise. It is declared to have been a law or custom of the north, that all the male children of a land-king, except the heir, should betake themselves to the sea. Hence the sea-kings were the kinsmen of the land-kings. When the royal youths were about to become sea-kings, the ships and their equipments were furnished as a patrimonial right, and, perhaps, as a political convenience. In the ninth century these were not the only sea-kings. The land-kings made piracy their summer occupation, and every man of importance, equipped ships and roamed the sea to acquire property by force. So respectable was the pursuit considered, that parents forced their children into the dangerous and malevolent occupation." Such a state of things accounts sufficiently for the daring spirit by which the foreign invasions of these fierce and hardy Northmen were characterised. It was against these sea and land-kings that Alfred, known in history as "the GREAT," signalised himself; his last brilliant achievement in the field being the defeat of the Scandinavian Hannibal, Hastings, the Dane. This took place in 897; after which the country became comparatively tranquil; Alfred employing himself in cultivating the arts of peace, and repairing the damages which his kingdom had sustained during the Danish war. He died in 901, at the age of 52. At the death of Alfred the state of Anglo-Saxon society may not inappropriately be reviewed.

"The long Saxon anarchy," observes Mr. Cockran, "had effaced Roman civilisation, and eclipsed, for awhile, the Christian worship. But this was the destined means for introducing into England a great and free people. The Romans gave the island municipal institutions, and impressed on it a sense of law: the Saxons brought with them the grand principle of civil freedom. The best tribute of the Anglo-Saxons to the civilisation and greatness of this country, was the introduction into it of a race such as theirs, which, with many shortcomings, possesses a strength, soundness, and purity, which, when fairly dealt with, could form a nation whose grandest, fullest type was realised in the great Alfred. The Saxon nobles held their lands by a free tenure; and though acknowledging a king, were not bound to render him service as their superior. Hence arose a large amount of individual freedom, which penetrated all classes, and which, by its steady and persistent character, has given to England its free institutions. The king was counselled by the Witenagemote—from witan, wise; and gemote, meeting—an assemblage of the bishops and the leading nobles and proprietors of the land, and the germ of the future British parliament. This body seems to have met three times a year, and they had the power of declaring war, imposing taxes, and enacting laws. In the hundred-motes and shire-motes, again, the various districts of the country were represented by nobles and freemen; and thus the people were trained to self-government. * * * * Under the king there were three social grades—the thanes, or great landed proprietors; the freemen, or husbandmen, divided into various classes, according to their property; and the serfs or slaves, who possessed no property, and were bound to the land.

"The prominent feature of the Saxon laws was, that all crimes, injuries, and offences might be atoned for by the payment of money to the injured individual, or to his relatives. The life of every man had its fixed money value, according to his rank. That of a bishop was double the king's; that of a woman double a man's; and so on to the lowest degree of the scale. Each limb and feature had its price. The custom of awarding damages in our law-suits is, no doubt, derived from this practice of our Anglo-Saxon ancestors."—In closing these remarks, at this period of English history, it may be interesting to many readers to see together, in their order of succession, the names of the kings of the Saxon dynasty, with the lengths of their several reigns."

Saxon Dynasty.—Egbert, 800—'37; Ethelwolf, 837—'57; Ethelbald, 857—'60; Ethelbert, 860—'66; Ethelred I., 866—'72; Alfred, 872—901; Edward I., 901—'24; Athelstan, 924—40; Edmund I., 940—'47; Edred, 947—'55; Edwy, 955—'59; Edgar, 959—'74; Edward II., 974—'79; Ethelred II., 979—1016; Edmund II., 1016.

It would be encroaching too far on the province of the following history were the reigns of all the Anglo-Saxon sovereigns, between Alfred and Edmund II., here particularised; but there are some events in connection with those of Ethelred II., and his successor, Edmund, necessary to notice as preliminary to the Danish succession. Ethelred II. was the half-brother of his predecessor, Edward, improperly called the "Martyr." When only twelve years of age he ascended the throne, at a time when he had traitors for his counsellors, and when the Danes had greatly impoverished the kingdom. Feeling his position acutely, he was easily stimulated to seek revenge; and, finding instruments ready to execute his wishes, he contrived to have every Dane in his kingdom massacred, without regard to age, sex, or rank. Among the victims of this terrible vengeance was Gunilder, the sister of Sweyn, King of Denmark, who revenged the act by visiting and ravaging the country with a large army. Ethelred was forced to flee, and Sweyn became king, but died in the year following, 1014. On this, Ethelred was restored; but, in the next year, he also died, leaving his son, Edmund II., surnamed Ironside, to succeed him.

Edmund Ironside, although the legitimate heir, had to fight his way to the throne, which happened to have another claimant in Canute, the son of Sweyn. In one year, these two princes contended against each other in no fewer than five pitched battles, when it was agreed upon that Edmund should have London, part of Essex, and all the country south of the Thames, and Canute the rest. This agreement was terminated, in the course of a year, by the assassination of Edmund, who, although he left two sons, was succeeded by Canute, as monarch of the whole kingdom.

Ethelred had married Emma, sister of Richard II., Duke of Normandy; and, after his death, Canute took his widow to wife. By her former husband, Emma had two sons; but they were set aside by Canute, who adopted wise measures for the rule of his new kingdom. He did all that he could to reconcile the English to his government; and sent back to their native country as many of his followers as he could well spare. He restored the Saxon customs, and in the distribution of justice made no distinction between the Danes and the English. The laws were executed with great strictness; and the lives and properties of his subjects duly protected. He laboured to incorporate the two nations, which, though naturally enemies, had experienced such a multiplicity of calamities during their wars, that a reconciliation to circumstances became easier than might have been anticipated.

Having secured tranquillity in England, he visited Denmark, and gained a victory over the Swedes. He next conquered Norway; and became the most powerful prince of his time. Having satisfied his ambition in respect to military conquests, he built churches, endowed monasteries, and appointed prayers to be offered up to the Throne of Mercy for those who had fallen in battle against him. He also undertook a pilgrimage to Rome. After his return he conducted an expedition against Malcolm, King of Scotland, whom he conquered. In 1036, he died, leaving the crown of England to his son, Harold Harefoot, by a first wife, Alfwen, daughter to the Earl of Hampshire, in prejudice of Hardicanute, his son by Queen Emma, to whom he had promised the succession.

The reign of Harold was terminated in four years, and that of Hardicanute in less. The legitimate heir of the Saxon line now was Edmund, son of Edmund Ironside; but he being on the continent, the English, with the powerful Earl Godwin at their head, recognised the claim of Edward the Confessor, son of Ethelred and Emma, the Norman princess. This sovereign makes a small historical figure, being neither good nor great. He received his title from the monks of the time, and died in 1066. In him the Saxon line became extinct, when the throne was occupied by Harold II., son of Godwin, Earl of Kent, who had married the daughter of Edward. Within a year, this sovereign was defeated and slain by William of Normandy, at the battle of Hastings.

Dr. Russell, in his History of Modern Europe, says that no territory of so small an extent, has ever so much, or for so long a series of ages, engaged the attention of mankind as the island of Britain. From the most remote antiquity, it was visited by the Phœnicians and Carthaginians, on account of its tin and other valuable productions. The Romans, in the height of their power, made themselves masters of the southern part of it, at a vast expense of blood and treasure; and they thought the acquisition of sufficient importance to preserve their footing in this distant and transmarine province for three hundred years, by maintaining in it a great naval and military force. The ancient Britons lost their courage and their independent spirit under the Roman dominion, but received from their enlightened governors some knowledge of arts and letters. Whatever knowledge of letters the natives might have had previous to the arrival of the Romans, it must solely have been confined to their priests and mysterious Druids. The Saxons, in achieving their sanguinary conquest, destroyed every trace of ingenuity which the Romans had introduced, without bringing along with them a single peaceful art with which the Britons were not better acquainted; and the inveterate wars between the princes of the Heptarchy, afterwards obstructed, among their people, the usual progress of civilisation. No sooner, however, was England united into one kingdom under Egbert, than commerce and manufactures began to be cultivated in a country so highly favourable for both; abounding in the materials of industry, and surrounded on three sides by the sea, which forms on its coasts many commodious bays and safe harbours. During the Anglo-Saxon times, the exports of the country were tin, lead, wool, hides, horses, and slaves. These (the slaves) consisted, not solely of such unhappy persons as the laws of war or other causes had reduced to the condition of perpetual servitude, but others. Indeed, the Anglo-Saxons are accused, by contemporary writers, of making merchandise of even their nearest relations—"a custom," says William of Malmesbury, "which prevails in Northumberland even in our own days." This was not long after the Norman Conquest.

Notwithstanding that the navigation and commerce of the Anglo-Saxons were much injured by the Danes, yet did England, under their government, contain many large trading towns, and a greater number of inhabitants, both in the towns and in the country, than might have been expected in such an unsettled and turbulent period. London, York, Bristol, Exeter, and Norwich, were all large and populous cities; and as the labours of husbandry were mostly performed by slaves or villains, who were excluded from military service, the number of freemen in England, habituated to the use of arms, if not more, must have been as many at the Norman invasion as at any former or subsequent period. From this, however, it is not to be concluded that 60,000 men, under an experienced leader, have, at all times, been sufficient to overturn the constitution of this vigorous kingdom. William (the Conqueror) was ultimately indebted for his good fortune, less to the rashness of Harold, his own conduct, or the valour of his troops, than to the unsettled state of the succession to the crown. Harold had owed his exaltation to the throne as much to fear as affection; and on his death, the English nobility, who had borne with impatience the sway of an equal, naturally looked up to his conqueror and competitor, the kinsman of their ancient princes, as their sovereign, their head and centre of union. The Duke of Normandy, at Hastings, had triumphed over their elected king, but not over their liberties. These they imprudently put into his hands, in the hope that he would not abuse their generosity, when resistance and even vengeance was in their power.

DANISH DYNASTY.—Canute, 1016—'36; Harold I., 1036—'39; Hardicanute, 1039—'41; Edward III., 1041—'66; Harold II., 1066.

Duke William of Normandy was, on the mother's side, a bastard cousin of Edward the Confessor, and had, on visits before his invasion, felt a strong desire to possess the crown of England. During the reign of Edward, Norman influence had been rapidly growing at the English court, which, even in his youth, William visited, coming, says Knight, "to look on the rich lands, and to understand something of the rough people, over whom his feeble relative was the nominal ruler. In the fields through which he travelled, he saw an industrious race, churls and slaves, cultivating diligently, and not without skill, after the modes of their ancestors. In the towns he saw busy artisans, who were associated for mutual protection, and had their peculiar laws handed down, in code after code, but with little essential change in their principles. He saw powerful earls, bold-bearded men, who were great land possessors, not holding their arables and pastures (as in feudal Europe) as fief of the crown, but as independent lords, and tyrannising, wherever they dared, in a most kingly fashion. He saw a land that arms might win. He might be the powerful successor of Edward, or he might fight for the crown against some pretender, when the childless king should be no more." The pictures of rural and urban life which William then saw, improved upon further acquaintance, and the consequence was, that his success at the battle of Hastings gave him the English crown. To him succeeded William Rufus, his second and favourite son, who again was succeeded by Henry I. (called Beauclerc, or the Scholar), who was the youngest son of the Conqueror. At his death, Stephen, son of the Count of Blois and Adela, daughter of William the Conqueror, usurped the throne, notwithstanding that Matilda, the only surviving child of Henry, had formally been recognised as successor to his dominions, both in Normandy and in England.

As William the Conqueror had taken the usual oath administered to the Anglo-Saxon kings at their coronation, solemnly engaging to maintain the constitution, and to administer justice according to the laws, the English believed that they had merely changed their native sovereign for a foreigner—a matter to them of little concern, perhaps, at any time, but more particularly at present, as the line of succession had formerly been broken by the usurpation or election of Harold. But although William affected moderation for a while, and even adopted some of the laws of Edward the Confessor, to help in calming the apprehensions of his new subjects, to these laws he himself paid little attention. Accordingly, no sooner was he firmly established on the throne, than he entirely subverted the form of government and the way in which justice was administered throughout the kingdom. The government substituted by him was a rigid feudal monarchy, or military aristocracy, in which a regular chain of subordination and service was established, from the sovereign or commander-in-chief to the serf or villain. This feudal government, like all others of the same description, was attended with a great depression of the body of the people, who were daily exposed to the insults and exactions of the nobles, whose vassals they were, and from whose oppressive jurisdiction it was both difficult and dangerous for them to appeal.

At the death of the Conqueror, the state of England is thus described by Henry of Huntingdon, who lived about his own time. "The Normans," he says, "had now fully executed the wrath of heaven upon the English. There was hardly one of the nation who possessed any power. They were all involved in servitude and sorrow; insomuch that to be called an Englishman was considered as a reproach. In those miserable times, many oppressive taxes and tyrannical customs were introduced. The king himself, when he had let his lands at their full value, if another tenant came and offered more, and afterwards a third, and offered still more, violated all his former agreements, and gave them to him who offered most; and the great men were inflamed with such a rage for money, that they cared not by what means it was acquired. The more they talked of justice, the more injuriously they acted. Those who were called justiciaries (most likely the barons in their courts), were the fountains of all iniquity. Sheriffs and judges, whose peculiar duty it was to pronounce righteous judgments, were the most cruel of all tyrants, and greater plunderers than common thieves and robbers." Speaking of the miseries of a subsequent reign, the author of the Saxon Chronicle says, "The great barons grievously oppressed the poor people with building castles; and when they were built, they filled them with wicked men, or rather devils, who seized both men and women supposed to be possessed of any money, threw them into prison, and put them to more cruel tortures than ever the martyrs endured." Such was the general condition of England under the Norman rule.

NORMAN DYNASTY.—William I., 1066—'87; William II., 1087—1100; Henry I., 1100—'35; Stephen, 1135—'54.

The first of the Plantagenets who ruled in England was Henry II. He was the eldest son of Matilda, only legitimate child of Henry I., and therefore the direct heir to the throne. He then became the most powerful prince of his age, having also inherited, succeeded to, and acquired, by his marriage with Eleanor, the divorced queen of Louis VII. of France, one-fifth of the territories in that kingdom, including the whole of its Atlantic coast.

The period of English history embraced by the Plantagenet line extends to about 330 years, or from 1154 to 1485, when Richard III., the last sovereign of the House of York, fell on Bosworth field. Within this space of time many of the most important political transactions occurred, in some measure gradually clearing the way for the wider development of those liberties which the British people now enjoy. Not the least of these was Magna Charta, obtained in 1215. This great charter, however, procured very little for the Commons, whatever it did for the barons. Indeed, it only granted, or secured, freedom to those orders of the realm already possessed of that blessing. These were the clergy, the barons, and the knights, or land-holders. As for the commonalty, the greatest part of the people, they continued still to be held as slaves; and it was not till long afterwards that they came into a participation of legal protection. This charter was extracted from King John on the 15th day of June, 1215, in a meadow called Runnymede, between Windsor and Staines, and taking its name from a stream that meandered through it.

Another great step towards liberty was made in the long reign of Henry III. This was the quasi-enfranchisement of the villains attached to manors, the agricultural bondmen of the lords. "These, the most numerous class of the population, were held, by the king's courts of law, to have acquired by the great charter, in like manner as the lords themselves, a hereditary estate in the land allotted to them, whereon to raise sustenance for themselves and families, so long as they rendered the customary services hitherto required of them. These peasant estates came to be called copyholds, because they were no longer held at the will of the lord, but according to the customary services particularised in the court-roll of manors, a copy of which the villains were entitled to receive. By this great measure more than one-third of the then cultivated land of England became the legal property of the manorial serfs, in estates from fifteen to thirty or more acres. The establishment of copyholds is the point of time from which the community of England started into new life, the copyholders becoming the progenitors of the energetic and independent population, who became the glory of their country."

In the reign of Edward I. the manumission of the villains was also greatly promoted by their being extensively employed in his wars, receiving his pay being held an act of manumission, as all were freemen who bore arms in the king's service. It was this prerogative which enabled him and his successors quickly to collect an army of sturdy archers and infantry, composed chiefly of runaway serfs. These, as armies, were generally disbanded at the close of each campaign; this, as a natural result, gave great facility for villain manumission.

It is uncertain when parliament was, as now, divided into two chambers: it is, however, agreed that they existed in the first year of Edward III. In consequence of the continual want of money experienced by this sovereign to carry on his wars, he held no fewer than twenty parliaments during the fifty-one years of his reign, each of which assembled in return to writs of summons. This establishes the fact, that the representatives of the Commons were elected each time they assembled. In this reign, the Commons established, among other rights—1. The illegality of raising money without their consent. 2. The necessity that the two Houses should concur for any alteration of the law. 3. Right of the Commons to inquire into public abuses, and to impeach public councillors.

The discontent of the reign of Richard II. was caused chiefly by the spread of Wickliffe's doctrines, in opposition to those of the See of Rome; the impoverished effects of the wars of Edward, and the desire for total and immediate abolition of personal slavery. The king's favouritism and extravagance, also, helped to spread dissatisfaction. The most unfortunate legislative act of Henry IV. was the statute promulgated against the Lollards, the successors of Wickliffe. It enacts the burning of heretics. The first person publicly burnt under this law was William Sawtre, who had been rector of Lynn, in Norfolk.

In the reign of Henry VI. (1455), the "Wars of the Roses" may be said to have begun with the battle of St. Alban's; and with the death of Richard III. on Bosworth field, Leicestershire, in 1485, they ended; so did the Plantagenet line on the English throne.

Henry VII. was grandson of Owen Tudor, by the widow of Henry V., and son of Edmond, Earl of Richmond, by Margaret, heiress of the Duke of Somerset. His descent, however, gave him no legal right to the crown, because—1. His ancestor John, Earl of Somerset, was only the illegitimate son of Katharine Swinford, by John of Gaunt, fourth son of Edward III.;—2. Because there were legitimate descendants of John of Gaunt then living;—3. Because the act of parliament which legitimated John of Gaunt's issue by Katharine Swinford, did not render them capable of inheriting the crown, but only gave a capacity of inheriting private estate from their ancestor. The reign of this sovereign "may be considered as the period when the distinction of rank ceased to correspond in a general manner with that of races—Saxon and Norman—and as the commencement of the state of society at present existing in England. From that time there is no tradition that the inhabitants of England were divided into two hostile populations—the ruling class, who spoke Norman-French, and the mass of the people, who spoke English: both were now fused into one people. The real authority of the sovereign was somewhat increased by the barons being reduced to the condition of subjects; and although there were still numbers of bondmen in England, the great body of the people had become free at the close of the 15th century."

TUDOR DYNASTY.—Henry VII., 1485—1509; Henry VIII., 1509—'47; Edward VI., 1547—'53; Mary, 1553—'58; Elizabeth, 1558—1603.

With her dying breath, Queen Elizabeth recognised the title of her kinsman, James VI. of Scotland, to be her successor, he being the great-grandson of Margaret, elder daughter of Henry VII. of England. Perhaps the greatest errors in the administration of James, were, his strong partiality for the hierarchical government of the church of England, the only authority for which being that derived from the Roman church, and his giving his royal countenance to the proceedings of the prelates, in enforcing conformity, even to the depriving of dissentients of their civil rights. In England, the Puritans, then unquestionably the sincerest religionists in the land, were kept in a continual state of irritation; while by engrafting episcopacy on established Presbyterianism (church government mostly by the laity) in Scotland, exasperation against the government of James became general throughout the country.

From the commencement of the contest between Charles I. and the House of Commons, his final defeat scarcely admitted of a doubt. His character, when compared with that of Cromwell, was feebleness in the extreme. The frivolous councillors, too, by whom he suffered himself to be influenced, were no match for such antagonists as Hampden, Pym, and the younger Vane, who, in any age, would have been notable men. The disparity, also, in the military talents of the two parties was almost as great. The Cavaliers were men of chivalrous courage, but of unsteady principles. They were terrible in the first brunt of an onset; but when stoutly opposed and broken, could never again rally to the charge. On the other side, the Roundheads were of great courage, which was sustained by a religious enthusiasm which never, for a moment, permitted them to doubt of the ultimate success of their cause, and made them, at all times, ready to fall in its defence. The succeeding Commonwealth, however, is an unsatisfactory period of English history, and is the time to which England is indebted for the first maintenance of an army during peace. It was, however, in the reign of Charles II. that the nucleus of a standing army was formed, the number of troops kept up varying from 4,000 to 8,000 men. The public, however, did not like this, and in 1679, it was declared contrary to law: notwithstanding which, the army has kept its ground.

"As in the time of Charles I. and the Commonwealth, so in that of Charles II., no regard was paid to the demand of the people, for the security and extension of civil and religious liberty, either by the king or the parliament; consequently, toleration, which is the essence of religious liberty, was denied; and legislation, by frequently-renewed representatives chosen by the whole people (which is the root of civil liberty), was evaded, with the concurrence of the parliament, there being no trace of any demand having been made, or bill introduced, for amending the constitutional representation, which, like the feudal tenure, had become effete.

"As the restoration of Charles II. was quickly followed by the unconditional abolition of the feudal land-tenures, which converted the land-holders under the state into the land-owners of the state; so the flight of James II. was immediately followed by the abolition of the feudal supremacy of the crown, and its assumption by the parliament. But as the one House was and is a hereditary body, chiefly composed of the great land-owners, and the other of elected members from that class, the supreme power became virtually vested in the land-owners. The above innovations, the abolition of the feudal land-tenures and of the supremacy of the crown—each the most important that had been effected since the Conquest—together, overthrew the feudal monarchy, which had existed for nearly 600 years. Under it, the king governed as well as reigned; while, under the new settlement of the crown, it was intended that the king should reign with the least possible individual authority, and that the parliament should govern with all but absolute authority. In the re-settlement of the government on the Restoration, and on the so-called Revolution of 1688, it cannot be said that the people were in any way consulted, or their interests in any way considered. The landocracy alone were the gainers by the great constitutional changes effected at both epochs."

The era of parliamentary government is marked by the accession of William III. to the throne. It was then that the king's ministers, ministry, or cabinet, was instituted. This was, at first, not agreeable to William, as it denied him the sovereign power; but he at last came to terms, agreeing to sanction all restrictions imposed by parliament, "on condition of being properly supplied with the means of humbling the power of France." Although the ministers are chosen by the king, they are responsible to parliament, even for their acceptance of office, as well as for every subsequent administrative act, until sanctioned by parliament. Consequently, no act of government is valid unless officially authorised by a minister of state. Thence comes the dogma, that the king, in his capacity of chief of the state, can do no wrong. In this reign, the Bank of England, suggested by William Paterson, a Scotchman, was established (1694) by royal charter.

The average national expenditure, during the reign of Anne, was about ten millions, one-half of which was raised by taxes, and the other by loans.

STUART DYNASTY.—James I., 1603—'25; Charles I., 1625—'49; The Commonwealth, 1649—'60; Charles II., 1660—'85; James II., 1685—'88; William III. and Mary, 1689—1702; Anne, 1702—'14.

The Protestant succession to the crown having, by several acts of parliament, been firmly established, George, the eldest son of Ernest Augustus, Elector of Hanover, by Sophia, granddaughter of James I., ascended the throne. He was born at Hanover, May 20th, 1660, and crowned at Westminster October 20th, 1714. In consequence of this king being ignorant of the language of the people he had been called upon to govern, the customary presence of the royal ruler at the meetings of cabinet councils was dispensed with, and from this time the absence of the sovereign has, on these occasions, become a rule of state.

It may here be observed, that the parliament has, ever since its existence, shown a much greater desire to increase its own power than to enlarge the liberties of the people. The reign of George I. forms no exception to the rule, however hard the remark may seem to bear upon the representatives of the people. At the close of Anne's reign, the Tories took measures to preserve the representation in the House of Commons, as much as possible, in the hands of large land-owners; and, in the next reign, the Whigs did all they could to lengthen the duration of parliament, by a retrospective law to lessen the popular influence, and to continue themselves in power. As the Whig ministers were allowed to govern the country as they pleased, they, in return, "gratified the sovereign with a continual round of foreign treaties and alliances. It was natural for a king, born and bred in Germany, where all sovereignty is possessed upon such precarious tenures, to introduce the same spirit into the British constitution, however independent it might be as to the rest of Europe. This reign, therefore, was begun by treaties, and the latter part of it was burthened with them. The chief object of all was to secure to the king his dominions in Germany, and exclude the Pretender (son of James II.) from Britain." Although the reign of George was one of tranquillity, the Whig ministry managed to increase the general taxation of the country about a million. The amount raised, on a medium, for the last four years of the reign, was £6,762,643.

Until the reign of George II. (1731) all legal processes and pleadings in the courts were in Latin—a monstrous absurdity amongst an English-speaking people! In that year, it was enacted that, in future, the language of the country should take the place of the Latin. Notwithstanding the sense and justice of this measure, it was resisted on the ground of the danger that would be incurred by meddling with the established forms of judicial proceedings. Where Ignorance and Ease are suffered to enjoy themselves in the undisturbed tranquillity of possession, the improvements of Intelligence are sure to be, by them, denounced as dangerous innovations.

"In 1746, it was first practically illustrated that the administration of government was vested in the parliament, and not in the king. After the resignation of Walpole, the king made Lord Granville Secretary of State, and the Earl of Bath First Lord of the Treasury, when nearly every member of the administration, including the Duke of Newcastle and eight other dukes, threw up their offices. Lord Granville, finding it impossible to form a government which would obtain the support of parliament, abandoned the attempt. The former ministers were then recalled, and the king was taught that he must consult parliament in the choice of his ministers." In this reign, the House of Commons was, almost exclusively, composed of the nominees of the great Tory and Whig land-holders.

During the long reign of George III., the improvements which took place throughout the country were in every way extraordinary. A new system of still-water navigation became so perfect in the form of canals, that no spot in England, south of Durham, is more than fifteen miles from water communication. Between 1760 and 1774, no fewer than 452 acts of parliament were passed for the repair of highways; and during that period turnpike roads greatly increased in number. Between 1760 and 1780, several acts were passed, incorporating parishes and districts in different parts of the kingdom, and vesting them with power to borrow money to erect houses of industry, and to frame local regulations for the government of the poor. These acts remained in force till 1834, when the present poor-law system was adopted. The frequent recurrence of unfavourable seasons, from 1766 to 1775, having produced high prices, an extensive system of enclosing uncultivated lands was begun. In thirty years, the number of acres enclosed amounted to nearly 3,000,000, and much of it brought into cultivation. In 1801, the first official enumeration of the population of Great Britain was made; and, since then, a decennary census has continued to be taken, with successively increasing accuracy in the returns made. Early in this century, the application of steam-power to navigation was accomplished in Scotland. The Comet steamer, which in 1811 made its appearance on the river Clyde, was the first which plied for hire in the kingdom. In 1807, the manufacture of gas from coal was effected, and applied to illuminating the streets of London, by a German of the name of Winsor. In the above year, he lighted Pall-Mall with gas. In 1816, the beautiful invention of the safety-lamp, by Sir Humphry Davy, was brought into common use. To speak comprehensively, although the reign of George III. was characterised by long and devastating wars, it was marked by great national prosperity, grand discoveries in science, arts, and manufactures, and by a vast approach to a highly cultivated state of civilisation.

The reign of George IV. introduces the railway system. The opening line for passenger traffic was that which unites the manufacturing metropolis, Manchester, with Liverpool, and which forms, perhaps, one of the greatest travelling lines in the world. Its formation was the commencement of an era of rapid transit, and a development of internal communication, which it is difficult to conceive likely to be superseded by any other invention possessed of equal powers of speed and safety.

Events of the utmost importance now thicken with such rapidity, that their bare enumeration would almost be a fatiguing perusal. In the reign of William IV. came reform of the parliamentary representation, which became law in June, 1832; and, in 1834, the emancipation of the colonial slaves, at a cost of £20,000,000. His reign was comparatively short, when Alexandrina Victoria, only child of the Duke of Kent, fourth son of George III., ascended the throne. Perhaps the crowning event of this reign is the grand social improvement known as the "uniform penny post," throughout the United Kingdom. It came into operation on January 10th, 1840, and its originator was Rowland Hill, who subsequently was appointed secretary to the Post-office, in which capacity he laboured till he perfected his plan. In 1864, failing health compelled him to resign his appointment. Other events, such as the Atlantic Telegraph—indeed the whole system of telegraphic and railway communication—with the application of steam to the purposes of navigation, place the age in which we live on such an apex of enlightened civilisation, as we may be pardoned for believing has never before been reached. A few weeks takes the heir to the kingdom, the Prince of Wales, to India by steam; and a few hours, so to speak, informs us of his safe arrival there. Such works are evidences of the triumph of mind over matter.

"Without the facilities afforded by railways," says a modern writer, speaking of the achievements of art and science in the 19th century, "the postal charge would hardly have been possible; so, also, may we be said to owe to railway lines the extension of the telegraphic wire. To show how Providence ripens discoveries at the right time, we may also notice the almost simultaneous discovery of gutta-percha, without which substance for a coating, the telegraphic wire could not have been laid under the sea. What this fluid is, which travels at the rate of 15,000 miles a second, is not to be satisfactorily told by wondering man; and we are only on the threshold of the revelation of its incalculable efforts on mankind. We know that, before long, every part of the world will be in instantaneous communication; whilst the possible result upon the relations, progress, and character of the race at large we cannot estimate.

"With the railway we have to combine the navigable steam-power of England. It is worthy of attention that the commercial and naval strength of the country mingle in a way which cannot be separated. There are several companies which possess fleets of steamers, that, in case of war, could be rendered serviceable against the enemy. These are the Peninsular and Oriental, the West Indian, the Atlantic, and other companies, whose vessels are more magnificent than were the ships of war of a century ago. The regular British fleet is equal to those of all other nations united. What our commercial ships are may be estimated by our commerce, which is double that of the United States; while our exports equal those of the four greatest states of Europe—namely, France, Austria, Russia, and Spain."

In ship-building, the power of mechanical genius has been equally displayed as in that of scientific discovery in connection with the telegraph system. The construction of the Great Eastern might be regarded as among the wonders of the world; and in every department of mechanical art, the attainment of vast power, with facility of manipulation, seem to be the principal objects aimed at. That, in these respects, astonishing results are yearly achieved, is evident in almost every direction, to a truly marvellous extent. Genius, capital, and labour, too, are everywhere uniting to adorn the country with magnificent specimens of architecture,

The public buildings which have been erected, enlarged, and adorned in this epoch, have far surpassed, in number, those of any other period of English history. "Palaces, churches of extraordinary beauty, hospitals, markets, and public buildings for all imaginable purposes, have been erected, and still the grand work of social progress is considered incomplete. Of the great empire over which Queen Victoria sways the British sceptre, it has justly been said that the sun never sets thereon. It exceeds the limits of any other empire, embraces more than double the area of the continent of Europe, and comprises 240,000,000 of subjects; that is, one-fifth of the entire human family. Among this multitudinous population the English language is more or less heard; and to the vast population, the small island of Great Britain is the centre of influence and the source of authority. It has been justly remarked, 'Not an hour of the twenty-four, not one round of the minute-hand is allowed to pass over the dial, in which, on some portion of the surface of the globe, the air is not filled with accents that are ours. They are heard in the ordinary transactions of life, or in the administration of law; in the deliberations of the senate-house, or in the council-chamber; in the offices of private devotion, or in the public observance of the rites and duties of a common faith.' Such is the majesty of England in the 19th century. Her annals commence with the records of a rude and barbarous people, thinly scattered over their native island. It concludes with the records of a nation in the highest state of civilisation, which not only inhabits the island of its nativity, but which has peopled colonies and kingdoms, and, with a noble Queen at its head, rules the world."

THE ROYAL HISTORY OF ENGLAND.

CHAPTER I.

ANCIENT BRITAIN AND THE DRUIDS.

A DESIRE to become acquainted with the history of our native country—to learn something of the fair land in which we were born, and by the productions of which we are clothed and fed—is very natural and praiseworthy. It is both interesting and instructive to read of the People, the modes of Religion and Government, the Kings, the Warriors, Heroes and Sages, who in times past have breathed and lived in this favoured land in which we now dwell. By such knowledge we may learn to imitate the virtues of the good and wise men, and to avoid the evil example of those wicked ones who have occupied this island in former ages. It is the object of this work to impart that knowledge in a simple narrative, at once interesting and instructive; and which will convey to the majority of our readers as much information on the subject of the history of their own country, as could be gleaned from the pages of the more elaborate and important works of our standard historians.

How this island first became inhabited, no one can positively affirm. A monk, named Geoffrey ap Arthur, better known as Geoffrey of Monmouth, who lived in the twelfth century after the birth of our Saviour, tells us, that the original or first inhabitants of the island of Britain, were a Princess Albyne, and her thirty-two sisters, daughters to Diocletian, King of Syria. Married to men whom these proud ladies considered inferior to themselves, they treated them with "scorn and despight." Reproved by their father, to whom their husbands complained, they one night murdered their wedded lords as they slept by their side. For this they were punished by being sent adrift in a ship, with provisions for six months. They were drifted "to an isle that was all wilderness," where they resolved to remain; and from Albyne, the isle received the name of Albion. After they had resided here some time, "in single blessedness," they one day discovered that there were men on the island, whom, the legend tells us, were Satan and his companions, who had assumed the human form. From the unions which followed, a race of giants descended, who peopled the caves and hills. These giants held the island till the arrival of Brute, or Brutus, the descendant of Æneas, the son of Priam, the last King of Troy. After the fall of that city, Æneas took refuge in Lombardy, where he married the daughter of the king. Brutus was his great-grandson, who, unfortunately, killed his father. For this offence he was banished from Lombardy, and took shelter in Greece, where he found a colony of Trojans, who, being oppressed by the king, Pandarus, made him their leader, and left the country. After many adventures they landed in Albion, subdued the giants, and established themselves in the island; to which Brutus gave the name of Britain, and called the people Britons, after himself. The Gogmagog was the last of the giants; and the gigantic statues in the Guildhall, London, called Gog and Magog, represent him, and Corineus, by whom he was killed in a wrestling match. Another legend—first published towards the close of the fifteenth century, by Annius, a friar of the Dominican order, originally found in a work ascribed to Berosus, a priest of the temple of Belus, in Babylon—tells us that the island was inhabited by a people called Celts, in the days of Noah; and that Samothes, the son of Japheth, whom Moses [illegible] Meshech [Gen. x. 2], was the first king. Three hundred years after, according to this legend, the island was conquered by Albion, the son of Neptune, whom the Greeks and Romans worshipped as the god of the sea. This legend also gives us the story of Brutus, which the chronicler Holinshed, who lived in the sixteenth century, firmly believed. To that chief the foundation of London is ascribed. He is said to have called the city New Troy, or Troy-novant; which afterwards took the name of Caer Town, or Lud's Town, from a British king.

These legends are, of course, all fabulous: though that Britain was inhabited several centuries before the Christian era, is undoubtedly true. The Celtæ, who originally came from the East, settled in Central and Western Europe. They were divided into two tribes—the Gauls or Celts, and the Cymri: and we cannot doubt that this island was peopled by their descendants;—England, Wales, and the Lowlands of Scotland, by the Cymri: Ireland and the Highlands of Scotland, by the Gauls or Gaels. The name Britain, supposed by some to be derived from the Celtic brith, or brit (painted), was, the Welsh Triads tell us, given to it "by Prydain, the son of Aedd the Great, who called it Inys Prydain (the Island of Prydain);" in time altered into Britain. The name Albion, by which the island was known in the time of Pliny, is, no doubt, derived from its white cliffs; alb meaning white or fair, and i, inn, or innis, an island.

Britain appears to have remained unknown, except to the inhabitants, till it was discovered, several centuries before the Christian era, by the Phœnicians, an ancient and very intelligent people, at one time the greatest traders in the world. Some of their ships were driven to the island when on a trading voyage; and finding that the country produced both tin and lead, a little colony was probably left to profit by the mines which they had discovered. They found the island peopled, but we have no account of the inhabitants: for the Phœnicians, desirous of retaining the profit derived from the trade with these people to themselves, contrived, for a long time, to keep even the situation of the island a secret from other nations. They called the British Isles the Cassiterides, which means the Land of Tin. In time many more people came over the narrow sea from the opposite shore of France, which was then called Gallia, and the people Gauls or Celts. They appear to have prospered well, and multiplied rapidly. Some wanderers, also, arrived from Belgium and from Spain; the former, called the Belgæ, were supposed to have settled in Kent, and the latter in Ireland.

Britain, at the time it was invaded by JULIUS CÆSAR, was not one great united nation, as at present, but occupied by sixteen distinct "tribes" or "nations," each headed by a military chief. They lived in a state of rude freedom, cultivated the earth just sufficiently to afford them the means of existence, and generally employed the rest of their time in making war upon one another. The most powerful and extensive of these tribes, or nations, were the Brigantes, who are supposed to have occupied the greater part of the counties now called Durham, York, Cumberland, Westmoreland, and Lancashire. Another powerful tribe was the Trimbantes, who dwelt in Middlesex and Essex; Lud Town, or London, being their chief city.

The inhabitants of Britain at this period were a brave, hardy, powerful race of men; they dwelt in wretched cottages made of wood, and covered with straw; what they called a town was a piece of cleared land in the midst of a forest, which they walled round with the trees they had cut down; within this space they built rude hovels for themselves and their cattle. They also surrounded these wretched towns with a ditch and a bank, as an additional defence against their troublesome neighbours. Probably the ditch was also intended to drain the land, which was damp and marshy, and thus to preserve them from those diseases which are common to men and women who live in damp swampy places. They had, however, some towns, in the construction of which a great deal more ingenuity was displayed; these towns were, in fact, military fortresses, surrounded by one or two circular walls built of rough masses of granite, piled one upon another, and very cleverly fitted together without cement. These poor wild people, no doubt, did not construct such massive walls without a strong necessity for doing so, and not until they had been dreadfully harassed by their enemies: thus good arose out of evil; violence and danger making the Celts, or Britons, to this extent, intelligent and industrious. It seems they were also very expert in basket-making, and in several kinds of wicker-work, and they were probably a clever race of people; for, at the time of Cæsar's invasion, they possessed not only weapons and rude instruments for agricultural purposes, but chariots both for war and pleasure. Besides these, they made boats of the trunks of trees, hollowed out with sharp instruments, and others of wicker-work covered with the skins of beasts. They made swords, too, of copper and tin; but they were long awkward weapons, and very soft, and soon bent before the heavy blows of a powerful adversary; they had, also, daggers, spears, and shields of their own make; and appear altogether to have been a very ingenious people. Indeed, curious and contradictory as it may seem, they possessed the manners of savages, while they practised many of the arts of civilised life, in a very rude, imperfect state, of course; but in a manner which must cause surprise, when we recollect what bad tools, and how few of them, they had to work with.

Among the singular habits that distinguished the ancient Britons, those living in the south of the island would not eat hares or poultry, while those in the north part of it abstained from fish: perhaps this strange avoidance of wholesome and delicious food had its origin in some of their idolatrous superstitions. Historians have said, that a part of the early inhabitants of this country were guilty of cannibalism, or eating the flesh of men and women; but this disgusting and revolting act has not been actually proved against them. Influenced also, no doubt, by that love of finery and decoration which is not peculiar to savage nations, the ancient Britons used to paint their skins and tattoo them in a manner similar to that performed at the present time by the inhabitants of the numerous islands in the South Seas. One historian relates, that the first morsel of food which was given to an infant, was put into its mouth by the father on the point of his sword; the parent, at the same time, praying that the poor little feeble thing might become a brave warrior, and die on the field of battle.

The religion of the ancient Britons was a superstitious and barbarous one. The priests were called Druids; they presided over all religious matters, and were also the judges, the physicians, the poets, and the schoolmasters of the country. They kept not only the people, but the kings of the different tribes or nations who inhabited England, under their control; the kings could do little without their permission. They were also the astronomers of that period; and it is supposed they really knew more of the sublime science of astronomy than could have been thought possible with their very imperfect means of obtaining information.

The Druids carried on the rites of their religion in magnificent groves of venerable oak trees, whose lofty branches, twining together at the top, made a kind of natural temple, the leafy roof of which shut out the rays of the sun, and admitted only a dim light, that gave a solemn air to the place, and produced a feeling of submissive awe and terror in the minds of the poor people, who were told that these places, or sacred groves, as they were called, were visited by the gods. The Druids worshipped a great many of these supposed gods. Under different names, Cæsar tells us, in his Commentaries, they adored Mercury, Apollo, Mars, Jupiter, and Minerva; the heathen deities of ancient Greece and Rome. To these idols they offered up horrible sacrifices—not only animals, but they murdered their fellow-creatures, and burnt the dead bodies upon their altars. All their criminals, and the prisoners they took in war, were thus immolated; and, not content with single murders, they sometimes made immense wicker baskets, in the shape of giants—so large, that they would hold a great number of people; and having crowded them full of men and animals, set fire to the whole, and drowned the cries of the expiring victims with songs, and the noise of musical instruments. At other times they crucified these wretched creatures, or shot them to death with arrows; and all these dreadful cruelties were done by the ignorant Druids to win the favour of the gods; as if any wise and powerful beings could possibly be pleased with such savage and disgusting scenes.

Besides the imaginary deities just mentioned, the Druids worshipped the Sun and the Moon; and regarded Serpents, Oak-trees, and the Mistletoe plant as very sacred things. The oak, they said, was the representative of Jupiter, and the favourite tree of heaven: the mistletoe they called by a name which meant all-healing; and as they paid great attention to the nature of herbs and flowers, it is very likely that they were acquainted with some medicinal properties of that plant which are not known now. When they found the mistletoe growing upon an oak, they made a solemn procession to the tree; and having, with a great deal of ceremony, cut off the plant with a golden knife, they sacrificed two beautiful white bulls under the tree, to ensure its divine and healing efficacy. It is a remarkable thing, that the mistletoe was also associated with superstitious customs both in Persia and India. An ancient Druidical rite is most likely still observed when pretty cousins are kissed under a bough of this plant at Christmas-time.

The Druids used to wear a serpent's egg, as a mark of distinction: it was set in gold; and was supposed to confer a magical power, or a capability of doing impossible things, upon the wearer of it. Barbarous as the Druids were, and ignorant of a great many simple truths familiar to all in this enlightened age, yet they possessed a great deal of strange learning, by means of which they imposed upon the poor credulous people. They had a considerable knowledge of mechanics; and were enabled by this means to erect vast, but rudely-formed temples, the ruins of one of which, named Stonehenge, may still be seen on Salisbury Plain. It is supposed to have been dedicated to the worship both of the Sun and the Serpent. The Druids, no doubt, told the people that they raised these temples by magic, or by divine assistance. They taught the Britons to be brave in battle, to respect the gods, and to do good to each other; and they said that, when people died, their spirits did not perish also, but passed into some other body, either of a man or beast, and so continued, in one form or another, to live for ever. So that the spirit which animated a man might, at his death, pass into the form of a horse, an ox, a dog, a sheep, a fish, or even an insect. This idea was not peculiar to the Druids, but was taught by the wise men and priests of other ancient nations, and is called the doctrine of the transmigration of souls. The Christian religion has taught us to disregard all these wild notions; and since the Divine Saviour has himself deigned to become the teacher of mankind, even a child may know more upon such subjects than did the wisest men of the great and wonderful nations of times long passed.

CHAPTER II.

BRITAIN AND THE ROMANS.—B.C. 55—A.D. 449.

SUCH was the state and character of the people who lived in England at the time when the famous Roman conqueror, Julius Cæsar, thought fit to invade it. The Romans were a very talented, brave, and ambitious people, who thought they would be able to subdue the whole world, and rule over it; and, by their great energy and courage, they did conquer many nations in Europe, Asia, and Africa, and extorted submission and tribute from them.

It was on a summer's morning, fifty-five years before the birth of our Saviour, that Julius Cæsar, having determined on the conquest of Britain, came sailing in sight of the white cliffs of Dover, with eighty vessels and 12,000 men. He had just effected the subjection of the Gauls in France; and as the ancient Britons had frequently crossed the channel, and assisted their neighbours against the Romans, Cæsar thought this was an excellent excuse for punishing and reducing them to obedience also. He was the more eager to do this, as he had heard a great deal about the mineral wealth of this northern island. But if the Roman general thought to obtain an easy victory over the Britons, he was greatly deceived. When his vessels arrived off the coast, he saw the white cliffs covered with armed men, whose fierce looks and resolute attitude threatened a savage resistance; and when the Romans made their descent at Deal, they met with a brave and determined opposition; but the military engines, and superior discipline of the Romans, obtained them the victory. After this, Cæsar granted a peace to the Britons; but the very night when this peace was concluded, a storm destroyed almost the whole of his fleet; and the Britons, seeing his misfortune, thought to turn it to account. They had cut down all their corn, except in one large field, where the rich yellow grain was still left to wave in the gentle summer breezes. As the Romans were greatly in want of provisions, they sent two legions to cut down this corn, and bring it to their vessels; but the moment they arrived at the field, an immense number of stalwart Britons, with arms in their hands, rose suddenly from the corn, where they had been lying in ambush, and laid about them with such fury, that had not Cæsar hastened to the assistance of his soldiers, they would all have been killed upon the spot. Other Britons now came pouring out of the neighbouring woods, in their war-chariots, and a general battle ensued; and the Romans, if not beaten, were compelled to retire to their fortified camp, where they were kept for some days by heavy falls of rain. A third conflict soon after ensued, in which the Britons were defeated, and compelled to fly into the woods. They were not so thoroughly defeated, however, but that Cæsar expected a great deal more annoyance from them; so he set sail at midnight, and made the best of his way back to Gaul.

Cæsar did not give up the idea of conquering Britain; he was far too resolute a man for that. In the following spring, he got together an immense fleet of 800 vessels, and an army of 32,000 men; which he landed on a large flat between Sandwich and the spot where Walmer Castle now stands. A battle soon took place between the Britons and their invaders, somewhere near Canterbury; the Britons fought until evening, then retreated into the woods; and the Romans were compelled to return to the coast, and repair their ships, most of which had been injured, and many of them wrecked by a storm. The Britons then chose one of their native kings, whose name was Cassivellaunus or Caswallon, to be the leader of their united forces; and fought several battles against the Romans with such skill and resolute courage, that the very sound of the on-rushing of their war-chariots often struck terror to the hearts of their hardy and powerful enemies: still, they were usually defeated, and were at last glad to sue for peace, which Cæsar was by no means sorry to grant. Most likely he wished in his heart that he had never meddled with these brave islanders, who, although they were beaten and driven into their thick forests one day, emerged from them in countless thousands the next, and just as ready to fight as ever.

Cæsar told the Britons that they must give hostages as a warrant for their peaceable conduct in future, and that they must pay a yearly tribute to Rome: this they agreed to do; but as the Roman general sailed away in a hurry, very few of the hostages were sent; and the tribute was probably never paid at all. Indeed, Julius Cæsar must be called rather the Discoverer than the Conqueror of Britain.

The Britons were now left undisturbed for nearly one hundred years; and during that period very little is known about them. It seems that numbers of them now and then crossed over the sea to Gaul, where they learnt a great many useful things which had been taught the Gauls by the Romans; and as they brought all this information home to their countrymen, it helped greatly to improve and civilise them. But the ambitious Romans again cast a longing look towards the beautiful island with the tall white cliffs; and in the forty-third year after the birth of our Saviour, the Emperor Claudius sent a skilful general, named Aulus Plautius, to Britain, with an army of 50,000 men. That the Romans did not expect a very easy victory is plain from their sending so large an army against a nation of comparative barbarians; and in this expectation they were by no means deceived; for although Plautius obtained several victories over the Britons, yet they fought with such spirit, and rallied so frequently, that the Roman general wrote to the emperor, and begged him to come over to Britain with another army to help him. Accordingly, the Emperor Claudius came to Britain; received the submission of four of the tribes; and, after remaining here a few months, returned again to Rome. A few years afterwards [A.D. 47], another general, named Ostorius Scapula, was sent to Britain; he was a brave and able soldier, and obtained many successes. The Britons chose one of their native kings, who was called CARACTACUS, to be their leader. He collected the Britons together, addressed them in eloquent and animating language, and determined, by one great effort, on driving away the enemies of his native land. The day of battle arrived, the two armies confronted each other, and the king, Caractacus, said to his warriors, "This day must decide the fate of Britain. The era of liberty or eternal bondage begins from this hour! Remember your brave ancestors, who drove the great Cæsar himself from these shores, and preserved their freedom, their property, and the persons and honour of their wives and children." After his brief address, Caractacus gave the word, and the rude islanders, rushing upon their foes, fought like lions. They had left their dear wives and children, and other members of their families—the women, the aged, and the infirm—hidden in thick forests, far from the field of battle; and the recollection of those loved ones gave a greater power to their strong brawny arms. But the contest was a very unequal one. The Britons had no breast-plates or helmets, and their copper swords soon bent before the well-tempered two-edged weapons of the Romans. They lost the battle; the wife and children of Caractacus were taken prisoners; and he, having escaped from the dreadful slaughter, was betrayed by his infamous step-mother Cartismandua, Queen of the Brigantes, who loaded him with chains, and gave him up to his enemies, who carried him and his family in great triumph to Rome. This event happened in the year A.D. 51.

When Caractacus was brought before the Emperor Claudius, the wife and family of the noble Briton knelt and wept for mercy; but he himself stood erect and stern; no misfortune could humble his great heart: he felt that he had done his duty, and calmly awaited his fate. It is much to the honour of the emperor that he was touched with pity for his princely captive, and he ordered Caractacus and his family to be set at liberty. It is not known whether they returned to their native land, or lived and died in Rome; but it was probably the latter; for Claudius did not want to have such a man for his enemy again.

But the Britons were not subdued yet: they rose again; attacked the Roman camp; slew a great number of its soldiers; and would have exterminated them, had not others arrived from Rome to their rescue. Thus affairs remained for some time; and the Emperor Nero, who succeeded Claudius, thought of taking away his army, and leaving Britain altogether. He had sent [A.D. 59] Paulinus Suetonius, a Roman general, to take the command; who, wishing to revive the spirit of his countrymen, attacked the island of Mona, which is now called Anglesea. The Britons considered it a very sacred place; for it was there that the chief Druids lived, and the most important ceremonies of their religion were performed. So they resolved upon a desperate resistance: women ran about among the warriors, dressed in a wild manner, their long hair streaming in the wind, while they uttered dreadful cries, and brandished flaming torches at their foes; and the Druids thundered forth curses upon the violators of their religion. For a time the Romans were terrified by this strange sight; but they soon rushed among the people, defeated them, and burnt the Druids in the very fires which they had prepared for the invaders.

This cruel act made the Britons hate the Romans still more; and something else soon after occurred which wrought them up to frenzy. BOADICEA was the widow of a native prince, and [illegible] his death th[illegible]man-endeavoured to deprive her of the land he had governed. She resisted this act of robbery, when Catus, a ruffianly Roman officer, caused her to be scourged, her husband's relations to be sold for slaves, and the daughters of the unhappy queen to be treated in a shameful and revolting manner. But Boadicea was a woman of an heroic spirit; she begged for the assistance of the neighbouring tribes; this was instantly given, and they resolved on a fearful and terrible revenge: they fell upon the Roman settlements—especially that of the Trinobantes—with ungovernable fury, and burnt, hanged, or crucified every one they met. London was sacked and plundered; and, in a few days, no less than 70,000 Romans were put to death. The wicked Catus, who was the cause of all this violence and murdering, escaped out of the country.—On hearing of these disasters, Suetonius, who had been absent, returned hurriedly to Britain with a fresh supply of soldiers; and a battle took place [A.D. 62], between him and Boadicea. Before it began, this brave woman mounted a war-chariot, placed her two injured daughters beside her, and, with her beautiful long yellow hair streaming nearly to her feet, rode from rank to rank, imploring the Britons to avenge her wrongs, and to liberate their country. They fought bravely, but lost the battle; and the wretched Boadicea, in despair, took poison, and died. The Romans then began murdering the people, and burning their houses in every direction, in return for the cruelties the Britons had so lately inflicted upon them; and a Roman writer says, that not less than 80,000 of these brave people were slaughtered. Still their spirit was not broken, and Suetonius was obliged to leave Britain unconquered.

The Romans could not live very long quietly in their own country. Vespasian sent a general, named Cerealis, here, A.D. 71; who was succeeded by Julius Frontinus; and they both maintained the reputation of the Roman arms. In A.D. 78, Julius Agricola arrived, who devoted seven years to the conquest of Britain, especially the northern part, now called Scotland. The Britons of the north, however, were no more disposed to yield than were the Britons of the south: they got together an army, under a chief or king named GALGACUS, and fought with great fury; but they were beaten; and then numbers of them having, with many bitter tears, tenderly kissed their dear wives and children, killed them, to prevent their being taken captive and sold for slaves by the Romans. Thirty years more passed away; and then, in the reign of the Emperor Adrian [A.D. 117—138], the Britons of the north rose against the Roman power, and most savage battles were continually occurring.

endless struggle, for they left the Britons alone till the reign of the Emperor Severus [A.D. 193—211], who led a great army into the north of Britain, where he cut roads through dense forests, drained marshes, and in many respects improved the country; but the natives, who were astonished at these operations, very prudently avoided him. Agricola, when he was in Britain, had made a long wall, or rather a great mound of earth, with a ditch beneath it, to keep the northern tribes from invading the Romans who were settled in the south of Britain. This wall was about seventy-four miles long, and reached nearly from sea to sea, beginning at Newcastle, and extending almost to Carlisle. Adrian had repaired and strengthened this great wall; but Severus built a new one, not of earth, but stone. It was twelve feet high and eight feet thick. On the north side he dug a ditch thirty-six feet wide and about fifteen feet deep. And along the wall he built eighty-one castles, and 300 turrets to contain soldiers to defend it. So long as the Romans had any power in Britain, they kept this line of castles and turrets filled with soldiers.

As soon, however, as Severus had finished this great boundary, the Caledonian tribes began to attack him, so he made a vow that he would destroy them altogether; but a still greater destroyer arrested him on his way, and he died at Eboracum, which is now called York [A.D. 211]. His son Caracella made peace with the Caledonians, ceded to them a large tract of land that they wanted, gave the Britons the same rights as Roman citizens, and then left the island. Seventy years of quiet followed his departure.

At the end of this period the Britons had to contend with new enemies, and their coasts were plundered by Scandinavian and Saxon pirates. The Romans sent CARAUSIUS, a brave and skilful seaman, who was either a Belgian or a Briton, to drive these sea-robbers away. He did this very successfully; built ships of war himself, and became so powerful that he was called Emperor of Britain and the coast of Gaul. Under his directions the Britons first learnt to fight at sea; but he met the fate which has overtaken so many other brave and enterprising men in barbarous times: he was murdered [A.D. 293] by Alertus, an officer whom he thought his friend; and who usurped the imperial title, retaining it till A.D. 296; when he was defeated by an army sent against him from Rome.

Other troubles came upon the Britons; a number of savage people who were then called Scots, came from Ireland in boats, and plundered those who lived upon the British coast; and the Picts, from Scotland, used to get over the great stone wall which Severus had built, and burn and plunder too. The Britons had lost a great deal of their former courage and energy; many interregnum, in A.D. 635, Oswald, the nephew of Edwin, succeeded to authority as the sixth Bretwalda. He was a good and powerful king, during whose reign churches and monasteries sprung up all over the north of England; and it is said that he made even the Picts and Scots acknowledge him as their lawful sovereign. He was engaged in a war with Penda, and fell in a battle with that sovereign, A.D. 644. His brother Oswy succeeded to the throne of Northumbria, and was elected Bretwalda. He continued the war with Mercia; and Penda fell in battle A.D. 655. He was a fierce and cruel king; ambitious and revengeful. Oswy rejoiced that Penda, who was the great enemy of the Christians, was dead, and he built twelve abbeys to show his gratitude to the priests who had prayed for his success.

Oswy died A.D. 670; and the dignity of Bretwelda remained for some time in abeyance. The seven kingdoms into which England had been divided, were concentrated into three, which were called Northumbria, Mercia, and Wessex; the other four kingdoms were not strong enough to keep themselves independent and separate from the rest. Then the king of these three divisions began quarrelling and fighting, each wanting to be king of the whole of the country. Sometimes one prevailed, and then another; but at last Wessex proved to be the strongest, and England was first made one undivided kingdom under the rule of Egbert, who had previously [from A.D. 800] been King of Wessex only. This union took place A.D. 827; just 378 years after the Saxons, Hengist and Horsa, had first landed in the country.

Egbert's life had been a very remarkable and romantic one. He was the fourth in descent from Ina, the twelfth and the best King of Wessex; and was thought to have a better title to the throne than Bertric, or Beorhtric, the fifth king after Ilda. Having excited the jealousy of Bertric, he was compelled to fly for safety to the court of Offa, King of Mercia. Bertric sent messengers to Offa, begging his daughter Eadburgha in marriage, and also the head of Egbert. Offa very honourably refused to murder his defenceless guest, but he willingly gave his daughter to Bertric; and though he would not murder Egbert, he would no longer protect him; and that prince, again obliged to fly for his life, went to France, where the Emperor Charlemagne received him very kindly. Eadburgha one day mixed a cup of poison, intending it for a young nobleman who was a favourite of her husband's; and who, in consequence, had become an object of her jealousy. By some accident, Bertric himself drank from the fatal goblet, as well as the unfortunate young nobleman for whom it was meant, and both of them died. The people discovered the crimes of this wicked murderess, and they rose in great confusion, and would have killed her; but she fled secretly out of the country, and took the veil in a foreign convent. The nuns, on becoming acquainted with her antecedents, were shocked and disgusted with her former conduct; and as she did not behave very well in the convent, they would not permit her to remain among them. Some years afterwards, a foreign woman, with a striking figure, and features that, though they were then sallow and haggard, seemed once to have been beautiful, used to beg about the streets of the city of Pavia, in Italy. It was Eadburgha, the expelled murderess, and late Queen of the West Saxons.

When Egbert heard of the death of the usurper Bertric, he hastened home to Wessex, and was immediately hailed as king: he was a man of great talents, and bravery, and had learnt a number of useful arts at the court of Charlemagne. He soon subdued the Kings of Mercia and Northumbria, and finally, as already stated, became the sole King of England.

CHAPTER IV.

THE INVASION OF ENGLAND BY THE DANES.—A.D. 783—940.

IN the last years of the Heptarchy, a new enemy appeared to disturb the peace of the country: a brave and savage people, called the Danes or Northmen, began to attack the coasts, and rob and murder the English who lived around them. Though usually called Danes, they came not only from Denmark, but also from Norway and Sweden, and other countries by the North and Baltic Seas. They were excellent sailors; and instead of fearing storms, they delighted in them. To die in battle, or to perish in a tempest, they thought equally honourable; and they assumed the proud title of VI-KINGS, or SEA-KINGS. Their religion was the same as that held by the ancient Saxons when they invaded England nearly 300 years before. Like them they believed in Odin and his wife Frea, and the rest of that fabulous family, but they were by no means particular about moral obligations, and paid so little attention to promises and oaths, that they came to be known in England as the "truce-breakers." They were, however, a very persevering people, skilful soldiers, and well armed. Some of them carried a tremendous mace, with which they could strike their enemies dead by a single blow; others had heavy double-bladed axes, which inflicted the most deadly and disfiguring wounds; and they all appear to have been able to shoot well with the bow—an accomplishment which had been neglected by the Anglo-Saxons.

The first hostile appearance of the Danes off the English coast was made A.D. 783; and in 787, they landed, and committed great devastations, near Purbeck, Dorsetshire. In 794, they made a descent on the coast of Northumberland, but were repulsed; and after several visits to the coast, and successful invasions of Scotland and Ireland, in 832 they landed on the Isle of Sheppey, where they burnt and plundered just as they pleased. They met with so little opposition that they determined on trying the same scheme on a much larger scale the next year, and accordingly they came to England with five-and-thirty ships. But Egbert was ready this time, and a desperate battle was fought between them. The Saxons were astonished at the reckless ferocity of the Danes, who, at last, retired to their ships; but neither party seem to have gained any advantage. After a great deal of skirmishing, Egbert fought a second great battle with the Danes, and beat them thoroughly, killing many thousands of them; but this was his last act of importance; and in the year 836 he died.

Egbert was succeeded by his son Ethelwolf, who reigned for twenty-one years [A.D. 836—857]; but although [A.D. 833] he won a great victory over the Danes, he was not a very able king, and the country was again divided into separate monarchies. He had four sons who outlived him—Ethelbald, Ethelbert, Ethelred, and Alfred, who afterwards came to be known as the famous Alfred the Great. Ethelbald, the eldest, rebelled against his father, who, not liking to fight against his own son, made him king of all the western part of the country. It is very likely that this cruel conduct broke his father's heart, for the old king died not very long afterwards, and the unnatural Ethelbald succeeded to the whole of the kingdom. But he did not long enjoy what he had so wickedly gained; he died A.D. 860, and was laid in the grave by the side of his injured father.

Ethelbert, the second brother, then became king; but he too had but a short reign, during which he was occupied in fighting with the Danes, who worried him and his people incessantly. He was succeeded [A.D. 866] by his brother Ethelred, who fought no less than nine severe battles against the Danes in one year; and so many people were killed that it seemed as if England would become one great burial-ground. After reigning more than five years, Ethelred was killed also; and, in the year 872, the troublesome and almost worthless crown of England descended to Alfred, though Ethelbert, his brother, had children living; but they were very young, and no one thought of placing an infant on the throne in that stormy period.

ALFRED was only three-and-twenty years of age when he became king; and before he had been a month upon the throne, he was forced to go to battle against the troublesome and restless Danes. These terrible invaders had overrun and desolated a great part of the country; and ruined fields, smoking cottages, and disfigured corpses, marked their course wherever they went. But Alfred had a bold heart and a wise head, and had been bred up among battles; and although he was not very successful in his first engagement with the Danes, yet he fought so well, that they were glad to conclude a peace with him: but they still went on plundering those parts of the country over which he had little authority.

It has been already stated that the Danes were brave and excellent sailors, and so the Saxons had been many years before, when their ancestors invaded England; but they had gradually neglected navigation, until it had almost perished among them. Alfred saw the advantage of a naval force in encountering such enemies as the Danes; and he immediately set to work to build ships, to prevent the landing of his foes. His first fleet was small enough, and not manned by the best and most experienced of sailors; but the crews had stout Saxon hearts, and a confidence in their wise young king; so they manfully attacked seven Danish ships, and having taken one of them, put the rest to flight. Then the Danes again wished for peace, and swore by their golden bracelets, and, as Alfred wished it, by the bones of some Christian saints, that they would live quietly, and not attack him again; but they broke their oaths the very next night.

Alfred having, after great exertions, again defeated them, made peace with Guthrun, their king, and gave them some land to settle in, on condition that they would live quietly, and defend the country against marauders. But before this arrangement was concluded, in A.D. 877, another great army of Danes landed. The Saxons were defeated, and submitted in despair, and Alfred was himself compelled to fly to save his life. For some months in the year 878, he disguised himself like a peasant, and lived in a sort of island in Somersetshire, surrounded by swamps, and the little rivers called Thone and Parret. At length he strayed to the cabin of a swineherd, and begged for shelter: the swineherd, though poor, was a kind sort of man, and he let Alfred remain there for some time. Tradition tells us that one day the swineherd's wife had been making some bread, and she set the disguised king to watch the loaves while they were baking, and see that they did not burn. Alfred promised to attend to them; but his mind was full of the wrongs of his unhappy people, and he occupied himself in thinking of them, and in preparing his bow and arrows against the time when he hoped again to meet their enemies on the battle-field. Thus engaged he quite forgot the bread-cakes, and at last they began to burn. At this moment the swineherd's wife came in, and rebuked him for his negligence. "You man," said she, "you will not turn the bread you see burning; but you will be glad enough to eat it." The poor woman little guessed that she was rating her noble and suffering king, who, when he again resumed his royal dignity, had the man educated by whom he was so hospitably sheltered; and he was ultimately ordained, and became Bishop of Winchester.

The Saxons found that they fared no better by submitting to the Danes than they did by fighting against them; so they once again took heart, and the men of Somersetshire, Wiltshire, and other counties, gathered an army, and attacked Hubba, a Danish chief of great renown, just as he landed in Devonshire. Hubba, and some hundreds of his followers, were killed; and the Saxons captured the famous banner of the Danes. This banner they believed to be enchanted: it had been woven in one morning by three sisters, who accompanied their work by a number of magical incantations: a large raven was displayed upon it, which was said to spread its wings in the time of victory, but drooped them when defeat overtook its masters.

Alfred thought the time had now come for him again to appear among his subjects, and to take the field against the Danes; but, like a prudent general, he determined first to see the number and condition of the army which Guthrun kept together. He put on a new disguise, and went to the camp of the Danes in the dress of a harper. Delighted by his songs, and his assumed mirth, they let him wander about from tent to tent; and the Saxon monarch, having learnt a good deal of their future plans, retired in safety. He then sent secret messengers to many of his subjects to meet together in arms at Egbert's-stone, near Selwood Forest. At the appointed day a considerable army assembled, and suddenly Alfred reappeared among them. The people were delighted; they thought that he was dead, for he had been absent several months; but now that they saw him again their spirits rose to enthusiasm. In this mood he led them against the Danes, whom they soon defeated with very great slaughter. Guthrun, and the rest of his army, took refuge in a fortified camp; but Alfred besieged them there, and they were compelled to submit, or be starved. The generous conqueror not only gave them their lives, but also a large tract of land to settle on; only exacting the conditions that they would become Christians, and live like quiet, peaceable people. This noble conduct quite won the admiration of Guthrun, who consented to be baptised [A.D. 878], receiving the name of Athelstane, and remained afterwards the friend and ally of his victor. Alfred stood godfather to him, and made him some valuable presents. The Danes that were his followers gave up their old thievish habits, tilled the ground, and for a time lived like honest men.

For a few years there was peace in England, and those years Alfred spent in improving his navy, in rebuilding ruined towns, and in forming a kind of militia all over the country. People sowed and reaped in safety; battle-fields became corn-fields: and the sun shone upon rich golden sheaves and happy peasants, instead of glittering axes and blood-stained men. But fresh hordes of Danes made their appearance; and in the year 893, an immense fleet landed its countless troops of robbers on the coast of Kent, while eighty ships, under the command of a fierce chief, called Hasting, sailed up the river Thames as far as Milton. Alfred was soon ready; he drove them to seek refuge within a fortified camp; and when any straggling parties ventured out to seek provisions and plunder the country, they were generally killed by the Saxons, who were on the watch for them; so, in a short time, they were in danger of dying by starvation. Instead of eating up the fat English oxen, as they had expected to do, they were obliged to kill and eat their own horses; and Alfred would have soon driven them out of the country, but that they were assisted by the treacherous Danes, to whom he had, a few years before, given so much land, on condition of their living quietly. Guthrun was dead, but his followers joined the invaders, took to their old thievish ways, and became as great a pestilence as ever. As no amount of kindness could make these people grateful, Alfred thought he would try what a little severity would do; so when his fleet had captured two ships, that were filled with those Danes who had revolted from his government, he ordered them all to be instantly hanged. Some writers have blamed him for this; but in that age, and with such a people, it was necessary to make a terrible example, to deter them from future outrages and violations of faith. Life ought not to be recklessly sacrificed, for it is a sacred gift which God alone can bestow; but with such barbarous enemies it was impossible not to shed blood; and Alfred was justified in destroying these robbers, that his peaceable subjects might be preserved. It was three years before Hasting and his army were driven out of the land; but they were expelled at last, leaving the dead bodies of many thousands of their countrymen to be the prey of birds and beasts. The old black raven on their banner began now to droop its wings in good earnest.

Quiet was again restored in England, but the health of its hero-king was fast failing; he was attacked by a mysterious disease, which baffled the skill of all his doctors, and caused him great suffering. But he bore it with a noble patience, and spent his time in arranging plans for the improvement and happiness of his people. He had always been fond of reading and poetry; but there were few books in the Saxon language; so he wrote a letter to the most learned of his bishops, recommending them to translate good and useful books from the Latin language, and to teach the English youths how to read them. For he said, "They cannot profit in any pursuit until they are able to read English." But Alfred was not contented with recommending other people to do useful things; he set an example himself, and translated many books into the Saxon language. Amongst these were Æsop's fables from the original Greek, and historical works from the Latin; besides which, he wrote many moral stories and proverbs himself. But printing was not invented until very long after Alfred's time; so books could only be multiplied by copying them: this was a work of very great labour; and the progress of learning was, in consequence, very slow indeed. Eight hours out of every twenty-four King Alfred set apart for sleep and refreshment, eight more to the duties of government, and the remaining eight to study and devotion. But there were no clocks in England; so Alfred invented a very curious means of measuring time. He had a number of candles made of exactly the same size and weight; each of these candles had several notches placed at regular distances. As it took about half-an-hour to burn from one notch to the next, and the candles were always kept burning, he could tell what hour it was by observing how much of his candle had been consumed. But the draughts of wind which blew into the room made the candles burn in an irregular manner, and this introduced errors into the calculations of the ingenious monarch. However, there is nothing like difficulty for sharpening the mind; and the old saying, that necessity is the mother of invention, proved true in this case. After reflecting for some time, Alfred made a sort of lantern of transparent pieces of horn, and by this means shaded his candles from the wind, and caused them to be records of the silent and ceaseless progress of time.

Alfred then turned his attention to reforming the laws, and placing justice within the reach of the poorest and most feeble in the land; and when any man appealed against the decision of the judges, he would hear the case and decide upon it himself. Towards wicked judges and magistrates, who sold justice and decided wrongfully, he was very severe; and in one year he put forty-four of them to death. Careless or ignorant ones he dismissed, and told them to learn and do their duties better for the future. He punished robbers so severely, and protected property so well, that it was said that golden bracelets and jewels might have been hung upon the trees by the highway, and no one would dare to take them. He had a survey made of the country, and built strong castles at such places where the enemy were most likely to land; he invited learned men to his court, and sent others into different countries to become acquainted with their arts and customs. In all things this wise, heroic, and benevolent king deserved the title which was bestowed upon him, of ALFRED THE GREAT; and for nine centuries succeeding generations have repeated his praises and honoured his memory. It was in the month of October, when the dead and yellow leaves were fast dropping from the trees, that this royal reformer, worn out by the pain he suffered from his strange disease, breathed his last amidst the tears of his friends and the sorrows of a nation. He died on the 25th of that month, in the year 901, at the age of fifty-three, and was buried at Winchester, leaving three sons and three daughters.

This wise and good king introduced more generally that mode of administering justice in England which is called trial by jury. He did not, however, originate it; as during the Heptarchy we read of "six Welshmen and six Anglo-Saxon freemen being appointed to try causes between the English and Welsh men of property, and made responsible, with their whole estates, real and personal, for false verdicts" [Lambarde's Archaionomia; a treatise on the ancient law of England]. It was long, however, before trial by jury superseded trial by ordeal. This was an appeal to the divine justice of God: the person who was accused of a crime might claim this trial; which being granted, he thrust his arm into a cauldron of boiling water, or carried a red-hot iron in his hand for nine paces; if he was not burnt by the water or the iron, it was supposed that the Almighty had interfered to save a guiltless man, and he was declared to be innocent; but if the contrary, he was pronounced guilty, and given over to punishment. There were other modes of conducting the trial by ordeal: sometimes the accused was to walk, blindfold, over red-hot ploughshares, placed on the ground at unequal distances; sometimes two pieces of wood, on one of which was marked the figure of the cross, were placed under a covering; if the accused drew the piece on which the cross was engraved, he was pronounced innocent; if the other, guilty. There was still another ordeal called the cornsed: it was a piece of bread which had been consecrated, and was then given to the supposed criminal to eat; if he could not swallow it, or turned pale and trembled, he was condemned; but if he ate it readily and cheerfully, he was liberated. No sensible man can believe in such presumptuous appeals to Divine Providence; though they were frequently made: and it is supposed that justice was, by that means, often evaded; as the monks who conducted these ceremonies are said to have anointed the hands or feet of those whom they wished to save with a preparation which is now understood by chemists, and prevents heated iron from injuring the naked flesh. The cornsed also has been supposed to have contained a mixture of drugs extremely repulsive to the taste, and sometimes even poisonous. This was given to the culprit, unless it was wished he should escape, then a piece of unadulterated bread was handed him.

Alfred's eldest son died without issue, before his father; and his second son EDWARD, the first of that name who reigned in England, succeeded him on the throne. His succession was disputed by Ethelward, his cousin, a son of Alfred's elder brother Ethelbert. He soon had numerous followers; and that part of the country where the Danes had settled, which was called the Danelagh, hailed him for its king. But although Edward had not the great and varied talents of his father Alfred, he was brave and skilful in war; he fought a great battle with his cousin, and left him lying dead upon the field. Some years afterwards he gained a great victory over the Danes, who thought, now that the wise Alfred was dead, they could plunder and burn as they pleased; but the sight of some thousands of their companions, cold and stiff, with their blood-bespattered and disfigured faces turned upward to the clear blue sky, convinced them that they were mistaken upon that point. Edward reigned four-and-twenty years, and then died [A.D. 925], leaving the sovereignty to his son Athelstane.

ATHELSTANE was worthy to be a grandson of the great King Alfred; he governed wisely, and defended the land in a skilful and powerful manner. During his reign the Danes again invaded England; their army filled 620 ships, a power greater than they had ever brought at one time before. But Athelstane defeated this immense army, killing such great numbers of them that the rest fled in terror, and did not appear again during his reign. He also defeated the Welsh, and imposed a tribute upon them. He was the first who called himself "King of the ENGLISH;" for even Alfred, though the ruler of the whole land, only bore the modest title of King of the West Saxons. Athelstane reformed the laws, was very regardful of the poor, liberal to learned men, and a great admirer of the BIBLE, which he was anxious to have translated into the language of his people. He died on the 17th of October, 940, and with him perished the glory of the house of Alfred. The next six kings were connected with him by blood, but not by genius; and when they quitted the scene, the line of Saxon monarchs was for a time extinguished.

CHAPTER V.

THE SIX BOY-KINGS, AND THE FINAL CONQUEST OF ENGLAND BY THE DANES.—A.D. 940—1013.

THELSTANE was succeeded by his brother EDMUND, who was scarcely eighteen years old; he was called the first of the boy-kings, because he was the first of six princes who became king, one after another, while they were very young. He was brave, and had so great a taste for elegance and improvement, that his courtiers named him "the Magnificent;" but he had more cruelty than either courage or good taste; and like a savage, he barbarously put out the eyes of two princes whose father had rebelled against him. Shortly afterwards he went to Gloucester to attend a festival which was given in memory of Saint Augustine; and while drinking with his nobles and officers, he saw a notorious robber, named Leof, among the guests. This man the king had condemned to punishment for his crime; and when he beheld him sitting placidly at the table in defiance of his sentence, his eyes flashed with anger, and in a loud tone he commanded Leof to retire. But the robber, who was a bold villain, would not stir; and Edmund, half-mad with passion, rushed upon him, and twining his hand in the long hair of Leof, endeavoured to throw him down. But this desperate ruffian drew a dagger, and in the struggle stabbed the king: thus a Christian celebration was turned into a scene of drunkenness and murder. All was confusion in an instant; the soldiers rushed to the assistance of their sovereign, but it was too late; and as they could not save, they determined to avenge him; so they fell upon Leof and cut him to pieces, but not before this reckless man had killed several of his assailants. Edmund had only been king for six years.

EDRED, his brother, was the next who wore the crown; he was in his twenty-third year, the age at which his illustrious grandfather, Alfred, had assumed the regal power. Though young in years he was old in constitution, for he was afflicted by a terrible disease, and very feeble in his legs, and some say equally feeble in his mind, though, as other writers contradict this, we must be contented to remain in uncertainty upon that point. He showed no incapability in governing the country; but his apparent talent in this respect has been attributed to the counsels of DUNSTAN, the abbot of Glastonbury: of whom, as he was a strange and remarkable man, and connected with the history of the remainder of the boy-kings, a short account is given.

Dunstan was born in 915, of noble parents. He was a nephew of Aldhelm, the Archbishop of Canterbury; and as he had another uncle who was also a bishop, his parents thought that the best thing they could do for their son was to make a monk of him, in the hope that his uncles would advance him in the church. While a boy, instead of bounding about in the open air, gathering wild flowers in the woods, and sometimes bathing in the clear lazy streams which murmured pleasantly along between the grassy banks, he remained shut up at home, reading the doctrines, lives, and supposed miracles of the men who were deemed saints or holy men of the church.

This constant reading affected Dunstan's health and temper; and at length brought on a fever, in which he fancied saints and angels came to his bedside and talked to him; this, the result of delirium, he attributed to his great sanctity. When Dunstan grew up he was an excellent musician; he used to compose songs and sing them; he could paint and write very well; and what may seem odd now, he understood and practised the trade of a blacksmith; but that was not strange then, as all monks who were active and industrious learnt some useful craft. Dunstan was very ambitious to become famous; and being also both clever and cunning, he determined to try and establish his fame by working a miracle. So he went to the court of King Edred, and hanging his harp upon the wall, to the astonishment of every one, it began to play of itself. It was, no doubt, one of those instruments called Æolian harps, which, when placed in a certain position to allow the wind to blow upon them and vibrate the strings, emits very beautiful music. They are common enough now, but were unknown then; and it is very likely that Dunstan had found out the secret of making them, and wished to convince the king and courtiers that the harp was played upon by miraculous power. But things did not turn out as he expected; the courtiers were jealous of him, so they declared he was a sorcerer, and having bound him hand and foot, threw him into a marsh, and left him to die. But he managed to escape, and determined to try a miracle of another sort next time.

Near the church at Glastonbury he built a little cell, which was so small that he could scarcely stand up or lie down in it; and here he used to pray, and study, and work at his forge. One evening while he was thus employed, he said the devil came, and putting his head in at the little window, began to tempt him to do wicked things. Dunstan bore this for some time with patience, until at last the fiend became more urgent in his solicitations, when, taking his red-hot tongs from the glowing fire, Dunstan with them seized the tempter by the nose, who roared so loud that the whole neighbourhood echoed again. Ridiculous as this story is, it was believed by the people then; and the ambitious monk soon became noted for his exceeding piety. This was exactly what he wanted: his great reputation introduced him to the council of the king; and once in that position, he did pretty well as he pleased. But whether from the advice of Dunstan or not, Edred was fortunate in his government, the people were prosperous, and the Danes were defeated in several battles, and made to pay a heavy tribute. Edred died after a short reign of nine years, and left the throne to a son of his predecessor, Edmund.

EDWY [A.D. 955—958] is said to have been only fifteen when he was made king, though it is very probable that he was a few years older; for about that time he fell in love with a beautiful cousin of his, named Elgiva, and married her. The young king was a handsome, good-hearted, thoughtless lad, and would have been very happy with his pretty little wife, and very likely have done his best to make his people happy too; but he had offended Dunstan and the rest of the monks by marrying his cousin, which was against the regulations, and they determined to punish him accordingly. Dunstan was not long in finding a cause of quarrel with Edwy; morose, ill-conditioned people are seldom at a loss for that. The day the young king was crowned there was a great feast, and the bishops and nobles sat drinking a long while, a custom they were very much too fond of. But Edwy did not like all this coarse enjoyment, so he quietly left the hall, and went to sit and talk to his dear Elgiva and her mother. The company were offended at this, and Odo, the Archbishop of Canterbury, ordered some attendants to go and bring the king back: they did not like to act so rudely; but Dunstan started up, rushed without ceremony to the king's apartment, and after abusing the timid queen in a shameful manner, tore Edwy from her side, and pushed him by force back into the hall.

Edwy determined to avenge this insult; and as

Dunstan, who had been treasurer to the late king, was suspected of having taken money that did not belong to him, he summoned this proud priest to give an account of it. Dunstan does not seem to have been very pure in his office, for instead of rendering his account, he ran away and fled from the kingdom, and then the king pronounced a sentence of banishment against him. But Odo, the archbishop, got up an insurrection among the Danes, and set up Edwy's brother Edgar against him, declaring the latter king of the greatest part of the country. When this was done, Dunstan came back again from his exile. While things were going on in this way, some savage wretches, who appear to have been employed by the archbishop, seized the queen, and having burnt her in the face to destroy her beauty, sent her to Ireland and sold her for a slave.

The Irish people pitied her; cured her wounds, and then set her at liberty, when the poor girl immediately hastened into England to throw herself into the arms of her husband; but the grim archbishop was upon the watch. She was seized by some ruffians he had hired, who cut and mangled her in such a shocking manner, that in a few days she died in great agony at Gloucester. The unhappy Edwy only lived about a year after this dreadful occurrence; some say he died of a broken heart: this, though very likely, is not certain, and it is equally probable that he too was murdered by his ecclesiastical enemies.

Edwy's brother EDGAR, who had been opposed to him during his lifetime, was made king at his death, A.D. 958. Edgar also was only a boy of fifteen, and so for some time Dunstan governed the country as he liked; and in most things he governed very well, though he did not forget his own interest, for he made the young king create him Archbishop of Canterbury. Edgar was called the Peaceable, because during his reign there was no invasion from abroad, or disturbance at home; but he swept the British seas of pirates, and brought the Scotch and the Welsh, the chiefs of the Orkney Isles and the Isle of Man, and a considerable part of Ireland, to acknowledge his authority. In his private life he was exceedingly vicious and profligate. His court was crowded with worthless women; but he was not content with associating with the bad, unless he could also corrupt the good; and he sometimes made very dishonourable proposals to the daughters of his nobles. At one time he carried a beautiful nun, of noble family, away from her convent: at this Dunstan interfered, but not as he had done with Edwy. That unhappy young king was his enemy, but Edgar was his friend; or, to speak more correctly, his tool: so the troublesome archbishop merely condemned him not to wear his crown upon his head for seven years, and to fast for some time.

Edgar had heard of the great beauty of Elfrida, the daughter of the Earl of Devonshire; so he sent Athelwold, a favourite courtier, to see the lady, and bring him word if she was really so attractive as she had been represented. When Athelwold saw Elfrida, he was so dazzled by her beauty, that, forgetful of the trust reposed in him, he said nothing about his errand, and proposed to marry her himself. The lady consented; and Athelwold went back to the king, and told him that she was certainly rich, but not otherwise remarkable. The king, therefore, abandoned his purpose of marrying Elfrida; and soon after, the artful courtier begged his sovereign's permission to be allowed to solicit her hand for himself; her fortune, he said, would compensate him for the homely appearance of her person. This request was granted; but the king soon suspected the truth, and insisted on visiting the newly-married lady. The terrified courtier confessed to his wife the deception he had practised, and implored her to disguise her beauty by putting on an unbecoming dress and manner. This she promised to do; but she was an ambitious woman, and felt very angry in her heart with her husband for preventing her from becoming a queen; so she dressed herself in the most attractive manner, and completely captivated the heart of the wanton king. Athelwold was, shortly after this, found murdered in a wood, and it was suspected that the king himself was the assassin; for he very soon afterwards married the beautiful but treacherous widow. Edgar himself [A.D. 975] died at the early age of thirty-two, and the monks, who had profited very much by his government, declared that he was an excellent king. Indeed, one of them asserted, that Edgar was to the English what Romulus was to the Romans, Cyrus to the Persians, Alexander to the Macedonians, Arsaces to the Parthians, and Charlemagne to the French. It is to be regretted that the ecclesiastics of that age too often disgraced their sacred character by praising those who ministered to their ambition, however deserving of censure they might be.

In order to get rid of the wolves which infested England in the early part of his reign, Edgar consented to receive from the Welsh 300 wolves' heads per annum, instead of the tribute they had agreed to pay Athelstane. In consequence of this arrangement, such a slaughter of these animals took place before his death, that in a few years they were entirely extirpated. But there was another kind of wolves in England who were even more mischievous than their ravenous four-footed counterparts. These were wicked judges and magistrates, who sold justice, and decided in favour of those who offered the largest bribe. To the credit of Edgar it must be said, that he set vigorously to work to investigate these abuses, and to punish the delinquents. He travelled, every year, through some part of his country, to hear complaints against unjust judges; and every one of them convicted of giving a sentence contrary to the law, was to be fined 120s., if he did it from ignorance; but if with a knowledge that he was deciding unjustly, he was to be dismissed for ever from his office, and branded with shame.

On the death of Edgar, EDWARD, his son by his first wife, was proclaimed king as Edward II. He was only a boy of about fourteen or fifteen, and is commonly called Edward the Martyr, in allusion to the cruel fate he met with. Elfrida disputed his right, and wished to make her own son, Ethelred, who was not six years old, king instead; but Dunstan would not have it; and the archbishop was more powerful than the queen; so he had his way, and Edward was crowned. Dunstan, after this point was settled, again used his power to promote his own views in the church. He and his followers declared that priests and monks ought not to marry; while another large body of the clergy contended that they ought to be allowed to marry if they wished to do so. Upon this subject there had been a great deal of quarrelling; and as Dunstan found it very difficult to persuade the clergy that they should abandon the happiness of loving and being loved, whilst they battled hard for the privilege of cheerful homes, with smiling faces and bright-eyed laughing children in them, he resorted to his old tricks, and determined to try the effect of a miracle or two. A synod was held at Winchester, and the married priests argued that the sentence against them should be recalled; but when this was proposed, a voice came from a crucifix in the wall, and exclaimed, "Do it not! do it not! you have judged well, and you would do ill to change it." This was done by some clever scheme of Dunstan's; but he played them a far more artful and mischievous trick than that. At another synod, at Calne, the married priests argued very well, and the wily archbishop was getting the worst of it; so he assumed a very humble tone, and said, "I am growing old now, and you endeavour to overcome me. I am more disposed to silence than contention. I confess I am unwilling that you should vanquish me; and to Christ himself, as judge, I commit the cause of his church." No sooner had he said this, than the flooring of the room gave way—that is, all of it except where Dunstan and his friends sat; of course, he had taken good care of that. The priests who were opposed to him fell through, and were dreadfully hurt, and some of them crushed to death. The people thought that the hand of God was visible in this supposed miracle; and thus Dunstan contrived to overawe those whom he was unable to convince.

Whilst Dunstan was thus promoting his views, Elfrida was equally active in her endeavours to carry out her's. She won over many nobles to her cause, who wished to place her son Ethelred upon the throne, should any opportunity occur for doing so. Elfrida was determined that an opportunity should not long be wanting; and one day, when the young king was hunting in Dorsetshire, near Corfe Castle, he thought he should like to visit his mother-in-law and his half-brother. Without saying a word to his friends and attendants, he rode away alone to the castle. Elfrida came out to meet him, her still beautiful face all radiant with smiles, and in an apparently affectionate manner entreated him to come in. Edward thanked her, but declined doing so; his company, he said, would miss him; he would drink a cup of wine to her and his brother's health, and then ride back to his attendants. The wine was brought, and as the fated young monarch raised it to his lips, Elfrida gave a savage glance of her dark eyes towards a fellow who stood behind, and this ruffian instantly plunged a dagger into his sovereign's back. Edward struck his spurs into his horse's sides, and tried to ride back to his friends, but he was soon exhausted from the loss of blood, and falling from his saddle, was dragged along till he died, leaving a dark red trail through the rich long grass. He had reigned only four years.

So the boy ETHELRED, who was scarcely ten years old, was, in 979, proclaimed king; but the nobles and people were so disgusted with the conduct of his wicked mother, that they would not have permitted him to be crowned if they could have got any one else of the royal family instead. There was a young lady who was a natural daughter of the gay King Edgar's, but she had become a nun, and was so terrified by her brother's murder, and the sad fate which seemed to attend so many sovereigns, that when the nobles begged her to become their queen, she said, "Not for the whole world; I detest violence and murder; I will remain here, and pray to God to give his people better and more gentle hearts." Thus the nobles were compelled to permit the son of the murderess whom they hated to be their king.

Dunstan had grown old, and in consequence of his tricks and pretended sanctimony, was much reverenced by the people, who thought him a saint. He was always a sour-tempered man, but had at last become very stern and morose indeed. He hated the young king and his mother; and, in crowning him, uttered a gloomy prophecy, and said that woe and ruin lay in wait for the land. To make things worse, Ethelred obtained from his people the unfortunate name of "the Unready;" so that he seems to have been despised as well as disliked. At first, his mother ruled in his name, and directed public affairs as she thought fit. But when Ethelred got older, he would not permit this; so, as every one hated her, she was compelled to leave the court; and having no longer the power to do any great wickedness, she assumed a religious character, and built several monasteries to expiate her sins; the monks encouraging her, and telling her that if she built and endowed houses for the priests, those sins would be forgiven;—a vain promise; as we know that forgiveness of sins, which comes from God alone, is only to be obtained by sincere repentance, leading a new life, and faith in HIM who died to save such repentant sinners.

When Ethelred had been king nine years, Archbishop Dunstan died, A.D. 988. His reputation for holiness and sanctity, and the fame he acquired (without any grounds for it) for working miracles, caused him to be canonised after his death. With all his faults, Dunstan was an able statesman, and the weak, unready Ethelred soon had cause to regret his loss.

The Danes had not troubled England lately, as they had been occupied in plundering and fighting elsewhere; but Sweyn, the son of the Danish king, having quarrelled with his father, took to the sea, and turned his sails toward England. At first he came in 991, and plundered Southampton; then, sailing about, he landed sometimes in the south, sometimes in the north, burning and destroying, according to the custom of that barbarous people; and these depredations he continued for some years. At last Ethelred, instead of driving away the Danes at the point of the sword, adopted the cowardly course of buying their forbearance; and he gave them 10,000 pounds of silver to leave the country. The Danes took the money; but, as might be expected, these impudent robbers came again the next year for more; Olave, son of the King of Norway, then joining Sweyn. But Ethelred had been roused in the meantime by the complaints of his people, and had collected a large fleet to meet the Danes. The weak king, however, trusted the command of his ships to a traitor, Alfric, Duke of Mercia, who went over, with a great part of them, to the enemy. The Danes now (A.D. 993) demanded 16,000 pounds of silver as payment for mercy; and on their next invasion, 24,000 pounds, their price rising in proportion as the courage of the Saxons sank. To raise this money, the tax of Dane-gelt or Dane-geld was levied; which was an impost of 1s. upon every hide of land. Before the last payment was made, Olave, who had embraced the Christian religion, refused to fight against the English. Sweyn attacked the Norwegians, and Olave was killed. He was canonised by the pope; and several churches are dedicated to him. Ethelred soon after, in 1001, married Emma, sister to Richard II., Duke of Normandy, which alliance, he thought, would strengthen him against the Danes; but this foolish king behaved so ill to his wife, who, on account of her beauty, was called "The Flower of Normandy," that her complaints to her father caused him to be her husband's enemy rather than his friend.

The tyranny which the Danes exercised over the English became unbearable; and in the year 1002, one of those dreadful acts of vengeance took place which are sometimes perpetrated by a desperate and despairing people. The English kings had employed certain bands of Danes to assist in repelling the invasions of their countrymen; these men constantly robbed the people, treated them like slaves, and insulted their wives and daughters; and when any Danish pirates landed to ravage and plunder the country, these mercenary troops, instead of driving them away, welcomed and encouraged them. To get rid of this national curse, Ethelred resolved to massacre all the Danes in England: not only the insulting robber, but the peaceful settler—the unoffending women and the innocent babes—all were doomed to perish. He sent secretly to the cities, towns, and villages, charging the Saxons to rise in arms on the festival of St. Bride, November 13, and put all the Danes to death.

This dreadful order was strictly obeyed. Suddenly a great cry went through the land; the unarmed Danes fell in heaps; the streets and fields were soaked with blood, and the steam of the slaughter went reeking up to the calm blue sky. Even the sister of Sweyn, the King of Denmark, who was a Christian, and was married to an English earl, of English family, was compelled to witness the death of her husband and child, and was then murdered also, crying out, in her dying agony, that this savage act would soon meet its punishment by the ruin of the whole country.—And it deserved a severe retaliation, for it was a most unjustifiable deed. Ethelred should have encouraged the Danes to live peaceably, and have punished every outrage and robbery with inflexible severity, as the great Alfred had so successfully done before him, and not have involved the innocent with the guilty in one merciless and lawless destruction. Sweyn, the King of Denmark, swore he would have a terrible revenge. The Danes set eagerly to work, and built a new fleet expressly for the invasion of England. Their ships were remarkably large and gay; they were painted with bright colours, and had carved prows representing lions, dragons, bears, and bulls: Sweyn's ship was called "The Great Dragon." The prow was made like the head of an enormous serpent, while the gilded tail coiled over the poop. The army embarked [A.D. 1003] was very numerous; the troops were landed near Exeter, and marched through the country, making the people prepare feasts for them; and when they had ate and drank, they killed their entertainers and set fire to their houses. At last a Saxon army advanced to meet them; but, with great heedlessness, Ethelred placed Alfric, who had previously betrayed the fleet to the enemy, in command. He was soon killed; and Edric, Ethelred's son-in-law, was appointed to succeed him. He was more faithless than Alfric; and betrayed his country by permitting the Danes to retire to their ships with the immense plunder they had gathered. The next year they came again, and burnt so many corn-fields that a famine arose, which caused these destroyers to return to their ships, and abandon a land they had so terribly afflicted. Two years after, when the corn was again springing from the earth, and the Saxons slowly recovering from the effects of the last invasion, Sweyn and his army came once more, and rambled over the wretched country, burning and murdering in the old way. Ethelred then gave him £36,000 to depart; and the miserable people were harassed nearly as much by the king's tax-gatherers as they were by the savage incursions of their Danish enemies. After Sweyn was gone, a new tax was laid upon the people, and more money was wrung from them to build a great navy, to prevent the Danes from coming back. The navy was built, but the command of it was again given to traitors, who, like madmen, made war upon each other, and burnt and sunk many of their own ships: a storm arose and destroyed a great many more; and the unhappy Saxons saw their last hope utterly perish. As soon as the Danes heard of these misfortunes, they came again with another large army, and did a great deal of mischief for three years. By that time the spirit of the Saxons was entirely broken. Ethelred, his wife and children, fled for safety to Normandy; and in the year 1013, Sweyn, the Dane, was acknowledged King of England. Fortunately for the people he did not live to oppress them long, for six weeks afterwards he died suddenly, on the 3rd of February, 1014. The Saxons then invited back the feeble Ethelred, only begging that he would try and govern them better than before; but the Danes proclaimed Canute, the son of Sweyn, King of England, and the work of war, treachery, and murder began again. In the midst of this strife Ethelred died, on the 24th of April, 1016, worn out by disease and anxiety, after having misgoverned the country for five-and-thirty years. His death was the greatest benefit he had ever conferred upon the people; and if he had died when a little harmless babe in his cradle, it would have been still better for them.

The Saxons chose the natural son of Ethelred, EDMUND, for his successor; who was as brave as his father was timid, and after fighting five battles with Canute, proposed to settle their claims by single combat. He said, "it was a pity so many lives should be lost and perilled for their ambition;" but Canute was a slender man: and Edmund, who, on account of his great strength, was called Ironside, was tall and stalwart, so the Dane did not relish that plan, but proposed that they should divide England into two parts, and govern it between them. This Edmund agreed to; but about a month afterwards, on the 30th of November, 1016, he died in a very sudden and mysterious manner; and it was generally believed that he was murdered by his servants, who were suspected of having been employed for that wicked purpose by Canute.

CHAPTER VI.

ENGLAND DURING THE REIGNS OF CANUTE, HAROLD HAREFOOT, AND HARDICANUTE; THE THREE DANISH KINGS.—A.D. 1016—1041.

CANUTE had not much trouble in becoming king of the whole of England, for the Saxons were so weary of war that they were glad to submit to him. He said that he wished all past opposition to be forgotten, and he shook hands with the Saxon chiefs, and swore to be just and kind to them; but very soon after he caused many of them to be put to death or banished. This was a strange way of showing justice and kindness; but although Canute had a wise head, he had a very hard and savage heart. He took the two children of the brave Edmund Ironside, and because they had a better right to the crown than himself, wished to murder them; but being afraid to do that in England, he sent them to his half-brother, Olave, the King of Sweden, with directions to take their lives. But Olave pitied the royal disinherited orphans, and instead of killing them, sent them to the court of his relation, Stephen, the King of Hungary, who behaved very kindly to the children, and they were educated at his court.

There were two other princes that Canute wished to see in their coffins: these were Edward and Alfred, the sons of King Ethelred; who, with their mother Emma, had taken refuge at the court of her brother, Duke Richard of Normandy. Canute knew that the princes would be powerless against him unless they were aided by their uncle; so he won the duke over to his interest by proposing to marry his sister Emma, the widow of Ethelred, and mother of the princes whom he feared. The "Flower of Normandy" was delighted at the idea of becoming a queen again; and consented to marry the man who had worried her husband to death, and robbed her children of their inheritance. From that time Canute gave the English people little cause of complaint. Though he was very stern at first, yet, when he had put down all opposition, he became more gentle, and the people were happier and more prosperous under his reign than they had been for many years before. He was fond of poetry and music, and even wrote some ballads of his own, which greatly pleased his people, both Danes and Saxons; for both these races loved such amusements: and when they sang the king's songs as they rowed down the rivers and walked in the fields, they got gradually to be fond of the man who had written them.

Canute's father, Sweyn, used to turn from paganism to Christianity, and from Christianity back to paganism, just as it served his purpose; but Canute was sincere in his belief, at least according to the notions of those times, and as he grew older became very devout. Then his conscience was troubled on account of the many people he had caused to be killed in his early life; and to atone for his offences, he resolved [about A.D. 1027] to make a pilgrimage to Rome—a poor atonement for the many thousand Saxons whom he had sent, mangled and blood-stained, to their graves, or to the wives and fatherless children they had left behind. At Rome he obtained from Pope John XIX. certain privileges for English pilgrims, and a reduction of the fees which the pontiffs exacted from the prelates, when they invested them with the pall, the insignia of their sacred office. On his return to England, he rebuilt many churches which the Danes had destroyed: endowed convents and monasteries; and displayed his faith in other ways, in conformity with the doctrines and principles of the Romish church.

Soon after his return from Rome he went to Denmark; from whence he wrote a very sensible letter to the priests, nobles, and people of England. Among other things, he said, "I beg and command those unto whom I have entrusted the government, as they wish to preserve my good-will, and save their own souls, to do no injustice to rich or poor. Let those who are noble, and those who are not, equally obtain their rights, according to the laws, from which no deviation shall be allowed, either through fear of me, or through favour to the powerful, or for the purpose of supplying my treasury. I want no money raised by injustice." These commands, being merely the dictates of common honesty and justice, do not raise our admiration now, because it is everybody's duty to be honest and just; but such was the disorder and misery of the English in that remote time, and they had seen so many weak and tyrannical sovereigns, that to them an honest and just king was as welcome and wonderful a being as a beneficent angel from heaven.

The people were glad to see their king back in England, and he continued to rule them wisely and peacefully. One day, disgusted with the flattery of his courtiers, who told him that he was so great that everything was possible to him, he determined to read them a lesson. Sitting down by the sea-shore when the tide was rolling freshly in, he looked upon the vast waters, and said to them, "Ocean! the land on which I sit is mine, and thou art a part of my dominion, therefore rise not; obey my commands, nor presume to wet the edge of my robe." The sea paid no attention to this command, and wave after wave rolled on the stony beach, until the king was sitting with his feet in the water. Then he turned to his flatterers, and frowning sternly, said, "Confess ye now how frivolous and vain is the might of an earthly king compared to that Great Power who rules the elements, and can say unto the ocean, 'Thus far shalt thou go, and no farther.'" The humbled courtiers were silent; and the king added, that the lofty titles of Lord and Master were not due to man, however great his virtues or lofty his rank; but belonged only to him whom both the land and sea obey. It is said, also, that he took his glittering crown from his head, and determined never to wear it again, but ordered it to be placed on the top of the crucifix at Winchester. But for wise and simple, king and parasite, there is but one doom; and about six years after he came back from Rome, Canute entered that dark path from which no one ever returns. He died at Shaftesbury, in the year 1035, after having reigned eighteen years.

Canute had been King of Denmark and Sweden, as well as of England, and at his death he divided his kingdoms between his three sons—HAROLD was to have England, HARDICANUTE Denmark, and SWEYN Sweden. But the people were not so settled that they cared much for the will of a dead king; and Earl Godwin, the most powerful noble in the country, and the Saxons in the south of England, wished to have one of the sons of Ethelred, or else Hardicanute, for their sovereign. The nobles divided themselves into two great parties, and a civil war seemed certain; but they were wise enough to come to an arrangement without fighting, and it was settled that Hardicanute should be king of all the country south of the river Thames, and that Harold should rule over all the north of it. But although people were so ready to fight for Hardicanute's title to the crown, he did not himself care for it, but remained in Denmark, leading a free and easy life, constantly eating, drinking, and making merry. While this was going on, Edward, the eldest of Ethelred's sons, came from Normandy with a few ships, thinking that his mother Emma, the widow of Canute, would assist him to obtain the crown. But she appears to have had little love for her children by Ethelred, and instead of helping Edward, she did all she could against him, and he was glad to get back to Normandy, saying that he would never set foot in England again. Soon after his brother Alfred came over, induced to do so by a letter written to him by his mother. He brought with him 600 armed Normans; and this so excited the jealousy of Earl Godwin, who went to meet the young prince, that it is supposed he determined upon their destruction. Having taken them to Guildford, he lodged the Normans in small bodies at different parts of the town; and at night, when they were sound asleep, they were set upon by King Harold's soldiers, bound with ropes or chains, and hurried away. The next morning nearly all of them were savagely murdered. A worse fate remained for the unfortunate prince that led them; he was taken before Harold, who, having insulted his wretched victim, sent him to Ely to be tried by the Danes for disturbing the peace of the country. These unjust and cruel judges condemned him to have his eyes torn out, which was instantly done; he was then sent to the monastery of Ely, where, a few days after, he died in great misery. Some people think that Earl Godwin enticed the unfortunate prince over to England with the intention of betraying him to death. Whether he acted thus treacherously or not, he certainly deserted his cause after his arrival, and abandoned him to his enemy Harold.

HAROLD then made himself king of the whole of England; but Ethelnoth, the Saxon Archbishop of Canterbury, refused to crown him, and, laying the crown and sceptre upon the altar, said, "I will neither give them to thee, nor shall any bishop consecrate thee on the throne." So Harold put the crown upon his head himself, and wore it for four years, dying in the year 1040. No one seems to have cared much about him, and the only thing he was famous for was his fondness for hunting, and his dexterity in running after the game, which gained him the name of "Harold Harefoot;" though some historians have said this cognomen was bestowed upon him in consequence of his feet being covered with hair.

At the time of Harold's death HARDICANUTE was at Bruges, in Flanders, preparing to invade England; he had been urged to do so by his mother Emma, whom Harold had driven away from the court. The invasion was prevented by the English and Danish nobles waiting upon Hardicanute, and begging him to accept the crown, which he did. But the English soon repented of their choice, for he loaded them with taxes; and when the people of Worcester refused to pay them, he burnt that city to the ground. He professed to be very much shocked at the murder of his half-brother Alfred; and he ordered the body of King Harold to be exhumed from its grave and beheaded, and then both head and body to be thrown into the Thames. Not satisfied with this disgusting act of vengeance, he accused Earl Godwin of assisting in the murder; but that nobleman took an oath that he was innocent, and made Hardicanute a present of a noble ship, the figure-head of which was of gold: it contained eighty soldiers, all magnificently dressed, and remarkable for their manly appearance. Each of them had a battle-axe, ornamented with silver; a sword with a golden hilt, and a golden bracelet upon his arm: if the king was not satisfied with the oath, he was with the present, and so no more was said about the death of the prince. Hardicanute continued to be a confirmed glutton, and spent most of his time in feasting with the Danish chiefs by whom he was constantly surrounded; to be a great drunkard being a recommendation to the royal favour. At the marriage feast of one of his Danish thanes, the company sat drinking until a late hour, when the king rose to pledge them; but he was so intoxicated that he fell senseless with the wine-cup in his hand; and in spite of the efforts of his attendants to revive him, he expired. Thus perished, A.D. 1041, the last of the Danish kings in England. He had reigned scarcely two years.

CHAPTER VII.

EDWARD THE CONFESSOR; HAROLD THE SECOND; THE INVASION OF ENGLAND BY THE NORMANS.—A.D. 1041–1066.

THERE being no Danish prince in England to claim the crown, EDWARD, the only surviving son of the weak King Ethelred, was chosen; and the English people were delighted in having a Saxon king again. There was a good deal of opposition to him at first; but this was overcome by the rich and powerful Earl Godwin, who was a man of such great talents, that, from a poor friendless cow-boy, he had become the greatest and most loved of the English nobles. But Edward never liked the earl, and always suspected him of having caused the murder of his brother, Prince Arthur. Godwin was aware of the king's suspicions, and made it a condition of his assistance, that Edward should forget all past wrongs, give him some rich estates, and also marry his daughter Edith. This was agreed to; Edward was made king, and then married Edith, who was a good, cheerful, and beautiful girl; but he never loved her; and behaved to her in a very ungenerous and repulsive manner. He was an obstinate and unforgiving man; and had not forgotten that his mother Emma had acted ill to him and his brother Alfred, and much preferred the children she had by Canute; so he seized a great part of her property, and sent her, for the remainder of her life, to a monastery at Winchester.

In some respects, Edward was a good king. He reduced taxation, made many excellent laws, administered justice as well to the poor as the rich, and would have been very popular, but for his extreme fondness for the Normans. Having been brought up in the Norman court, where he had lived since he was thirteen years old, for nearly twenty-seven years, he had, when he returned to England, nearly forgotten his native Saxon language; and he surrounded himself with Norman favourites, giving them profitable places and pensions, which made his English subjects very jealous. But no one was more jealous than Earl Godwin and his six sons; and as the earl was also very angry with the king for treating his queen Edith so ill, he did all he could to make Edward disliked. At length, a haughty young foreign noble—Eustace, Count of Boulogne, who had married Edward's sister—came to the English court on a visit. On his return, he entered Dover with his train, all clad in armour, and they marched in an insolent manner through the town; and, without asking leave, chose the best houses in which to sup and sleep for the night. One of the Dover men would not submit to this; and, standing in his doorway, determined that no one should enter without his permission. A foreign soldier soon came swaggering up, and was about to push his way into the house, when the stout Englishman thrust him into the road: with an oath the Frenchman drew his sword, and wounded the Englishman; but the man of Dover was bold and resolute, and he killed the Frenchman on the spot. When Count Eustace heard this, he and his armed men broke into the Englishman's house, and murdered him by his own fireside. Then they rode through the streets, brandishing their swords, and galloping over defenceless women and children. This was too much to be borne; the Dover men armed, and attacked the ruffianly intruders; and, having killed nineteen of them, and wounded many more, Count Eustace and his followers made the best of their way out of Dover, with a great deal less bravado and insolence than they had entered it. The count instantly rode to Gloucester, and complained to the king; and Edward, believing all he said, sent a message to Earl Godwin, saying, "Go and punish the men of Dover for attacking my relation, and disturbing the peace of the country." "It ill becomes you," replied that patriotic noble, "to condemn, without a hearing, the men whom it is your duty to protect."

The king was exceedingly angry, and summoned the earl to appear before him and his Norman court, to answer for his own conduct. Godwin was too good a judge, however, to trust himself in their hands; for he well knew that the Normans hated him, and he declined going. The king then threatened to banish him and his family, and to confiscate their property. To prevent this, the great earl armed: the people said he did right; and they crowded to his standard in such numbers, that soon he was at the head of an immense army. Then Godwin marched to Gloucester, where the king was, and insisted that Count Eustace and his companions should be delivered up to punishment. This the king resolutely refused; and, managing to get a little time, he sent for two great nobles who were enemies of Godwin, and they came with a large army to the assistance of the king. But when these armies met, they said that it was wrong that Englishmen should be required to destroy each other for the sake of the Normans; and, like wise and noble fellows as they were, they refused to fight for such a cause, but shook hands with hearty good-will. Then the king and the earl contrived to make up their quarrel, and swore "God's peace, and full friendship for one another."

This professed friendship was very insincere on both sides, and the semblance of it was not long kept up by either party. The king [A.D. 1041] went on gathering troops; while those of Godwin, who had joined him out of a momentary excitement, gradually dwindled away, and went to their homes. Then the king again summoned the earl to appear before him, and to come without any escort at all. Godwin applied for securities, that he might come and go in safety; and this being refused, he would not obey the summons. Edward and his council, for his contumacy, pronounced a sentence of banishment against him and his sons; and the earl, fearing his life was not safe, embarked in the night, with his family, in a vessel well loaded with treasure, and sailed to Flanders. Edward was delighted at his triumph; but he lived to regret his injustice.

The king seized the estates and houses of the banished earl, and gave them all to his Norman favourites; and as if the ruin of the family was not sufficient, he vented his passion upon his beautiful and patient wife, who was Godwin's daughter. He took away her jewels, her money, and her attendants, and shut her up in the monastery of Wherwell, of which one of his sisters was lady abbess; and if she was as revengeful and mean-spirited as her brother, the poor queen must have led a sad life indeed. The monks praised Edward very much for this petty cruelty, and, under their direction, he became more sanctimonious and morose every day.

The Normans now flocked over to England in crowds, and the king welcomed them all, and provided for them at the expense of his English subjects. Not contented with this, in 1049 he invited William, the Duke of Normandy, to come and visit him—an invitation which that prince very gladly accepted. William was the son of Duke Robert of Normandy, and a poor girl, who was a tanner's daughter. The duke had seen her one day when he was returning home from the chase; she was washing clothes in a brook; and he was so struck with her great beauty, that he proposed for her to come and live with him. Her name is differently given—Arlete, Harlotta, or Herleva: they all come from an old Norman word, which means "the much loved"—a very appropriate name for a gentle and beautiful girl. Her son William grew up a fine bold man, of a courageous, high spirit; very fond of horse-riding and fighting, but proud, revengeful, and pitiless. In time, he became the Duke of Normandy; and his great natural talents won him the admiration of his people, and the respect of surrounding countries.

When Duke William came to England he was very kindly received by Edward; and it is supposed that the king thought of making his Norman cousin heir to the kingdom, and that, during this visit, he communicated his intention to him. Whether he really did so, no one can tell; but it is certain that, on William's return to Normandy, he began to aspire to the English crown. After this visit, the Normans who surrounded Edward grew more haughty than ever; and the jealousy of the English people toward them rose to absolute hatred. This was very well known to the banished Earl Godwin, who had his spies all over England; he knew, also, that the people looked upon him as a patriot, and longed for his return; so having collected a few ships with the remains of his treasure, in 1052 he sailed to England, and landed near Hastings. He was soon joined by his brave son, Harold, who had fled to Ireland, and brought with him, from that country, a little army to assist his father. The people were delighted at their arrival, and flocked to them in great numbers. The banished earl and his son sailed boldly up the Thames to London, without having to strike a single blow. The earl sent a message to the king, respectfully demanding his estates, and a repeal of his sentence; but Edward was obstinate and blind to the consequences, and he refused; and it was not until he found that his own soldiers loved the earl in their hearts, that he was compelled to submit. Then the Norman priests and courtiers, who had hated Godwin, and tried to ruin him, fled from the country to save their lives. Robert, the Norman Archbishop of Canterbury, and William, the Norman Bishop of London, were in such terror that they rode to the Essex coast, and getting into a crazy open fishing-boat, sailed to France in great danger. The witenagemote, as the parliament of that time was called, decided that the Normans were the cause of the late disturbances, and therefore they banished them all as outlaws. The earl had his large estates restored, and the king was obliged to call his wife, Edith, from the monastery, and give back her jewels, and let her sit by his side as queen; but he did not do it with a very good grace, and he hated her and her father worse than ever. The earl did not enjoy his triumph very long; he died [A.D. 1053] of a fit of apoplexy at Windsor, and Harold, his eldest son, who was a noble and accomplished young man, succeeded to his estates and title.

All the English people loved Harold, and even the king did not hate him so much as he had hated his father, Godwin; for Harold let him have back some of his Norman monks and favourites, and he also served him faithfully in the field, driving out his enemies, and establishing peace and order. The Welsh people had been very troublesome, frequently invading the borders of the country, and committing many robberies and murders. Harold proceeded against these desperate men, and struck such terror into them, that they seized their own king, Griffith, and having cut off his head, offered it as a token of submission. Harold sent the ghastly present to King Edward; and as the Welsh found that they could not rob and murder without being severely punished for doing so, they took to working for their bread instead of stealing it, and both they and their neighbours were greatly benefited by the change.

The old king, who was surrounded by his monks, and was himself more like a monk than a king, wished to go on a pilgrimage to Rome; and as he had no children, he was urged to appoint a successor. He would have liked to name his cousin William, the Duke of Normandy; but his people disliked the Normans so much that he had not the courage to do so, therefore he sent to the court of the German emperor, and invited over a son of Edmond Ironside, who was called Edward the Outlaw, and had been absent from England more than twenty years. This Saxon prince was glad enough to come, and the people welcomed him very heartily, for they had not forgotten his brave father; but the old king refused to see him, and shortly after his arrival, the prince died very suddenly [A.D. 1057]. It was thought he was poisoned, and some suspicion fell upon Harold, because he expected to become king himself upon Edward's death; but there is no other reason to suppose him guilty of such a murder; and he was, all his life, so brave and generous, that it is not at all likely he had anything to do with it. It might have been done by the orders of the jealous and ill-tempered old king, or by those of his cousin, the Duke of Normandy, who still hoped to succeed to the English throne; or indeed the prince might have died naturally, though it scarcely seems probable that he did.

The same year that Prince Edward died, another English noble of distinction went to his eternal resting-place. This was Leofric, Earl of Mercia, of whom a singular and very interesting story is told. It is not strictly authenticated, but rests upon as good an authority as exists for many other circumstances received as legitimate history. Leofric had laid an exorbitant tax upon the people of Coventry, who, it appears, were subject to him; this tax they were unable to pay, and they implored the earl to relieve them from it. This he had no intention of doing; but he answered, jestingly, that if they could persuade the Lady Godiva, his wife, to ride naked on horseback from one end of the town to the other, he would consent to remit the tax. The poor townsmen had no hope that a high-born and beautiful woman would perform so extraordinary an act, and they abandoned themselves to despair. But they were mistaken: they did not know the kind heart of that noble and heroic woman. She consented to do so, if every one would remain within doors, and not look at her from their windows; then, letting down her long, rich auburn hair, with no other covering than that afforded by this beautiful natural ornament, she rode through the town, and freed the people from her husband's oppressive edict. One man, it is added, was ungenerous enough to look out of a window; but he was punished for his insolence with death. In commemoration of this event, there long was, and probably now is, a picture of Earl Leofric and his kind-hearted lady, in a window of Trinity Church, at Coventry, and beneath it this inscription:—

"I Luric, for the love of thee,
Do set Coventry toll-free."

About this time Harold crossed the sea to Normandy, to obtain the liberty of his brother Wulnot, and his nephew Haco, who had been given by his father to King Edward as hostages, and been sent by the king to Duke William for security. Unfortunately he was wrecked upon the territory of Guy, the Count of Ponthieu, who, instead of assisting him in his distressed situation, made him a prisoner in the castle of Belram, intending to keep him there until he should pay a ransom for his release. Harold was very angry at such shameful and cruel treatment, and contrived to send word of his situation to William, the Duke of Normandy, who obtained him his liberty; but not until he had paid a large sum of money to Guy, who sold his brave captive just the same as if he had been a horse or a sheep. When William had Harold at his court he was very polite to him; but he took care not to let him go until he extorted a promise that he should marry his daughter Adela, and help him to obtain the English crown when Edward died. Harold expected to succeed to the throne himself, therefore he was much perplexed; but he knew he was entirely in the power of the Norman duke, and he was obliged to make the promise. But William was not satisfied with that; he desired to bind Harold by an oath. A Bible was brought and placed upon a table covered with cloth of gold. When Harold had sworn, the cloth was removed, and under it was a tub full of the bones and relics of dead saints, which, according to the superstition of those times, made the oath more sacred and binding. The vow that Harold had been obliged to take to save his life and obtain his liberty, was afterwards broken by him.

In less than a year after Harold's return to England —on the 5th of January, 1066—King Edward, who was then in his sixty-fifth year, and almost childish, died. In his last moments he wandered a great deal in his mind, repeating threatening passages from the Bible, and saying that a terrible judgment was hanging over the Saxon people. As he had yielded in everything to the priests, and been very liberal to them, they returned the compliment by making a saint of him; and, a century after his death, he was canonised, by Pope Alexander III., as Edward the Confessor. The priests had so far worked on the mind of the superstitious king, that they persuaded him he was devout enough to work miracles himself; and one old writer goes so far as to assert, that he did restore sight to five or six blind men. He used, also, to touch poor people who were afflicted with a disease called the king's evil, in the belief that his touch, like that of the divine Jesus, would effect a cure—a custom which continued to be practised by English sovereigns up to the time of Queen Anne. In spite of his obstinacy and sour monastic temper, Edward loved peace and order, and would not consent to oppress his people with heavy taxes. One day his courtiers showed him a great heap of gold and silver which had been collected, supposing it would give him pleasure to behold so much wealth; but the thought of the poor people from whom it had been wrung so affected him, that he fancied he saw the devil dancing joyfully about it, and ordered the whole to be returned to those from whom it had been taken.

As soon as Edward was buried, Harold caused himself to be proclaimed king; and, a few hours after, he was solemnly crowned, in the presence of a great concourse of priest and nobles. He was already popular with the people, but he did everything he could to bind them more closely to him. He was liberal and courteous, reduced the taxes, and yet set to work to improve the country, and defend it against its enemies. But the Duke of Normandy soon heard of the death of Edward. He was out hunting at the time: he put away his bow and arrows, hurried home to his palace, and sitting down, remained silent for a long while. Soon after, however, he sent ambassadors to England, to remind Harold of his oath, and to require him to fulfil it. Harold replied, "It is true that I made an oath to William; but I made it under the influence of force. I promised what did not belong to me, and engaged to do what I never could do; for my royalty does not belong to me, nor can I dispose of it without the consent of my country."

This answer threw William into a terrible passion. He called Harold an infamous oath-breaker, and said he would come over and wrest the crown from him by force. He got together a great army of Normans, and invited free-lances and fighting-men from every country round to assist him in the invasion of England. For months he had workmen employed in building ships and forging armour, and swords, and arrows; and at length he collected an enormous fleet, consisting of nearly 3,000 ships, of which 700 are said to have been very large ones, though, of course, nothing in comparison with the great war-ships of the present day. Besides these ships, he had an army of 60,000 men; and he was so elated at the martial appearance of this great force, that he considered the conquest of England as certain. What added still more to his confidence was, that the pope, Alexander II., blessed the expedition, and sent him a consecrated banner and a ring, said to contain one of the hairs of St. Peter; and thousands of ignorant, superstitious people thought, that, under such circumstances, it was not only a proper, but a very religious thing, to go and murder the English.

The first attack on Harold was made by his own brother, Tosti, who was a treacherous and cruel man. He had been placed as governor over that part of England called Northumbria, and had behaved so badly, that the people rose in rebellion, and drove him away. As Harold would not compel the Northumbrians to submit to his tyranny, Tosti had fled to Flanders, vowing hate and vengeance. William gave the traitor a few ships, with which, in the spring of 1066, he came and attacked the shores of his native country. Although he did a great deal of mischief, he was soon beaten off by the Earls Morcar and Edwin, grandsons of Leofric. Then he sailed to Norway, and begged Harold Hardrada, the king of that country, to help him against England. The kings of those times were generally ready for mischief; so Hardrada collected a considerable fleet, and, in the following summer, in company with Tosti, made a descent on the Yorkshire coast, near Scarborough. That place was taken and burned; and the invaders advanced to York. At Fulford, near that city, they were met by an army under the command of the Earls Morcar and Edwin, who, after a desperate fight, were shut up in York. Harold had been engaged watching for the arrival of William from Normandy; but as soon as he heard of the defeat of Morcar and Edwin, he marched down to York with his army, very much to the surprise of the enemy, who by no means expected him so soon. He found the invaders encamped at Stamford Bridge, near that city; and preparations were immediately made for battle. As Hardrada was getting his army into order, his horse stumbled and threw him. Harold, seeing this accident, inquired, "Who is that chief in the sky-blue mantle and the splendid helmet, who has just fallen from his horse?" He was told it was the King of Norway. "He is a fine powerful-looking man," returned Harold; "but I augur that fortune has forsaken him."

Before the engagement, Harold, who was averse to fight against his brother, false and worthless as he was, sent twenty horsemen to offer him the whole of Northumbria, or even a third of England, if he would lay down his arms, and live with him in peace. "And what territory," said Tosti, "will Harold give to my ally, Hardrada, the King of Norway?" "Seven feet of English ground for a grave," was the bold answer; "or a little more, seeing that Hardrada is taller than most men." "Ride back, ride back," said Tosti, "and bid King Harold make ready for the fight; for I will not forsake my friend."

The battle began at an early hour on the 5th of October, and a fierce and savage one it was; the brave Harold was the conqueror; and the traitor Tosti, and the tall Norwegian king, with nearly all his hardy captains, and some thousands of his soldiers, were left dead upon the field. Even the ships of the Norwegians were taken by Harold; but this generous man gave Olave, the son of the dead King Hardrada, twenty-four of them, and sent him back to Norway with all his soldiers that were left alive, only making them promise that they would never invade England again.

Three days after this victory, William of Normandy landed his great army near Hastings: Harold was feasting at York when he heard the news; but he marched to London with wonderful rapidity, where, in a week, he got his army into order, for it had been terribly shaken in the late battle, and then he marched towards Hastings to meet the invaders. He halted at a place which was then named Senlac, but which has ever since been called Battle, in memory of the great conflict which took place there. One day was spent in negotiations, but these led to nothing; and on the next day—Saturday, the 14th of October, 1066—the great struggle took place.

With the first dawn of morning the two armies were in readiness; Harold stood beneath his standard, which floated proudly in the air; and his noble figure, cased in bright armour, reflected the yet faint rays of the rising sun. Beside him were his two brothers, Gurth and Leofwin, and a band of the bravest nobles and chiefs of England. The Norman army was divided into three great columns, one of which was led by William himself; he rode on a spirited Spanish horse, and wore round his neck some of those saintly relics upon which Harold had sworn. Before his army rode a gigantic Norman, who sang gaily, in defiance of the English; and, throwing his sword frequently into the air with one hand, caught it with the other. An English knight rode out from the ranks to meet the arrogant giant, but the Norman ran him through the body; a second rode forward, and was felled to the earth; but a third knight went, trembling for the honour of his country, and striking at the Norman with his battle-axe, laid him dead at his feet. Then the Normans raised a great shout of, "Dieu aide! Dieu aide!" to which the English replied by another shout of, "Christ's rood!—the holy rood!" and the air was darkened by the flight of arrows, and rang with the stroke of battle-axes on the broad metal shields. The English foot-soldiers stood firm as a rock, and repelled the Norman horsemen, driving great numbers of them into a deep trench, artfully covered over with withered branches and grass, where they perished miserably. Then the Normans began to waver; and many said the duke was killed; but William tore off his helmet, that they might see his face, and rode like a madman through his army, shouting, "Here I am! look at me! I am still alive; and I will conquer by God's help."

Thus encouraged, the Normans charged again, and the wild roar of battle rose to the clouds; the dust was laid with streams of blood; and the trodden-down grass was no longer green, but red. Still the English stood firm; and their foes shrank in terror from the dreadful blows of their ponderous axes, which no armour could resist. "Shoot upwards," cried William to his archers; "shoot into the air, and let the arrows fall upon their faces!" This order was at once obeyed; and showers of arrows fell like hail upon the English, blinding and confusing them; yet, smarting in agony, they still fought like madmen. Then William and his horsemen pretended to retreat; the furious English followed them, when suddenly the horsemen turned round, the English fell into disorder, and were killed in great numbers. Three times was this stratagem repeated, and three times did it succeed. At length, Harold, who had fought all day like a lion, was shot in the left eye by an arrow: it pierced his brain, and the heroic Saxon fell dead upon the field. His nine months of kingship was purchased by an early and painful, though most glorious, death. The English now gave way, though they still fought for a time around their standard; and Harold's brothers, Gurth and Leofwin, were killed in defending it; but at length it was taken, and the consecrated banner of the Normans floated proudly in its place. The English then gave up in despair, and fled into the woods, the battle having lasted nine hours.

The sun set upon that field of blood; the roar of battle was succeeded by a solemn silence, broken only by the feeble wail of some wounded soldier dying in agony and solitude. Here and there gleamed the red torches of those who searched for some slaughtered friend; and, in the sad homes of England, thousands of newly-made widows wept for the death of those they had loved; and little orphans gazed in frightened wonder at a sorrow they did not yet understand. But William of Normandy sat in his tent carousing with his chiefs, and rejoicing in the fall of a nation's liberty.

CHAPTER VIII.

THE REIGN OF WILLIAM THE FIRST, CALLED THE CONQUEROR.—A.D. 1066—1087.

HE Norman duke was so delighted with the great victory he had gained over the English, that he had a magnificent abbey erected on the spot, and called it Battle Abbey. When the building was just begun, it was discovered that there was a scarcity of water in that place, and it was suggested to William that a more favourable spot should be chosen. "Work on! work on!" said he; "if God gives me life, there shall be more wine for the monks of the abbey to drink than there is now clear water in the best convent in Christendom."

Though William had won the victory at Hastings, he soon discovered that he had not conquered the country; and a portion of his fleet which arrived afterwards, and landed by mistake at Romney, was attacked by the indignant people, and the marines and soldiers nearly all put to death. On hearing this, William marched to Romney; murdered great numbers of the inhabitants, and set fire to their houses. After this, he went to Dover, where, having burnt the town and captured the castle, he led his army direct to London. Many of the Saxon nobles and clergy were assembled there, and they chose Edgar Atheling, a grandson of Edmund Ironside, and crowned him as King of England; but on the approach of William, the Londoners, after a little fighting, were compelled to submit, and Edgar, who was a feeble-minded young man, submitted also, and voluntarily took the oath of allegiance.

William I., or as he is more commonly called, William the Conqueror, was crowned King of England, by Stigand, Archbishop of Canterbury, at Westminster Abbey, on Christmas Day, 1066. A Norman bishop asked the Normans, in French, if they would have William for their king, and they answered, "Yes," with a loud shout. Then Aldred, the Saxon Archbishop of York, put the same question to the English, and they raised their voices in the affirmative: they also joined in the shouting, which was misunderstood by the Norman soldiers outside the building, who thought the people had risen against William, so they instantly set fire to all the English houses near the abbey, and an alarm being spread, the nobles and attendants ran out of the church, and the half-crowned conqueror was left almost alone. Thus the ceremony was finished in great confusion; but William gave a solemn promise to treat the people as well as the best of their native kings had done.

For a time William behaved to the English with some lenity and consideration, and only confiscated the estates of those who had fallen in battle, or who would not submit to his authority. These estates were bestowed on his Norman followers; but they were not so easily satisfied; every one wanted an English estate or a rich English wife, and they cast their greedy eyes upon every Englishman's property, and behaved as insolently as they well could. They did this in hopes the people would rise in rebellion against their new king, so that there would be more confiscations, and more property to be shared among the Norman spoilers.

A few months after his victory at Hastings, William went over in triumph to Normandy, taking with him a great number of the English nobility. He left his half-brother Odo, Bishop of Bayeux, and Fitzosborne, one of his most renowned knights, to govern England in his absence. Some writers suppose that William went to Normandy that his absence might encourage the English people to revolt, and so afford him an excuse, on his return, for greater severity than he had hitherto practised, and for giving all the estates of the English nobles and gentry to his Norman favourites. If this was his object, he certainly accomplished it: Odo acted so ill, that the whole country was indignant; the men of Kent rose in arms, but their insurrection met with no success. Then the men of Hereford, led by a chief called Edric the Forester, drove the Normans out of their county; and the two sons of the brave King Harold came with a number of ships from Ireland, and landed near Bristol. Unfortunately, the troops they brought with them plundered the country, and the Bristol people drove them away as enemies. But the hatred of the English for their Norman invaders increased; there was even a talk of a general massacre of them, like that to which the Danes were subjected in the reign of King Ethelred; and the Normans, in great terror, sent to King William, and implored him to return to England, which, after an absence of eight months, he did. He brought with him his wife, Matilda, who was crowned as Queen of England [A.D. 1068], by Aldred, Archbishop of York.

William thought matters had been carried too far, for he tried to pacify the people with soothing words, and declared that justice should be done equally, both to Saxons and Normans. Notwithstanding this, the men of Exeter rose and fought bravely against him for eighteen days, but they were compelled to submit.

The Conqueror next turned his arms against Devonshire, Somersetshire, and Gloucestershire, and defeated the native English there also, treating them with such severity that a great number fled in despair to the woods, and maintained themselves as robbers and outlaws. Then the Earls Edwin and Morcar took up arms, and a battle was fought between them and William, near the river Humber; but the Norman had a much larger army, and, as usual, he won the victory. The defeated English fled to York, but William followed them, and massacred nearly every one. He built a strong castle at that city, and left a large number of knights and soldiers to defend it, which they found it no easy work to do, for they could scarcely venture outside the walls in small parties without being set upon and murdered by the disinherited English, who infested the woods and glens.

William then thought he could extend his dominion still farther north; and he sent Robert de Comine, with 1,200 soldiers, to Durham. The bishop of that town came out, and warned him not to enter, as the inhabitants had determined to destroy him and his troops, or perish in the attempt to do so. Comine laughed at the warning, entered the town, and took up his lodging in the bishop's palace. His unruly soldiers murdered a few defenceless people, and then ate and drank until they fell asleep. In the darkness of night, signal-fires were seen blazing upon the neighbouring hills; and, with the dawn of morning, hosts of Englishmen rushed into Durham, and, falling upon the Norman soldiers, massacred them all.

The aroused Northumbrians did not rest here. They invited over an army of the Danes [A.D. 1069], who came in 240 ships, and, joining with the English nobles and Edgar Atheling, and supported by Malcolm, King of Scotland, fell upon the garrison at York, and put to death no less than 3,000 of the Norman invaders. When William received information of these events, he swore a terrible oath, that he would utterly exterminate the Northumbrian people. The following spring, he went to York with a powerful army, and did his best to fulfil his vow. He marched over the country from York to Durham, burning towns and villages; murdering men, women, and children—even killing the sheep and cattle. He strove to leave nothing alive; and the country, from the Humber to the Tyne, was one dismal, smoking ruin; while the roads were filled with ghastly, disfigured, and putrefying corpses. One old historian says that more than 100,000 victims perished. These inhuman horrors were followed by those of famine and pestilence. Such are the results of invasion and conquest.—After the suppression of this movement, Edgar Atheling returned to Scotland; and the king (Malcolm) soon after married Edgar's sister Margaret. Several nobles submitted to William; amongst them, Waltheof, one of the most important, whom the king created Earl of Huntingdon, Northampton, and Northumberland, and gave him his half-sister Judith in marriage. He seems, however, to have had an increasing dislike and fear of his English subjects, and he endeavoured, in all ways, to humble and crush them. Not content with confiscating their estates, he seized their money and furniture, saying, that they belonged to discontented, rebellious vassals; and he even attempted to abolish the English language, and substitute the Norman or French instead. Every kind of oppression and insult was resorted to, until the English were driven almost mad. A number of them went to Ely, then a sort of island, surrounded by swamps, and shallow streams of water; and there they raised a fortified place, which they called the Camp of Refuge. It was commanded by Hereward, the Lord of Bourn, in Lincolnshire, who, for his bravery and patriotism, was called "England's darling." Earl Morcar, and a great many nobles, priests, and people of all classes, flocked to it. The Norman tyrant became alarmed, and went into Cambridgeshire with an army, bent on his usual merciless work of extermination. But his soldiers could not cross the swamps and bogs to get at the English; and William, who was a man of great ability and resolution, built a wooden causeway, two miles in length, with little bridges over the streams, to enable his army to pass. During the progress of this work, Hereward used to attack and kill the workmen and soldiers in so sudden and mysterious a manner, and strike such terror into the Normans, that they believed he was in league with the devil. William was so frequently baffled, and so many of his soldiers were slain, that he began to think so too; and he determined to try a little witchcraft himself; and accordingly engaged a sorceress to assist him against the English. She was placed on the top of a movable wooden tower, to protect the works. The cunning Hereward, who was always on the watch, set fire to a large tract of dry reeds and rushes, and the flames spread with such fury, that the sorceress was burnt to death in her own tower; and hundreds of workmen and soldiers perished also. After some time spent in this resolute defence, famine [A.D. 1071] attacked the little island; and the monks of Ely, faithless to their countrymen, showed the Conqueror a way by which he could safely cross the fens, on condition that he would leave their monasteries untouched. The Normans rushed into the Camp of Refuge, and killing 1,000 Englishmen who opposed them, compelled the rest to submit. Some of these the merciless king condemned to have their eyes put out; others to have their right hands chopped off; others to lose a foot, or to pine for the rest of their lives in prison. This was the fate of Earl Morcar; whilst Edgar Atheling, renouncing all claims to the throne, retired to Rouen, where he lived on a pension allowed him by the Conqueror. Edwin, Morcar's brother, attempting, when he heard of the defeat at Ely, to fly into Scotland, was betrayed by some of his followers, and slain by the Normans. The brave Hereward did not submit. He dashed through the marshes, where the Normans dared not follow him, gained his own estates in Lincolnshire, and still maintained himself against William, who at last entered into terms with an enemy whom he could not conquer, and permitted him to enjoy his estates in peace. The Normans had now been seven years in England, and during the whole of that time the Saxon population had struggled to regain their independence; but now their spirit was broken, and they submitted in moody silence.

The Conqueror did not obtain his own way in everything. He had promised the duchy of Normandy to his eldest son Robert, who, on account of the shortness of his legs, was called Curthose. When Robert attained his majority, he desired his father to fulfil his promise, and make him sovereign of Normandy; but the old king answered, "My son, I will not throw off my clothes until I go to bed!" meaning that he would not part with any of his authority until his death. Then Robert, who was passionate and impatient, rebelled [A.D. 1078] against his father, and gathering a small army, sailed over to the continent, and went to the castle of Gerberoy, in the Beauvoisis. From this place he used to issue forth occasionally, and plunder the surrounding country. In a furious rage King William went over to Normandy, and laid siege to Robert's castle. One day, the father and son, who did not recognise each other on account of the helmets they wore, met in fight together, and the prince wounded, and would have killed his father, had he not recognised his voice. Shocked at the dreadful crime he had so nearly committed, the prince fell on his knees and implored forgiveness. William rode away smarting from his wound, and bitterly cursing his son; but he afterwards forgave him, and they were reconciled. Prince Robert feared that this forgiveness was not sincere, so he fled from the court, followed by fresh curses from his father, whom he never saw again.

On William's return to England, he commenced [A.D. 1080] a survey of the whole country, which he entered in a book called Domesday Book, together with an account of the nature of the land, and, in some counties, the number of people who lived upon it. This interesting work is still in existence, and is preserved in the Chapter-house at Westminster. It is also said, that William made a law that all the people should extinguish their lights and fires on hearing the curfew-bell, which rung at sunset in summer, and at eight o'clock in winter. Some writers have doubted whether this regulation was made by William, and say that it was practised in England before his time, and also in other countries. It was probably not a tyrannical law, but merely a precaution against fires.

William had not time for many pleasures, but he was exceedingly fond of hunting. He had a number of royal parks and forests in different parts of the country, but he did not possess one near his favourite residence at Winchester. Therefore he seized a large part of Hampshire, and demolishing the towns and villages, he turned the land into a hunting-ground, and called it the NEW FOREST, driving away the people without any recompense, and leaving them to starve or to beg. Not contented with this, he made some stringent laws for the protection of the deer and game; for though he himself was so fond of hunting, he would not let any one else enjoy it without his permission. He decreed, that whoever killed a stag or a deer, should have his eyes torn out, and this barbarous punishment was frequently carried into effect. When age was growing upon William, his son Richard was gored to death in the New Forest by a stag, and the poor suffering people said it was God's judgment on him for his father's crime in laying waste the country.

William had a dispute with the King of France, to settle which, in 1087, he went over to the continent; but he fell ill, and was obliged to keep to his bed. He had grown exceeding fat and corpulent, and the French king made a vulgar joke about his great size, which put him into such a passion that he swore he would set all France in a blaze. As soon as he was sufficiently recovered, he led an army into the Isle de France, which burnt the ripe corn and pleasant villages, tore up the vines, and left nothing but black smoking ruins in its wake. This was the Conqueror's last burning and murdering excursion. Having set fire to the town of Mantes, and reduced it to ashes, he rode up to view the ruins, when his horse, treading upon some hot cinders, plunged violently, and threw its rider against the high pommel of the saddle. He was carried to Rouen, suffering great pain; the blow had produced an internal injury, and it was soon very plain that he was dying. For the sake of quiet he was removed to the monastery of St. Gervas, outside the city, and then he began to repent of the cruelties he had committed, and sent money to rebuild the churches he had burnt, and to reimburse the monasteries he had robbed: he also ordered the prisoners he had kept for years pining in dungeons to be released. Then he made his will, leaving Normandy to his son Robert, England to William, and 5,000 pounds weight of silver to his youngest son, Henry.

The sun was rising in its power and beauty on a fine morning on the 9th of September, and gilding the ivy-decked walls of St. Gervas, within which the dying tyrant was roused from a dull stupor by the distant sound of bells. "What bells are those?" said he, faintly. His attendants told him that the bells were tolling the hour of prayer in the church of St. Mary. "I recommend my soul to my Lady Mary, the holy mother of God!" he exclaimed; and, breathing a deep sigh, he died.

Then the courtiers, knights, and priests abandoned the dead man, and rode off in a hurry to look after their own property; the servants cleared the room of everything of value, and rode away too; and the body of the Conqueror was tumbled from the bed, and left lying upon the ground, neglected and alone. His sons were absent; and there was no one even to discharge the funeral expenses of the man who was, a few hours before, the master of kingdoms. At length, a gentleman of the neighbourhood undertook to bury the body; and it was taken, by a procession of monks, to the church of St. Stephen, at Caen. On its way through the city a fire broke out, and those who had been following the coffin deserted it, and ran to extinguish the flames. But the funeral proceeded; the prayers were said; and, as the body was about to be lowered into the grave, the Bishop of Evreux spoke an oration in praise of the dead king. At the close of the bishop's address, a man stood boldly out from the crowd, and said, in a loud, stern voice, "Bishop, the man whom you have praised was a robber; the very ground on which we are standing is mine, and is the site where my father's house stood. He took it from me by violence, to build this church on it. I reclaim it as my right; and, in the name of God, I forbid you to bury him here, or cover him with my glebe!" This startling statement was notoriously true; and the bishop was obliged to promise the man 60*s.* for the grave, before he would allow the king's body to be buried there. Then it was lowered into the earth; and the great Conqueror, who, for twenty-one years, had been the scourge of England, was seen no more. He died in the year 1087, at the age of sixty-three. Besides his three sons, he left five daughters—Cicily, Constantia, Alice, Adela, and Agatha.

William was a man of stern and violent temper; haughty and unforgiving, cruel and avaricious; still he possessed great talents, especially those requisite for ruling rough and reckless people; and, if he was the greatest tyrant, he certainly was also the greatest prince of his time.

CHAPTER IX.

THE REIGN OF WILLIAM THE SECOND, CALLED RUFUS, OR THE RED.—A.D. 1087—1100.

ILLIAM, who was called RUFUS, on account of his red hair, had left his dying father, and, without waiting to close the eyes of the parent who had bequeathed him a kingdom, hurried over to England to claim the crown. He first seized his father's treasures, and then induced Lanfranc, the Archbishop of Canterbury, to undertake his cause. That prelate hastily summoned a council of the chief bishops and barons, who decided that William should be King of England, according to the will of his late father; and that Robert, the eldest brother, must be contented with the duchy of Normandy. Some of the great barons would have preferred Robert; but he was absent, either in France or Germany, spending his time in dissolute and abandoned company; and therefore, on the 26th of September, in the year 1087, William Rufus was crowned King of England, at Westminster Abbey.

His first act of power was a very ungenerous one; he again imprisoned those Saxon nobles whom his father, on his death-bed, had caused to be set at liberty. Then he gave some of the gold and silver he found in the treasury to a goldsmith, to be worked into decorations for his father's tomb; but he would have merited the name of a good son far more had he attended to the old king in his dying hours, and have seen him laid in the grave in a becoming manner.

William had not long worn the crown before a conspiracy was formed among the Norman barons to dethrone him, and make his elder brother, Robert, king in his stead. Most of these barons had estates both in England and Normandy; and they thought, if those two countries were separated, and governed by different men, they would lose their property either in one or the other. Robert was crowned Duke of Normandy; and although he was an indolent and dissipated man, the barons preferred him to William; so they sent messengers to him, who said it was unjust that he should only rule over a duchy, while his younger brother possessed a kingdom; and that, if he came to England with an army, the barons would rise in his favour, and make him king. Rufus, who was a brave, clear-headed man, learnt what was going on, and soon proved himself more than a match for his elder brother. He called the English chiefs together, made them a great many promises, and, having won their confidence, and gained their assistance, he scattered the Norman fleet, defeated the conspirators at home, and drove them out of the country.

Instead of ruling England, Robert soon showed that he was incapable of governing Normandy. His troublesome barons made war both upon him and upon one another; and a rich citizen, named Conan, conspired against him, and undertook to deliver up the city of Rouen to William, the English king. Robert was much distressed, for he had spent all his money in pleasure and rioting, and he could not maintain his authority without a further supply. In this difficulty he sold about a third of his Norman dominions to his younger brother Henry, for the small sum of £3,000. The two brothers joined their forces, and put down the conspiracy, shutting the traitor Conan up in a strong castle for the remainder of his life. Henry would have had him hanged or beheaded; but Robert, who was merciful and forgiving, said, "Let him live; imprisonment for life is a dreary and terrible thing; it is punishment enough!" The cool and vindictive Henry did not think so; and going to the castle where Conan was confined, he invited the captive to the top of a lofty tower, and pointed out to him the beauty of the scenery. The eyes of the traitor rested on the prospect with delight, and thoughts of future liberty and happiness no doubt filled his mind, when suddenly Henry seized him round the waist, and hurled him violently over the battlements. The body fell to the earth a crushed and lifeless heap, and the unmoved prince, whose savage love of vengeance induced him to forget his high rank, and personally discharge the revolting office of an executioner, turned to his astonished attendants, and remarked that it was not proper that a traitor should escape the death which he deserved.

Royalty seems often to extinguish natural affection. William Rufus, seeing the difficulties of his brother, in 1091 invaded Normandy, with the intention of seizing Robert's dominions. The interference of the French king as mediator led to the conclusion of a peace, very much to William's advantage, between the brothers; one condition being, that the survivor of the two should inherit the dominions of the other. No sooner were the two elder brothers reconciled, than they united in a quarrel against their younger brother Henry, who was so shrewd and clever that both of them were jealous of him. Henry took refuge in a strong castle built on the top of a lofty rock on the sea-shore. Here he might have remained safely enough, but there was no fresh water, and soon his soldiers were seized with the dreadful pangs of thirst. When Robert heard of this, instead of profiting by the calamity, he permitted the besieged men to come safely out of the castle and obtain water, and even sent his brother Henry a supply of wine for himself. The more resolute William Rufus was angry at what he deemed an act of foolish mercy; but the good-natured Robert said, "How can I suffer my brother to die of thirst? Where shall we find another when he is gone?" Little, indeed, did he then think how this cruel and unnatural brother would, in after times, repay his forbearance, and that in imprisonment and blindness he would ever repent of his mercy.

But though William was stern to his enemies, and generally very rapacious and unforgiving, he had some rough generosity of feeling. Riding one day quite alone near the besieged fortress, he was attacked by two brawny soldiers in Henry's service. One of them struck him from his horse, and raised his sword to despatch him, when William exclaimed, "Hold, knave! I am the King of England." The soldier dropped his weapon, and raising the fallen monarch, expressed his regret for the violence he had committed. "Make no excuse," said Rufus, "thou art a brave knight, and henceforward shall fight under my banner." Then making the man a rich present, he took him into his own service. Soon after this Henry was compelled to submit; his brothers took away all his property, and allowed him to go to Brittany, where, for nearly two years, he wandered about in great poverty and distress.

When Rufus returned to England, he made war upon the Scotch, who had invaded and plundered a part of the country in his absence. He defeated them in two battles; in the last of which their king, Malcolm, was killed. Then William quarrelled again with his brother Robert, and war was renewed between them. After some reverses, William was gaining possession of Normandy, when he was obliged to return to England to fight the Welsh, who plundered and killed the people living on the English borders during his absence: but he defeated the invaders; pursued them over hill and dale, watering the virgin soil with blood, and manuring it with dead bodies, until he drove those hardy marauders into the wild recesses of their native mountains, though not without losing a great many of his own soldiers, and running many risks of defeat and disgrace. Immediately after this a conspiracy was got up against him in the north of England, by Robert Mowbray, the Earl of Northumberland; but the active William crushed this too, and threw Mowbray into a dungeon at Windsor Castle, where, after lingering for thirty years in captivity, he died grey-haired and withered with age and sorrow.

After William had been king for about two years, Lanfranc, the Archbishop of Canterbury, died, and the king then took for his counsellor a dissolute priest, whose name was Ralph, but who, on account of his violence and extortions, was afterwards called Ralph Flambard, or the Firebrand. By his advice, William did not appoint a new archbishop, but kept the revenues of the see of Canterbury himself; and when any other bishops died he would not appoint successors, but seized the profits of their estates. This he did for about four years, when, being taken seriously ill, he became very penitent, and appointed a monk named Anselm to the archbishopric of Canterbury. But as soon as William recovered he forgot his penitence, laughed at his fears, and went on in his old course of extortion and injustice. Anselm expostulated with the king, and urged him to appoint bishops and abbots to the vacant places. "What!" said the Red King, "are not the abbeys my own? Do what you please with your property, but leave me the same liberty with mine." As he could make no impression on the king, Anselm went to Rome, and laid the dispute before the pope. Rufus confiscated the archbishop's estates for leaving the country without his permission; and when the pope sent a messenger to England, to demand the restitution of the property, Rufus swore that he would have his eyes torn out if he did not instantly leave the country. He did leave the country pretty quickly; and Anselm, knowing the king's temper, remained an exile during the life of Rufus.

At this period, a wonderful excitement arose in men's minds, and spread itself over a great part of Europe. Pious pilgrims had been in the habit of travelling to Jerusalem, to pray at the sepulchre of our Saviour. This they had been permitted to do by the Saracens, who possessed the city upon the payment of a trifling sum of money. But the Turks, who wrested Jerusalem from the Saracens, were not so tolerant, and under them the pilgrims were insulted, and sometimes cruelly treated. An enthusiastic and eloquent monk, named Peter the Hermit, who had performed the pilgrimage, was so indignant at the manner in which the Christians were treated, that he applied to the pope, Urban II., imploring him to rescue the Holy City from the hands of the unbelievers. The pope begged the assistance of the various monarchs of Europe in a cause which he assured them was so acceptable to God, and so serviceable to religion, and he called some great meetings to forward the purpose. In the meantime [A.D. 1094], Peter the Hermit visited the principal cities of Europe, preaching with great fervour and eloquence, and promising his listeners present glory on earth, and eternal happiness in heaven, if they would enlist in the holy cause, and fight for the rescue of the tomb of the Saviour from the hands of scoffers. His eloquent appeals had great effect; the enthusiasm became almost universal; men of all ranks flew to arms, and princes and peasants were equally ready to depart for Palestine. Such was the excitement, that even women disguised themselves as men, and mingled in the armies. But they were not all religious people who went to the Holy Land; great numbers of them were idle, ill-disposed men, ready to join in any scheme that would give them opportunities for violence and plunder; others were great criminals, robbers, and murderers, who trusted that, by serving in a cause which was considered holy, they would obtain pardon for their crimes. Indeed, every country sent forth its ruffians and vagabonds, very sincerely hoping, no doubt, that they might never return.

Robert, the Duke of Normandy, was most anxious to lead an army to Jerusalem; but, as usual, this good-tempered, dissipated prince had no money, so he offered to sell the government of Normandy to his brother, the King of England, for five years, for the sum of £10,000. William, who cared nothing about the crusade, as this religious war was called, or indeed about religion at all, gladly accepting the offer, paid the sum required; and when the foolish Robert went to Palestine [A.D. 1095], he sailed over to Normandy, and took possession of that country. The Normans generally submitted very quietly to this change of rulers; but the people of Maine objected to be sold in any such manner, and they revolted against him. He was, however, as active and clever in putting down rebellions as his father, the Conqueror, had been: he soon compelled the people of Maine to recognise his authority; and that effected, he returned again to England.

About three years afterwards, as William was hunting in the New Forest, he received intelligence that the men of Maine had again rebelled against him. Instantly he gave up the chase, and rode off to the nearest sea-port town. His astonished courtiers reminded him that it was necessary to wait for the collection of an army. "Not so," answered the brave and energetic king; "I shall see who will follow me; and, if I understand the temper of the youth of this kingdom, I shall have people enough."

Reaching the coast, he embarked in the first vessel he found there. The wind blew furiously; great waves rolled past the ship, and broke upon the shore; the sailors were alarmed, and begged him to wait until the wind was hushed. "Weigh anchor, hoist sail, and begone," was the impatient answer of Rufus; "did you ever hear of a king that was drowned?" He landed safely; and the news of his arrival dispersed the rebels, as they supposed that he must have brought a great army with him, and fled before they had time to learn the truth. The Red King then took to burning and laying waste the country, after the fashion of his father; but, in consequence of a wound he received, he again returned to England.

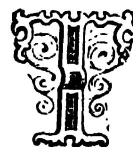
William obtained a great deal of money from constantly robbing the church; and the neighbouring princes on the continent believed him to be very rich: so another petty French sovereign, William, Duke of Guienne and Count of Poitiers, who, after the conquest of Jerusalem in 1099, wanted to join the crusade, offered to sell him his dominions. William accepted the offer, and began to collect the money, when an incident occurred which put an end to his bargains and battles for ever.

Rufus was very fond of hunting, and frequently enjoyed that amusement in the forest his father had made with so much cruelty, by pulling down the towns and villages upon it, and driving away the inhabitants. The people said the New Forest was haunted by fiends and spectres, who might be seen in the dark nights gliding about among the trees, and uttering wild cries and moans. It was regarded as a cursed place, on account of the evil that had been done there, and the English people did not like even to wander near it. Among other stories that were told, one was, that a terrible demon had appeared there to some Norman hunters, and revealed to them that a dark punishment would fall upon the Red King in the shady glens of this wild forest. These tales, the result of ignorance and superstition, caused the New Forest—which was gloomy and solemn enough at night, with the wind making a rustling and moaning noise through the leaves and branches, and now and then some startled deer fleeing into the dark coverts—to be regarded as a haunted spot. But no spirit, good or evil, ever wandered there: the place was pure and innocent enough; and the only demons who frequented its grassy plains were the Norman tyrants who hunted over them. However, as the Conqueror's eldest son was gored to death in that forest by a deer, and a son of Duke Robert's was accidentally shot there by an arrow, no wonder, in that superstitious age, that the ignorant people connected these facts with supernatural visitations; or that they should think and say that more blood of the Norman's family would be spilt upon that fatal ground.

On the 2nd of August, 1100, William Rufus, with a large and merry party of courtiers, went to the New Forest to hunt. Among the party was his younger brother Henry, to whom he had been reconciled; and who, a short time previous, had come to England from Brittany. The king had slept the night before at a lodge in the forest, and was roused from his sleep by a frightful dream; but when the morning broke, and the sun shone brightly into his chamber, he rose in great spirits, and ate and drank heartily. An artisan brought him six new arrows, which he admired for the neatness of their make; and, turning to his bow-bearer, Sir Walter Tyrrel, he gave him two of them, saying pleasantly, "Good weapons are due to the sportsman who knows how to make a good use of them." Then a monk came hurriedly forward to seek the king; he had been sent from the abbey of St. Peter's, at Gloucester, to warn William not to hunt that day, for one of the monks had dreamt that a sudden and awful death awaited him. Rufus laughed, and exclaimed, "The man is a right monk, and to have a piece of money he dreameth such things. Give him 100 pence, and bid him dream of better fortune to us." Then, turning to his bow-bearer, he added, "To horse, Walter!"

Away rode the hunters, their spurs and weapons jingling, and the forest echoing with their shouts. The panting deer fled before them; and when the poor animals fell dying in the long rank grass, the royal party raised a loud laugh of joy and triumph. The day wore away, and the red sun was sinking in the west, when the king and Sir Walter found themselves separated from the rest of the party. Suddenly a noble stag bounded between them; the king drew his bow, but the string snapped. "Shoot, Walter!" he called to his companion, who stood at some little distance from him; "shoot, in the devil's name!" Tyrrel did shoot; the barbed arrow whizzed through the air, glanced aside against a tree, and entered the bosom of the Red King. It had pierced his heart, and, with a groan, he fell dead upon the sward.



Terrified at the accident, Sir Walter Tyrrel fled to Normandy, and at night the body of the king was found by a poor charcoal-burner, who put it, all stained with dust and blood, into his cart, and drove with it to Winchester. Then the courtiers assembled, and buried their king there, in the cathedral church of St. Swithin's, and many eyes gazed upon the royal grave, but none were wet with tears. He was killed in the thirteenth year of his reign, and about the fortieth of his age.

Sir Walter Tyrrel afterwards declared that he did not shoot the arrow, but that the king was assassinated by some unseen hand. This might be true, for Rufus had many enemies; and even his brother Henry, who was quite wicked enough for such a deed, has been suspected of his murder: but it is likely that Sir Walter feared to acknowledge that, even by accident, thousands of the bravest and noblest British youths having been taken away by the emperors to fight the battles of Rome. Nearly one hundred years passed in this manner, when the Roman emperor, Honorius [A.D. 395—425], formally gave up his claim to Britain, and acknowledged the independence of its people. After so many years of war, they seem to have parted as pretty good friends at last; and the incursions of the Scots and Picts continuing, in A.D. 446, the Britons addressed their old enemies in a very humble letter, which they called "The Groans of the Britons." It said—"The barbarians chase us into the sea; and the sea throws us back upon the barbarians; and we have only the hard choice left us of perishing by the sword or by the waves." But the great Roman power was now failing; it could scarcely defend itself against its own enemies, and was no longer strong enough to assist the Britons against theirs. Five hundred years had elapsed since Julius Cæsar first came from Gaul. Notwithstanding all the dreadful wars and acts of cruelty which had taken place during this long time, the invasion of the Romans had effected some good. They had taught the poor islanders many of the arts and graces of civilised life; they had dug wells, constructed roads and bridges, and, what was far more valuable and important still, it was from Rome, during this period, that the early Christians came to Britain, and won its people from the gloomy and savage superstitions of the Druids, to the mild and gentle precepts of the Saviour of the world. The Druids uttered terrible curses against the teachers of the new religion, and threatened them with the vengeance of their gods. As these deities were perfectly imaginary, the threats and curses had no effect, and the principles of Christianity spread rapidly in the rude forest-towns of Britain. The Romans, however, had previously introduced the magnificent idolatry of their own country, and even erected temples for the worship of Jupiter, Apollo, Diana, and Venus. Our fine cathedral of St. Paul's, at London, is supposed to stand on the same lofty spot which in those remote times was occupied by a pagan temple dedicated to Diana. But the people were disgusted by the avarice and cruelty of the pagan priesthood, and the religion of ancient Rome never took deep root in the soil of Britain.

CHAPTER III.

THE SAXONS AND THE HEPTARCHY.—A.D. 449—827.

THE Britons were terribly harassed by the Picts and Scots; they were also constantly fighting among themselves; and the religious quarrels between the Druids and Christians, increased the difficulties of their position: the followers of the false and the True God were alike harsh and vindictive against each other; and the holy doctrines of the blessed Saviour, which should have been a fountain of peace and love, were turned aside from their proper uses, and produced fresh quarrels and distress. Things were in this state when VORTIGERN, a British prince, determined [A.D. 449] to invite the Saxons, who sometimes plundered the Kentish coast, to join the Britons in defeating their other enemies; and he promised, for this assistance, to give them the Isle of Thanet to live in. These Saxons were a brave, hardy, but barbarous race of people, who inhabited the north-west of Europe, from the Cimbric Chersonesus, or Denmark, to the Rhine. Though known under the general name of Saxons, they consisted of three different tribes, called the Jutes, the Angles, and the Saxons. All three of the tribes sent warriors to Britain; and from the Angles the name England is derived.

The Saxons eagerly accepted the invitation of Vortigern; and Hengist and Horsa, two chieftains, who were brothers, came over [A.D. 450], bringing with them a little army in three vessels. At first, they behaved very justly to their British friends, and drove the Picts and Scots from the country. Then they invited the British king, Vortigern, to a feast, where the young and beautiful Rowena, who was Hengist's daughter, went and knelt gracefully before Vortigern, and, with a sweet smile, presented him with a golden goblet, full of wine, saying—"Dear king, your health." Vortigern fell deeply in love with this fair Saxon girl, as her father, no doubt, wished and expected that he would do; and, in a short time, the British prince and the Saxon maiden were married, and ruled together, Vortigern renouncing Christianity for her sake. But the Saxons soon wished to obtain the whole of the island for themselves; and quarrels began to arise between them and the Britons. Crowds of Saxons continually came over to Britain, and settled there, driving the original owners of the land away, or else fighting with, and killing them. The Britons had not quite lost their old courage, and a great many fierce battles took place accordingly; but still the bold Saxons contrived to settle in the land, in spite of all opposition. One body of them founded a little kingdom in the east of Britain, and called it ESSEX; another body settled in the west, and named their country WESSEX. Then came a great number of the Angles, who were divided into two parties, the Southfolk and the Northfolk, and settled in those parts of the country which have ever since borne the names of Suffolk and Norfolk. At length, after a hundred and fifty years of fighting, in the course of which the Britons were driven into those parts of the country we now call Wales and Cornwall, seven small kingdoms were established in the land—viz., Kent; South Saxons, or Sussex; West Saxons, or Wessex; East Saxons, or Essex; Northumbria; East Angles, or Anglia; and Mercia;—which are known as THE HEPTARCHY, or seven Saxon kingdoms. This part of our history may be passed over very briefly, for two reasons: one, that very little is known about it that can be perfectly depended upon; the other, that what is known is very little more than a succession of battles, and acts of robbery, which are tedious to relate, and not very instructive or useful to listen to.—During this period [A.D. 506—542], the famous King Arthur is supposed to have lived. But though we read so much of him in the old Sagas and chronicles, it is very doubtful if ever there was such a person at all; or, if there were, whether he had not the heroic deeds of a number of people attributed to him. It is most probable that he was a poetical or imaginary character, invented by the ancient British bards to keep alive the spirit and bravery of their countrymen. If he really was a British prince at this time, instead of constantly beating his enemies, he was constantly beaten by them, and would not have been very likely to obtain the reputation of being a brave and successful warrior.

When the Saxons arrived here, the Christian religion was widely spread through the country. Under the Saxons, who were heathens, that religion was almost lost and extinguished. The superstitions of the Saxons, like those of the Druids, were wild and savage. They supposed that an imaginary being, whom they called Odin, was the father of the gods. He was named the terrible and severe god, the god of battles, and the father of slaughter. His wife, Frigga, or Frea, was the goddess of love and pleasure. They worshipped several false gods: Thor, who presided over tempests; Balder, over light; Kiord, over the seas and rivers; whilst Tyr was the god of heroes; Brage, of orators and poets; and Heimdal, the door-keeper of heaven, and the guardian of the rainbow. Besides these, there was an almost endless number of inferior gods and goddesses, genii, and spirits. Those Saxons, they said, who were brave in battle, should, when they died, ascend to Valhalla, where they would spend their days in fighting, and their nights in feasting, and drinking good draughts of mead out of the skulls of their enemies; but the cowardly and idle people, after death, would go to Niflheim, where they would dwell in the palace of Anguish, and be fed from the table of Famine. These were the strange and fanciful ideas the Saxons had upon the subject of religion; but during the Heptarchy all this was destined to pass away, and the Christian religion to take the place of this wild and brutal superstition.

The seven kingdoms of Britain, though they were each ruled by a distinct sovereign, ultimately recognised one of the seven monarchs as a chief over all the rest, and they called him the Bretwalda, that is, supreme commander or Emperor of Britain. The dignity was elective; and Ethelbert, King of Kent [A.D. 560—616] was the third Bretwalda, and one of the most important, as through him the Christian religion was restored to the land. Ethelbert had married a young and very beautiful woman, who was a Christian, and she begged her husband to permit her to follow the religion in which she had been educated. To this he consented, for he seems to have been a just and good man, though he did worship Odin: perhaps the gentle submissive manner of his queen attracted him to the religion she followed. However this may be, Augustin, a Roman monk, induced King Ethelbert to be a Christian; and the king having become one, a great many of his subjects very speedily followed his example. Augustin was a prudent man: and, instead of destroying the temples of the old religion, he converted them into Christian churches; and such was the success resulting from his labours, that, in less than ninety years after he came to England, Christianity was established over the whole country: not, however, suddenly; there was a great deal of changing and occasional going back to the old superstitions, as might naturally be expected among an ignorant people; but the truth triumphed at last, as it usually does.

The fourth Bretwalda was Redwald, the King of East Anglia [A.D. 599—624], who erected a Christian altar by the side of a statue of Odin, that he might please the deities both of Christianity and paganism. The fifth Bretwalda, Edwin, King of Northumbria [A.D. 617—634], was a wise and good man, who governed so well that a young timid girl might walk from one town to another without any fear of violence or rudeness from the rough people, half soldiers, half peasants, whom she chanced to meet. Edwin lost his life in a battle with Penda, King of Mercia; and, after a short he had slain his king, and therefore misrepresented the story.

Rufus was unjust, rapacious, domineering, and sometimes cruel; but he possessed great bravery, decision, and talent, and was both a better man and a better king than his father. He had quarrelled with the monks, and robbed and abused them; and the monks, who were the only authors of that age, took their revenge by writing his life, and blackening his memory. But, with all his faults, he spent a part of his wealth in improving the country, and certainly left it in a better and more tranquil condition than that in which he found it at the commencement of his reign.

CHAPTER X.

THE REIGN OF HENRY THE FIRST, CALLED BEAUCLERK, OR FINE SCHOLAR.—A.D. 1100—1135.

PRINCE HENRY soon learnt the news of his brother's death: but instead of going to perform the last duties which humanity, if not affection, exacts from us towards the dead, he rode away, as fast as he could, to secure the royal treasure at Winchester. When he arrived there, breathless with haste, William de Breteuil, the treasurer, refused to give him the keys. "You and I," said that upright officer, "ought to remember the faith we have pledged to your brother, Duke Robert; he has received our oath of homage, and, present or absent, has a right to this money."

Henry paid very little regard to an oath; so drawing his sword, he threatened to kill the treasurer unless he gave him the keys; and as some powerful barons who entered sided with him, De Breteuil was forced to resign them. Having by this violent and dishonest act secured the treasure which belonged to his elder brother, Henry hurried to London, and collecting a great assembly of prelates and nobles, he, by bribes and promises, induced them to proclaim him king; and three days after the death of Rufus—on the 5th of August—he was crowned at Westminster Abbey.

But where was Robert Curthose, the Conqueror's eldest son, to whom the right of succession really belonged? He had led an army to Jerusalem, to assist in recovering the tomb of our Saviour from the hands of the Turks; there he had fought with such courage and intrepidity, that when he returned to Europe he was received and honoured everywhere as a hero. In battle he was as brave and successful as, in the art of government, he was incapable and unfortunate. Passing through the sunny land of Italy, he was honourably entertained at the baronial residence of many a Norman noble, and he remained for some time at the castle of Count Conversano, standing pleasantly situated on a hill not far distant from the Adriatic sea, from which soft breezes tempered the glowing heat of summer. Behind the castle were the thick forests and the rich plains of Apulia, and above them rose the dim blue outlines of the distant mountains. Besides the natural attractions, there were horses, hawks, and hounds, minstrels and jongleurs, and all the amusements in which nobles of that age indulged. These delights were very much to the taste of the brave but indolent Robert, and he remained among them so long, that he lost the crown of England. But a greater charm than all these principally caused him to prolong his stay; the count had a beautiful and gentle daughter, named Sibylla, whom Duke Robert loved and married, and then there was so much feasting and rejoicing, that when he arrived in Normandy, Rufus had been dead some weeks.

Robert was joyfully received by the Norman people, and he determined on an attempt to gain the crown of England; but he had a cunning and remorseless adversary in his brother. Henry, knowing that he had no right to the throne, endeavoured, by many artful means, to obtain the affections of the people, the barons, and the clergy. He gave the people a charter of liberties, in which he promised to do justice to every one without regard to rank; he promised to fill up all the bishoprics which Rufus had kept vacant; and he put Ralph Flambard, who was universally disliked, into prison. Then he proposed to marry the lady Matilda, daughter of Malcolm III., the King of Scotland, who was a descendant of the Saxon kings of England, her mother being sister to Edgar Atheling; and Henry knew how the people would rejoice to see one of that race again upon the throne, and that the alliance would greatly strengthen his claim. But the Normans did not wish Henry to marry a Saxon lady, and they said that Matilda, who had been brought up in a convent, had taken the veil. The young lady, who had no objection to become a queen, denied this, and said that her aunt had compelled her to wear a black veil to protect her from the rudeness of the Norman soldiers; but that she had never become a nun, and was free to marry if she pleased. The clergy decided that this was correct, and accordingly Matilda and Henry were married, to the great joy of the people; and thus the Norman and Saxon races began to mingle together, until at last all distinction was lost between them, and they became one great united nation. Matilda was a loving gentle wife, and very accomplished and charitable; but Henry was by no means an excellent husband; for, besides being very inattentive to his queen, he was much too gay in his conduct to other ladies.

Ralph Flambard made himself very merry in prison, and laughed and joked with his keepers, until they began to be quite attached to him; and one day they permitted a rope to be sent into his room, concealed in an immense flagon of wine. The guards drank the wine until they all became tipsy, and then Ralph took the rope, and getting out at the window, slid to the ground, and escaped to Normandy, where he offered his services to Duke Robert. Roused by the representations of the active Flambard, Robert came over with an army to England to claim the crown. Henry was not behindhand; he also had collected an army, and the forces met; but as the Normans were averse to make war upon their own countrymen, peace was made between the brothers, and Robert gave up England for a yearly pension of 3,000 marks, and retired to Normandy.

Many of the great Norman barons had been favourable to the cause of Robert, and Henry therefore determined upon their ruin. He summoned Robert de Belesme, the Earl of Shrewsbury, to answer some charges against him; upon which the earl, who knew that he was marked for destruction, armed his vassals, and defied the king. But the contest was a very unequal one; Belesme was driven from his strong castle, and banished the country. His two brothers, who were powerful nobles, were banished also; and in this manner Henry got rid, one by one, of the barons whose fidelity towards him he at all suspected. This was a violation of the peace between Robert and himself, for he had sworn to pardon every one who had shown a preference for that prince's claim to the English crown. The generous Robert came to England without any army, to expostulate with his brother, and plead the cause of the banished barons. The treacherous Henry pretended to be delighted to see him; but in reality he made him a prisoner, and would not let him go until he had promised to give up the pension for which he had sold his right to England.

Robert then returned to Normandy; he had lost his beautiful Italian wife Sibylla, who left him an infant son, and he became careless and dissolute again. His low favourites robbed him of everything, even of his clothes, and he is said to have sometimes lain in bed all day, because he had not proper apparel to put on. His barons oppressed the people, and made war upon each other, and the country was thrown into confusion. Indeed, Robert was very unfit to govern, so his crafty brother determined on seizing Normandy, and governing it for him: not from any wish to restore order and prosperity, but because he had an intense desire to extend his dominion, and to tear from his brother the little wealth and power which his craft had left that simple and dissolute ruler. Henry went twice over to Normandy with an army; and the second time [A.D. 1106] he defeated Robert in the battle of Tenchebrai, and took him prisoner, after a valiant resistance. Thus Normandy was subdued and made subject to England—singularly enough, upon the very day forty years after William the Conqueror had first landed in this country. Edgar Atheling, who had accompanied Robert in the crusades, and had joined the army with him, was also taken prisoner at the battle of Tenchebrai, and brought to England, where he lived on a small pension allowed him by Henry.

The captive duke was carried to England, and shut up in Cardiff Castle, Glamorganshire. At first he was allowed some little liberty; but as he very naturally attempted to escape, the cold-hearted, remorseless king ordered his sight to be destroyed by scorching his eyes with a red-hot copper basin. This savage act was executed upon the brother who a few years before had pitied him, and saved him from perishing by thirst. Duke Robert, blind and desolate, separated from his young son, and, doubtless, thinking often of the beautiful wife he had been so proud of, and of the lovely gardens and rich olive groves near the shores of the Adriatic, where he first beheld her—perhaps thankful, too, that she had died before these sad troubles came upon him—wore out eight-and-twenty long gloomy years of captivity, and died at last in prison [A.D. 1134], at the age of eighty;—a sad fate; and sadder still, from the reflection that this prolonged misery was inflicted by the hand of a brother.

When Henry first seized the crown of England, he recalled Anselm, the Archbishop of Canterbury, not from any religious motive, but because that stern ecclesiastic was much loved by the people; and Henry wished, by gratifying them, to obtain their affection, and so seat himself more securely on the throne. But Anselm had not returned long before a quarrel arose between him and his sovereign, which threatened very serious consequences. The subject of dispute was, whether the king or the pope should appoint the bishops of this country. The king very naturally thought that he had a right to appoint bishops to vacant sees in the land of which he was the chief ruler; but the pope, Pascal II., contended that he was the representative on earth of the Divine Saviour; that the scriptures proved that Christ was the door through which all priests must enter the church; and that as he was the representative of Christ, no bishop could be properly appointed except by him. The king said he would rather lose his crown than part with his right in the appointment of his bishops; and the pope replied, that he would rather lose his head than allow him to retain it.

When bishops took possession of their ecclesiastical rank, they received from the hands of the king a ring and a crozier, as tokens of the authority confided to them; this was called their investiture; they in return submitted themselves to his power; and this action was called their homage. Now as the king might refuse to grant the investiture, or receive the homage, he had in reality the power of refusing any candidate whom he did not like. It was the exercise of this power that the pope objected to, and which the king determined to retain. The dispute on this subject arose during the reign of Rufus, and was revived by Anselm refusing to do homage to Henry for his archbishopric. After some years of discussion, during which the pope several times threatened to excommunicate Henry, the matter was compromised by the king giving up the right of investiture, and the pope permitting the bishops to do homage to their sovereign. Three years after this settlement Anselm died, very much to the joy of the crafty Henry, who kept the see of Canterbury vacant for five years, and put its rich revenues in his own pocket.

Soon after Robert of Normandy had been taken prisoner by his unnatural brother, his little son, who was but five years old, was seized and brought to his uncle. Henry longed to murder the poor boy, as in him his father's right to the throne would be preserved; but the child's tears softened him for a moment, and he gave him into the custody of a kind-hearted Norman nobleman, who was called Helie de St. Saen. Henry soon repented of his mercy, and sent some soldiers to bring back the child. St. Saen, suspecting the motives of the king, fled with the boy to the continent; and William Fitz-Robert, as he was called, grew up to be a brave, handsome young man. He was protected by the French king, Louis VI., and by the Earls of Flanders and Anjou; and the latter promised to give him his daughter for a wife when he should be old enough to marry. The frontiers of Normandy were invaded by these allied princes, and a petty war was carried on for about two years. Henry lost many towns and castles, and began to be very much alarmed, especially as he heard that a plot was formed to assassinate him. Powerful as he was, he lived in fear of his blind, helpless brother, who was wasting away his life in prison, and that brother's brave young son, whom he thought might live to revenge the fate of his father. For a long time King Henry slept with a sword by his bed-side; and if any noise woke him in the night he started in terror, believing it to be the stealthy footstep of an assassin. At last he bribed Fulk, the Earl of Anjou, to desert Fitz-Robert; and proposed that the earl's daughter should be married to his own son, William, instead of to the fugitive prince. This offer the earl accepted, and, in consequence, abandoned the cause of the son of Duke Robert.

In A.D. 1110 Henry contracted his daughter Matilda, who was a little girl only eight years old, to the emperor, Henry V., of Germany, to whom she was afterwards married. It was agreed that an immense dower should be paid with her; and he taxed the people with great severity to enable him to raise the money, demanding from each of them the instant payment of a considerable sum. Soon after a war with the Welsh arose. They had began plundering in their old way, but were driven back into the mountains. In 1118 Henry lost his Saxon wife, who had been much loved by the nation, and was called Matilda the Good; indeed, every one loved her except her husband, who was so selfish and cold-hearted that he seems to have cared for no one except his children. About the same time, owing to the King of France, Louis VI., and several other continental princes, having embraced the cause of William Fitz-Robert, Henry became engaged in a continental war, which continued for seven years. He joined his forces in Normandy; and at the battle of Brenville, as it is called, which took place near the town of Noyon, Louis VI. was riding at the head of 400 knights, when he was met by Henry of England with 500. A general encounter took place, during which Henry was twice struck upon his steel helmet by a French count, but was not much hurt. After fighting some time, the French knights declared themselves beaten; and although 140 of them were taken prisoners, the dead on both sides only amounted to three! A great many compliments were passed from side to side, respecting each other's bravery, the captive knights were ransomed, and this battle ended the war. Though the French king had taken up arms chiefly to serve the cause of William Fitz-Robert, and place him on the English throne, yet, in the treaty of peace, the cause of the young prince was quite forgotten.

The king's son, Prince William, was now eighteen years of age, and before returning to England, Henry caused the Norman barons [A.D. 1120] to swear fealty to him as their future sovereign. When the ceremony of swearing allegiance was over, King Henry, with his train and the young prince, embarked at Barfleur, to return to England. Before they entered the ship, Fitz-Stephen, a mariner, knelt to the king, and said, "Sire king, my father served yours all his life by sea, and it was he who steered the ship in which your father sailed for the conquest of England. I beg you to grant me the same office in fief; I have a vessel called the White Ship, well equipped and manned with fifty skilful mariners." The king had chosen his vessel, and therefore could not grant Fitz-Stephen's request; but he said that Prince William and his friends and attendants should sail in the White Ship. Then the king embarked, and a gentle south wind sprung up, and with music and rejoicing the royal fleet sailed over the calm sea.

The White Ship, however, remained by the shore: it contained the prince, his half-sister Lady Marie, a crowd of young nobles, and many high-born and beautiful women. Fitz-Stephen declared that his vessel would fly like a bird over the waters, and soon overtake the rest; so three casks of wine were given to the sailors; the prince and his companions feasted upon the deck; and the young nobles and the lovely court ladies, with their golden ringlets floating in the sea-breeze, danced till darkness put an end to the revelry. When the ship started, the sailors were all intoxicated; but fifty stout fellows sat down to the oars, and the vessel glided rapidly over the waters. Though in November, it was a clear, moonlight night, and the mirth still continued; the prince encouraged the mariners to row faster yet, and overtake the fleet: they increased their exertions, and the vessel appeared to fly through the waters. Suddenly a great shock was felt—it had struck upon a rock: the water rushed in, and a wild cry of terror rose into the air. Destruction was certain; but the brave Fitz-Stephen, true to his trust, hurried the prince and some of his companions into a boat, saying to them, "Row to the shore, and save yourselves; the rest must perish."

The prince put off from the devoted ship; but his half-sister Marie, with frantic shrieks, implored him to return for her. He was touched with pity, and put back to take her into the boat; such numbers leaped in that it upset, and the prince, his sister, nobles, mariners, and all, were drowned! Then the White Ship sank too; and of 300 people who had embarked in it, but three were left struggling with the waters. Two of these were Berold, a butcher of Rouen, and Godfrey, a young noble, who were left clinging to a piece of the floating wreck. The third was Fitz-Stephen, the brave but foolish captain; swimming towards them, he asked what had become of the prince? They answered, he was lost: only they remained alive. "Woe, woe to me!" he exclaimed; and, without any further effort to save himself, sank to the bottom. After clinging for some hours to the fragment of the wreck, the young noble was numbed with the cold, and exhausted; so recommending his companion to the mercy of God, he let go his hold, and sinking down through the dark deep waters, was seen no more. The butcher was a stronger man, and still clung fast; and when the morning dawned, some fishermen saw him from the shore, and put off in a boat, and saved him. Of all that gay and brilliant company—brave men and beautiful women—this poor man, in his rough sheep-skin coat, was the only one left alive.

The sad news soon reached England, but no one dared tell the king; and for three days Henry was anxiously expecting his son. Then the courtiers sent a little boy to him, who cried bitterly, and falling at the king's feet, said that the White Ship was lost, and every one in it was drowned. Henry fell senseless to the ground; and from that moment, it is said, he never was seen to smile.

When the king recovered from this shock he married again [A.D. 1121], in the hope of having a son to whom he could leave his crown. His second wife was Adelais, the daughter of the Duke of Louvain; but as three or four years passed away, and she brought him no children, he determined that his daughter Matilda, who had been married to the Emperor of Germany, but was now a widow, should succeed him as sovereign of England and Normandy. The barons were indignant at the idea of being governed by a woman; but Henry, by bribes and promises, induced them to swear to secure her succession; and as perjury had come to be regarded merely as a fashionable vice in his court, they all took an oath, which none of them intended to keep. The king [A.D. 1127] married his daughter to Geoffrey, the son of Fulk, Count of Anjou. All distinguished people seem to have had a nick-name in those days; and Geoffrey was called Plantagenet, because he used to wear a sprig of the Spanish broom plant—called by the French planta genista—in his cap. From this incident arose a name which, in after years, became famous in English history. In this marriage, King Henry was influenced by motives of policy; the Earls of Anjou had long been troublesome enemies, and now this match bound them to him as friends.

Through the influence of the French monarch, William Fitz-Robert had been created Earl of Flanders in the place of Charles the Good, who was murdered in a church at the foot of the altar. At first, the Flemish people made no objection; but shortly after they rebelled against their new ruler, and were secretly assisted by King Henry, who never relaxed the jealous hatred he bore to his brother's son. Fitz-Robert was an active soldier, and obtained a victory over his enemies [A.D. 1128]; but he received a wound in his hand, which mortified, and caused his death. Thus was Henry rid of one whom he hated, and who he feared might succeed him on the throne.

Henry spent the last four years of his reign abroad, being, during that time, constantly disturbed by the quarrels between his daughter Matilda and her husband Geoffrey Plantagenet. His health and spirits began to decline; and having one night eaten heartily of lampreys, they brought on indigestion, which turned to fever, and after seven days' illness, he died at midnight, on the 1st of December, 1135; being sixty-seven years old, and having reigned thirty-five. His body was brought to England, and buried at Reading Abbey.

Henry had great natural talents; and his learning was so extensive that he was called BEAUCLERK, or the FINE SCHOLAR; he was very proud of this distinction; used to say that an ignorant king was no better than a crowned ass; and in the lawless age of violence in which he lived, he zealously endeavoured to establish the supremacy of intellect over force. He delighted in the society of poets and learned men, whom he respected and honoured; he caused the laws to be fairly and justly administered, his people calling him the "Lion of Justice;" and, during his reign, the social condition of the people was greatly improved, and the prosperity of the kingdom increased. Undoubtedly his ambition led him into great crimes; and he committed many acts that cannot be justified. Still, he was a wise and successful king, and he left his dominions in a state much superior to that which he found them when he ascended the throne.

CHAPTER XI.

THE REIGN OF KING STEPHEN.—A.D. 1135—1154.

HENRY had caused the barons to swear that his daughter Matilda, the ex-empress of Germany, and wife of Geoffrey Plantagenet, Count of Anjou, should succeed to his crown. The king was exceedingly anxious upon this point, and took every precaution to secure his daughter's succession; but no sooner had the grave been closed over his remains, than his plans were defeated by the appearance of another candidate for the vacant throne, in the person of his nephew, Stephen.

This Stephen was son of Adela, a daughter of William the Conqueror, and wife to the Count of Blois. The late king had invited two of her sons to England, and acted very generously towards them. Henry, who was a priest, he made Abbot of Glastonbury and Bishop of Winchester; while to Stephen he gave a rich and amiable wife, who brought him the sovereignty of Boulogne and some rich estates in England.

But Stephen's ambition made him forget this kindness: he had long cherished a secret hope of obtaining the English crown; and when the news of his uncle's death reached him, he hurried to Winchester and seized the royal treasures. Most of the barons and clergy were quite ready to forget the oaths they had sworn to Matilda, and to acknowledge Stephen as their king; but the Archbishop of Canterbury objected, and Stephen could not be crowned without him: so he bribed the steward of the late king's household to swear, that Henry, on his death-bed, had disinherited his daughter, and named him his successor. The archbishop either was convinced, or pretended to be so, that this was the fact; and Stephen was crowned king at Westminster Abbey, on the 26th of December, 1135.

The usurper did his best to conciliate the barons, clergy, and people, and for nearly a year he reigned in peace. The King of Scotland armed in behalf of the rights of his niece Matilda; but Stephen bought him off, and he retired; the barons, however, became dissatisfied, and conspiracy after conspiracy broke out amongst them. The king, who was brave and active, suppressed them as rapidly as they arose; and usually pardoned his troublesome nobles upon their promising him to live peaceably for the future. At length, the Earl of Gloucester, a natural son of the late king, and a very good soldier, defied Stephen [A.D. 1138], and adopted the cause of Matilda. Then the great barons renewed their acts of rebellion, and King David of Scotland again invaded England with a numerous army, which ravaged the country, burnt the villages, and murdered the people, not even sparing the young helpless infants. The nation was long distracted by a great number of petty sieges and battles, in which the royal cause was generally successful. The result was, that the barons were, one after another, subdued, and the Scots defeated in an engagement near Northallerton, fought on the 22nd of August, and called the Battle of the Standard, from a crucifix the English had fixed on the top of the mast of a ship, and which, being fastened to a car with four wheels, was drawn before the army. In the centre of the crucifix was a silver box containing a consecrated wafer; and the ignorant soldiers supposed that this wafer wonderfully assisted them in gaining the victory.

Stephen might now have got on pretty well, but he had the misfortune to quarrel with the monks. Many of the bishops were just as warlike and troublesome as the barons; and they built so many castles, and kept so many armed men, who plundered and oppressed the people, that the king thought it necessary to interpose his authority. Among the most powerful and wealthy prelates was Roger, Bishop of Sarum. He had been only a poor parish priest; but Henry Beauclerk had made him his chaplain, because he could say mass faster than any one else. Roger, although a grasping, avaricious man, possessed great talents. He rose to the episcopal bench; and rebuilt the cathedral of Salisbury in a very tasteful and elegant manner. He lived in great magnificence: patronised artists and learned men; and built many mansions and castles. So great was his influence that he made his two nephews bishops also—Alexander of Lincoln, and Nigel of Ely. Still Roger was not satisfied: he went on grasping and gaining; and at last King Stephen determined to commence his work against the bishops with him. A riot arose between Roger's men and those of the Earl of Brittany: this was sufficient; and the king arrested the bishop and his two nephews, declaring he would not set them at liberty until they surrendered all their castles. Nigel escaped; and flying to his uncle's strong castle at Devizes, set the king at defiance: Stephen swore that the two bishops, Roger and his nephew Alexander, who still remained his prisoners, should be kept without food until the castle was surrendered; and they were actually kept fasting for three days, when the nephew yielded, to save the lives of his uncle and brother.

This act of Stephen's turned all the clergy against him; even his own brother Henry, the Bishop of Winchester (who had been appointed legate to the pope, Innocent II.), deserted his cause; and when Matilda and the Earl of Gloucester landed in the kingdom [A.D. 1139], Henry was one of the first to welcome them. Then the country was divided into two great parties, and became the scene of a remorseless civil war; the fields remained uncultivated, travellers were robbed and murdered, and no one was safe out of the fortified castles which raised their grim stone walls in every direction. At first, the war was in favour of Stephen; but fortune changed; and in a battle fought near Lincoln [A.D. 1141], he was taken prisoner by the Earl of Gloucester. In that battle he had fought with astonishing courage, standing unaided after his soldiers had fled, and slaying with his broad battle-axe several of the men who attacked him. At last his axe broke from the tremendous blows he dealt with it; his sword also broke, and the king fell senseless from being struck with a great stone that had been thrown at him. He was taken prisoner, and carried to Matilda, who had her royal captive loaded with chains, and shut up in a dungeon at Bristol Castle. After this victory, Matilda was acknowledged as queen, and crowned at Winchester by Stephen's own brother Henry, as sovereign lady of England and Normandy. Thus, after six years of restless blood-stained royalty, Stephen was as unhappy and helpless as the meanest of the poor miserable people whom his usurpation had reduced to beggary and famine.

Matilda, though singularly active and courageous, was an overbearing, insolent woman, who soon managed to turn most of her friends into enemies; she even insulted the Bishop of Winchester, who had placed the crown upon her head; and he, probably regretting the part he had taken against his deposed brother, determined to attempt his restoration. The Londoners, too, were much attached to Stephen. They drove Matilda from their city, and the war commenced again; Queen Maude, the brave wife of Stephen, leading the army for her imprisoned husband. Matilda was reduced to extremities, and the Earl of Gloucester taken prisoner. As he had been the life of her cause, and she was helpless without him, she consented to release the king in exchange, so Earl Robert and King Stephen were both set at liberty, and the struggle stood just as it did at the first. A good deal more fighting took place; even the churches were seized upon and fortified, fosses were dug in the churchyards, the bones of the dead were exposed to view, and the oppressed and wretched people were reduced to despair. All this went on for some years, when the Earl of Gloucester died of a fever, and then Matilda, worn out with the struggle, gave up the war [A.D. 1146], and retired to Normandy.

Stephen was a most unlucky monarch; no sooner had he a chance of restoring tranquillity than he managed to quarrel with the Archbishop of Canterbury; and that unchristian priest, indifferent to all the sufferings which the people had so long undergone, laid the kingdom under an interdict. Instantly the churches were closed; the monks and priests refused either to marry the living or bury the dead; the bells ceased to ring, and were even removed from the steeples, and laid upon the ground; and all religious services and consolations were refused to the people, who were so terrified that they compelled the king to become friends with the archbishop. Thus this wicked and ambitious priest was enabled to rebel in comparative safety against his sovereign.

Seven years after Matilda had quitted England

[A.D. 1153], her son, Henry Plantagenet, who was now about eighteen years old, and who had acquired great wealth and power from his marriage with Eleanor, the divorced queen of the French king, invaded it with a small army, and civil war was again declared. But the barons were at last tired of bloodshed. Their lands were devastated, their vassals slain, and the grim lank spectre of famine appeared even at the baronial board; while in some places plague and fever rose from the rotting bodies of the unburied dead; so the Earl of Arundel spoke out boldly, and said, "That it was an unreasonable thing to prolong the calamities of a whole nation on account of the ambition of two princes." Every one agreed with the earl: the two armies looked at each other, not with malignant fierceness, but with mutual sorrow for their wretched country; and a peace was concluded between King Stephen and Prince Henry. It was agreed that Stephen should be king for the rest of his life, but that he should adopt Henry as his son, and make him his successor. Every one seemed satisfied with this arrangement except Stephen's eldest son, Prince Eustace, who was thus disinherited, and deprived of the kingdom. He had no idea of yielding up his slender chance of the crown to promote the tranquillity and happiness of the nation; but, influenced by his ambition, in a fit of passion he left his father, intending to get up another war. He seized upon the abbey of St. Edmondsbury, and establishing himself there, lived by plundering the surrounding country. This did not last long: one day, when at a drunken feast, he was seized with a sudden frenzy, and died mad; it is not improbable that he may have been poisoned.

After the treaty was signed, Prince Henry went back to Normandy, and England was left to Stephen; but he did not enjoy it long, for in about a year he died, after a short illness, at the age of fifty. His death, which occurred on the 25th of October, 1154, ended a sad unhappy reign of nineteen years. He was buried at the monastery of Feversham, in Kent; but his grave was afterwards robbed for the sake of the leaden coffin in which the body was contained, and the corpse thrown into the river which flows past the town. "So uncertain," says the chronicler Speed, who relates this incident, "is man (yea, the greatest princes) of any rest in this world, even after burial; and restless may their bodies be also, who, for filthy lucre, thus deny the dead the quiet of their graves."

If we except the perjury and usurpation by which Stephen obtained his crown (crimes which, however, should never be lightly regarded), he was not a bad man; he never employed tortures, or willingly oppressed the people; he was brave, active, and possessed of considerable talents, and would very likely have been an excellent king, had he been permitted to govern the land in peace. But during his reign the people suffered more than they did under any of his Norman predecessors. The contending armies, many of both being the vilest characters in the land, plundered and desolated the country, and put the unhappy people to shocking tortures, to make them reveal where they had concealed their goods. Some they hung up by the thumbs, or by the feet, and half-smothered them with smoke; many they starved to death; while others they threw into dark unwholesome dungeons, with snakes and toads, and loathsome crawling things. An old Saxon writer said, "When the townsmen had nothing more to give, they set fire to all the towns. Thou mightest go a whole day's journey, and not find a man sitting in a town, nor an acre of land tilled. The poor died of hunger, and those who had been men well to do, begged for bread." If King Stephen could have foreseen these terrible results when he first laid his hand upon the crown, he might have wished himself an obscure peasant tilling his little plot of land in peace and safety, rather than a monarch, whose hours could be counted by the groans of his people, and whose ambition had made his country a land of torture and misery.

CHAPTER XII.

THE REIGN OF HENRY THE SECOND, CALLED PLANTAGENET.—A.D. 1154—1164.

A NEW period in English history dates from the death of King Stephen. After him began the rule of the PLANTAGENETS, a family which produced many sovereigns of great strength of mind and decision of will; which continued to rule the country for upwards of three centuries; and the last crowned member of which sank in dust and blood on the battle-field of Bosworth, before the victorious representative of the House of Tudor. These three centuries may be called the iron age of England—the age when the sword was the source of power, when the strength and authority of the great barons rivalled those of the king, and the feudal system of internal government was predominant over the country. During these three eventful centuries there occurred a succession of battles, acts of personal bravery and heroism alternating with deeds of oppression and torture, usurpations, treacheries, assassinations and executions. When this period passed away, England awoke as if from a dream, and entered on a new course, but not a better or a nobler one; for the second great period of English history is, in many respects, worse than the first.

When King Stephen died, Matilda's son, HENRY PLANTAGENET, was besieging a castle on the borders of Normandy. On hearing that the throne of England now awaited his acceptance, he betrayed no anxiety, but very coolly remained until he had captured the castle; and being also detained at Barfleur by a storm, he did not arrive in England until six weeks after Stephen had breathed his last. He was received not only without opposition, but with great joy; for barons and people were alike tired of the sad desolation which had so long overspread the country, and longed for a king whose right to the crown was generally acknowledged, and who was already reputed to have a wise head and a firm hand. With him came his wife Eleanor, a woman of great strength of mind and sternness of character, but who did not possess any remarkable affection for her husband; indeed, he had only married her on account of her great fortune and territorial possessions. She had been previously united to Louis VII., of France, who had divorced her on account of light and improper conduct. Six weeks after her divorce, she became the wife of the heir to the English crown.

Henry and Eleanor were crowned King and Queen of England on the 19th of December, 1154. There was much feasting and rejoicing at court; and what was better, the poor, harassed, and almost beggared people rejoiced too, and set to work to retrieve their ruined land and houses with hopeful hearts and sturdy hands. They had a faith that Henry, though but young (he was three-and-twenty when he became king), would be just and good to them, and his conduct speedily strengthened this supposition; for his coronation was no sooner over, than he set resolutely to work to reform the dreadful abuses and oppressions which had crept into use during the unhappy reign of Stephen.

He first banished all the hordes of foreign soldiers who had been brought over to England during the long civil war which had devastated the country, and who, having got possession of some of the many castles which now raised their grim stone walls in every direction, lived like bands of robbers, on plunder and outrage. He then called a great meeting of his nobles, and obtained their sanction to resume to himself all the lands and castles which had been granted to their respective supporters by Stephen and by Matilda. The resumption of these estates he considered necessary for the proper support of the dignity and power of the sovereign. Without them, he would have been a poor, and consequently feeble king; and that he resolved he would not be. Gathering a considerable army, he summoned the holders of those estates to surrender them: this they were naturally very disinclined to do; but those who resisted had their castles taken by storm or reduced by famine; and in the end he recovered the disputed lands, and caused about 1,100 castles, which had been little better than dens of thieves, to be reduced to ruins. This conduct gained Henry some bitter enemies; but it also won for him the love of his people, who were glad to see their tyrants struck down, and security of person and property restored to the peacefully-disposed and toiling thousands. Having thus acquired the means of carrying out further reforms, this wise and resolute young king issued a new coinage of a proper weight and purity (for even the coin had been tampered with and debased during the wretched reign of Stephen), and created the Earl of Leicester grand justiciary of the kingdom; granting him, also, the means of enforcing his decisions.

In little more than a year, England was restored to a tranquil state; and then Henry went abroad to wrest the earldom of Anjou from the hands of his younger brother, Geoffrey. This earldom had, it is said, been given to Henry by his father, on condition that, if ever he became King of England, he was to resign Anjou to his brother. The latter, therefore, invaded Anjou and Maine, which ought certainly to have been given up to him; but the active and ambitious Henry stormed and took several castles which held out for Geoffrey, and finally purchased his brother's claim for a pension of £1,000 a year. The disinherited prince, however, did not long continue to receive this money, for he died about two years afterwards, in A.D. 1158.

On Henry's return to England he resolved to check the Welsh people, who were constantly making incursions for the purpose of plunder, and marking their progress by cruelty and desolation. Leading an army into Wales [A.D. 1157], he penetrated into the beautiful and mountainous country as far as Coleshill Forest. There the wild hardy Welsh suddenly issued from the dense woods, and pouring down from the mountains in thousands, attacked Henry's army in a narrow pass. Taken by surprise, and in a place where the troops could not form, the English were thrown into confusion, and slaughtered in heaps. The Earl of Essex threw away the royal stadnard, and, like a spiritless coward, ran for his life, crying out in his terror that the king was killed. Had not Henry possessed more presence of mind than this miserable nobleman, it is very likely that he would have perished, and all his army with him; but he was of a different nature: rushing among his scattered soldiers, he called aloud to them that he was unhurt, spoke some hasty words of encouragement, and placing himself at their head, succeeded in fighting a passage out of that dreadful valley of slaughter. Notwithstanding this great loss, Henry firmly established himself in Wales, built castles, and cut roads through its forests; and after a few months the Welsh were glad to enter into a peace very advantageous to the English king, merely for the sake of getting rid of him.

Henry's next act of public interest was not a very creditable one, and proceeded from no better motive than an inordinate desire to extend his dominions, and increase his wealth. His brother Geoffrey, from whom he had taken the earldom of Anjou, was, soon after that occurrence, invited by the citizens of Nantes, a state in Lower Brittany, to become their ruler. Geoffrey accepted the invitation, and governed them until the time of his death, which occurred about a year afterwards. The people of Nantes then again submitted to the authority of Conan, the hereditary Duke of Brittany, under whose rule its inhabitants were before they voluntarily chose Geoffrey Plantagenet for their prince. Nantes was an independent state; it was in no way connected with England, and Henry had no more right to it than he had to the empire of China. But prosperous kings have too frequently confounded power with right; and sacrificing what they know to be just, to what they think to be desirable, commit actions which in private men would be called by no milder terms than chicanery and theft. Henry did so in this case, for he set up a claim to the city of Nantes, on the absurd ground, that as his brother Geoffrey had governed it, it descended to him by hereditary right. His brother was not an hereditary but an elected sovereign, and could not, therefore, bequeath a right which he himself had never possessed; but in spite of this plain undeniable fact, and the representations of the people of Nantes, Henry led an army against that city, affected to treat its inhabitants as revolted subjects, and finally terrified them into submission to his rule. This was a desertion of that honourable conduct which had restored prosperity to his own country, and won him the hearts of his people; but regal power seems but too often to have the effect of corrupting the minds of those who possess it.

Having succeeded in his design upon Nantes, Henry next made a claim to the earldom of Toulouse, which he asserted belonged to his wife Eleanor, though that lady's right to it was very shadowy and imperfect. But, right or wrong, Henry could not resist the temptation to add an important earldom to his already extensive dominions, and he raised an army accordingly. The manner in which he did this was novel and singular, and a striking instance of that acuteness and foresight which he always exhibited. By the feudal law the barons were bound to assist their king in his wars, as a return for the estates which they held in his dominions; and the vassals of the barons who lived on those estates were bound to follow their lords to battle in the same manner. The king was in name, though in name only, the owner of all the land under his rule; and the military services of the barons were regarded as a sort of rent which they owed to their sovereign. The vassals of the barons, who lived upon the estates of these powerful nobles, gave their services as a direct rent. They paid no money for the land they occupied, but gave their labour of service to their lord whenever he required it. In fact, they lived upon his property much in the same way as his cattle did, and were not unfrequently sold with the estates. They were called serfs or villains (hence arose the use of the word villain as a term of reproach), and were in a state of modified slavery.

An army composed of barons and their retainers was a very undisciplined and intractable body; the vassals were more attached to the noble on whose estate they lived, and with whose person they were familiar, than they were to the king, who was almost a stranger to them; and they naturally obeyed their lord rather than their sovereign. Indeed, they were always ready to make war, even upon their king, at the command of their more immediate lord. But there was another objection to an army of this character, which rendered it almost useless for foreign warfare; the barons and their vassals were not bound to serve the king for a longer period than forty days; and it would have taken Henry and his army that time to reach Toulouse. He therefore proposed that the barons and knights should pay a certain sum in money instead of giving their personal attendance. As most of them very wisely preferred staying at home, and attending to their own affairs, to fighting in a foreign land, they willingly consented to such an arrangement; and the money which King Henry derived from this commutation of personal service, or scutage, as it was called, is said to have amounted to the enormous sum, in that day, of £180,000. By this wise scheme the politic king was enabled to hire a well-disciplined army of foreign mercenaries, who would obey him implicitly, and fight for him resolutely, for just so long a period as he continued to pay them.

With these troops, and some of his own English barons, the king set sail for France; and after taking the town of Cahors, marched against Toulouse. There he was met by the French king, whom he would not attack, because, according to the strange system then universal throughout Europe, Louis, the French king, was his superior lord; but the wily Henry had, no doubt, some other motive for his forbearance. He usually gained from Louis what he wanted by the arts of diplomacy; and he doubtless found that was a cheaper and less troublesome way than fighting for it. After a time, Henry abandoned his project against Toulouse, and made a peace with the French king. He probably saw, that if he persevered in his claim it would lead him into a long and expensive war; and as his prudence was equal to his bravery, he wisely declined proceeding to extremities in a matter in which he might have failed.

The peace was no sooner agreed upon than Henry was again involved in a quarrel with Louis. An arrangement existed between them, that the King of England's son Henry, who was seven years old, should be married to the King of France's daughter Margaret, who was only three years of age; and the fortress of Gisors was placed in the hands of the Knights Templars, who were to surrender it to Henry when the marriage took place, as a part of the dower of the little princess. Of course, it was not intended that the young people should be married until they were of a proper age to enter into so serious a contract; but King Henry wanted the fortress of Gisors, so he sent Thomas à Becket, his chancellor and favourite, to bring the infant princess to London, where the little creature was immediately married to her juvenile suitor, and the king demanded the fortress of the Templars, who, as the marriage had been solemnised, immediately surrendered the dowry which had been committed to their charge. The French king was exceedingly angry at this duplicity; he banished the Templars, who were suspected of having been bribed by the English king, and declared war against Henry; but on the mediation of the pope, he consented to a reconciliation.

At this period the power of the church was enormous in England; and as it was constantly increasing, it threatened in time altogether to usurp the authority of the state. It is right, and of essential importance, that religion should be universally respected, and its divine precepts made the rule of our conduct and our guidance through life; but it is not proper that the church should have more power than the state, or indeed that it should possess any great political power, which is only likely to render it ambitious rather than religious, and intent on gathering treasure on earth, rather than imploring blessings from heaven. Besides, the priests of that age were seldom meek, benevolent, and learned servants of our Divine Saviour, but often troublesome agitators, bent on the acquirement of wealth and station. King Henry determined to subdue the ecclesiastical power, and for that purpose took a step which might have terminated in his ruin, and which did subject him to personal disgrace, and many years of vexation and bitterness. Before relating this event, it is necessary to give a brief sketch of the life of Thomas à Becket, the chancellor and favourite companion of the king; for the biography of this extraordinary man is woven up inextricably with the history of his country.

His birth was the result of a very romantic incident. His father, Gilbert Beck, or Becket, was a Saxon yeoman, who went to Palestine to fight against the Saracens; but as far as Gilbert was concerned, the Saracens had decidedly the best of the contest, for they took him prisoner and shut him up in a dungeon. The daughter of the Emir, to whose custody he had been committed, saw the English captive, and, being of a gentle and affectionate nature, first pitied, and then loved him. The result of this attachment was, that she assisted him to escape, and Becket regaining his native country, established himself as a citizen and tradesman in London.

The generous Saracen maiden felt very sad and lonely after her lover was gone. She pined for his society, and at length determined that she would leave her home and country, and try to seek him out. This was a wild and almost impossible design, for she could not speak English, and knew nothing more of the young Saxon who had won her noble heart, than that his name was Gilbert, and that he lived in a city called London. But sincere love gives strength and courage to those who feel it. The maiden fled from her father's house to the nearest seaport, and by repeating the word London to the sailors whom she saw there, made them understand that she wished to go to that distant city. Having arrived in safety in the place where her lover dwelt, she went from street to street, calling aloud, "Gilbert! Gilbert!" no doubt much to the surprise of many a grey-headed, sober old citizen, and to the amusement of many young and thoughtless ones. She was, however, rewarded for her heroic constancy by meeting her Gilbert, who seems to have been very glad to see her; for, after she had renounced her Mahometan faith, and become a Christian, they were married, and doubtless lived very happily together.

From this union proceeded Thomas à Becket, who was born in London in 1119. As the boy was handsome, intelligent, and possessed very engaging manners, his father naturally supposed that he would rise to distinction, and he therefore bestowed on him an excellent education. Thomas first became a clerk to the sheriff of London, in which position he attracted the notice of the Archbishop of Canterbury, who trusted him with duties of great importance and responsibility, and at length recommended him to the king as a man of great talent and merit. Henry was so pleased with the intelligence of Becket, that in a short time [A.D. 1157] he raised him to be chancellor of the kingdom. In that age the chancellor held great power, more than is now possessed by the prime minister: he had the custody of the great seal; all vacant prelacies and abbeys were held by him; he was entitled to a place in the councils of his sovereign; and was in possession of other sources of power and wealth. Besides this great dignity, the king made Becket provost of Beverley, dean of Hastings, constable of the Tower, and even committed to him the education of his eldest son.

Possessed of so many profitable appointments, it is no wonder that the clever and engaging son of the London tradesman became one of the wealthiest and most important persons in the country. He was fond of gaiety and magnificence; lived in a palace; treated his numerous guests with delicate viands on plates of silver, and the rarest wines in golden goblets; his numerous pages and attendants were attired in rich and gorgeous costumes; and even many knights and gentlemen of rank professed themselves his vassals. On one occasion, when he accompanied Henry to the wars, 1,900 knights were in his suite, 700 of whom were members of his household; and he was followed by 4,000 hired military retainers.

King Henry not only confided much important business to the care of his chancellor, but made him partaker of all his feasts and pleasures. Becket was accomplished in many things to which he could pay very little attention. He was an excellent horseman; expert in hunting and hawking; brilliant and witty in conversation; and although a priest by profession, could wield a sword or poise a lance with almost any knight whose life was devoted to arms. This ready capability for both business and pleasure so delighted the king that he was seldom long out of Becket's society. An amusing anecdote is preserved of their social familiarity. One bitter winter's day, the king and chancellor were riding together through the streets of London, attended by a train of courtiers, when a grey-haired old man approached, shivering with cold, and protected from the weather only by a thin and ragged garment. Seeing this pitiable object, the king, who though generally stern and dignified enough, yet loved a jest, turned to his companion and said—"Would it not be very praiseworthy to give that poor man a good warm cloak?" "It would, surely," replied the chancellor; "and you do well, sir, in thinking of such good actions." "Then he shall have one presently," said the merry king; and seizing Becket's gorgeous cloak of scarlet, lined with ermine, he tried to pull it from his shoulders. The astonished chancellor at first resisted this rough fun; and the king and he struggled together until both of them very nearly rolled off their horses; he then surrendered his cloak: the thankful beggar limped away with the gaudy robe; and the courtiers smiled at the wit of their sovereign.

After Henry had worn the crown for seven years, Theobald, Archbishop of Canterbury, died [A.D. 1162]; and the king thought that Becket, who knew his intention of restraining the power of the clergy, and had frequently seemed to favour this cherished project, would be the very man to put in the place of the departed prelate. He thought that his friend and favourite—the man on whom he had showered wealth and opulence with an unsparing hand—would, when supreme head of the English church, compel its ministers to lower their arrogant tone, respect the sovereign of their country, and obey its laws. The king naturally supposed that the son of the tradesman would be content to remain the second man in his dominions, and permit him, as the first, to rule the state, and curb the usurpations of the church on secular authority. Shrewd, however, as Henry was, he had mistaken the character of his versatile and accomplished minister.

When the king communicated to the chancellor his intention of making him archbishop, Becket gaily lifted his gorgeous robe, and said with a laugh, "A fine saint you have chosen for so holy an office." But though he pretended he was unfit for such a solemn employment, he was very careful to accept it; and, after about a year's delay, was installed primate of all England. From that moment he changed his whole conduct; he laid aside his gay attire, dressed in the plainest manner, and wore sackcloth next his skin. He lived on the coarsest kind of food, and drank water, made unpalatable by an infusion of bitter herbs; scourged his naked back until the blood sprung from the discoloured wales he inflicted upon himself; and every day, in a proud and impious imitation of the Divine Jesus, he knelt and washed the feet of thirteen beggars. Besides this, he gave away large sums to hospitals and convents, seemed to be constantly engaged in prayer and holy duties, and in a very short time obtained what he was scheming for—the reputation of saint, and the affections of the people. "What a meek, pious, humble man our new archbishop is," said they, admiringly; but they little thought that this pparent holiness was merely a mask for inordinate ambition—a cloak to set the power of the priesthood above all law, and to enable the wily prelate to trample the authority of the king beneath his feet.

Becket did not wait for Henry to commence any of his ecclesiastical reforms: he first resigned the chancellorship, that he might break off all friendly communication with the king. Soon after, he summoned the Earl of Clare, a wealthy and popular nobleman, to surrender to him the castle and barony of Tunbridge, on the pretence that, as it had been included in the endowments of Canterbury before the time of the Conqueror, it properly belonged to him as the representative of that see. He also claimed from other barons property which, he said, had been usurped from the church; and, upon the same ground, demanded even from the king the castle of Rochester.

Bold as this conduct was, the ambitious prelate did not stop here. He appointed a monk to a living which was in the gift of a certain William de Eynsford. The intruding monk was violently expelled by the patron of the living; upon which Becket immediately excommunicated him. Eynsford complained to the king; and Henry, who had broken off all friendly intercourse with the encroaching archbishop, sent him a stern command to absolve Eynsford, and remove the curse he had pronounced against him. The proud priest answered, "That it was not for the king to inform him whom he should absolve, and whom excommunicate." On receiving this reply, Henry fell into a violent passion, and threatened Becket with his vengeance; and the archbishop, not being yet familiar with royal anger, reluctantly obeyed the mandate of the king, and absolved his vassal.

It was necessary to the national welfare that the priests should be restrained by the same laws to which laymen were subject; but they could only be summoned before ecclesiastical courts, the judges of which generally viewed the crimes of members of their own profession with so lenient an eye, as almost to confer on them an exemption from punishment. Priests were constantly guilty of crimes of the darkest nature; and when Henry had sat on the throne not more than ten years, it was found that, since his accession, no less than one hundred murders had been perpetrated by them. Most of the priests charged with those crimes escaped with trivial punishment, and none of them received sentence of death. In one instance, a priest in Worcestershire had grossly injured the daughter of a gentleman; and, as if such a wrong was not evil enough, this clerical savage had afterwards murdered the father of the unfortunate young lady. A cry of popular indignation followed this wicked act, and the king demanded that the criminal should be delivered up, and tried by the secular laws of the land. Becket immediately interfered in favour of the miscreant, urged the privileges of the church, put the murderer for protection in the bishop's prison, and finally, only sentenced him to be degraded from the priesthood.

Availing himself of the excitement caused by this circumstance, the king summoned an assembly of all the bishops, and demanded, whether they were willing to submit to the ancient laws and customs of the kingdom? They replied, they were willing to do so, "saving their own order." This evasive answer meant that they would obey the laws when it answered their purpose to do so; but that when the laws interfered with their interests, or checked their excesses, they would still plead their ecclesiastical privileges, and refuse to be tried, except by a clerical court. Henry perfectly understood this, and leaving the assembly in great indignation, he, the next day, deprived Becket of the manor of Eye and the castle of Berkhampstead. The bishops were alarmed, and began to tremble for their own property, so they agreed to obey the laws without any reservation; but Becket still held out until the pope (then Alexander III.) sent his legate, and advised the troublesome archbishop to submit.

Henry, who was supported in this quarrel by his chief barons, was no longer satisfied with the general consent of the bishops to observe the laws of the country, but he drew up a series of articles defining the power of the clergy, and limiting their usurpations. He then summoned the bishops to a great council at Clarendon, in Wiltshire, and required them to set their seals to these conditions. This important meeting, which was a sort of minor reformation, took place on the 25th of January, 1164, and the articles, sixteen in number, were called THE CONSTITUTIONS OF CLARENDON. The principal enactments were, that all causes, except those strictly connected with the church, and entirely confined to ecclesiastical matters, should be tried by the civil courts. The clerks in orders, for civil crimes, should also be tried in civil courts, and should not leave the country without the king's consent. That the bishops should be elected in the presence of the king, and do him homage; and that the sovereign should receive, and appropriate to his own use, the revenues of vacant sees. Appeals to the pope, and the payment of "Peter's pence," a tribute exacted by the pontiffs, were prohibited. The bishops, though they did not approve of these Constitutions, as they saw that the king was no longer to be trifled with, solemnly promised to observe them. Even Becket himself took an oath to abide by them "legally, with good faith, and without fraud or reserve." Pleased with this triumph, the king sent the Constitutions to the pope for his confirmation; but the crafty pontiff, who at once perceived that they would lessen his power in England, immediately rejected them; and then the archbishop, in defiance of the oath he had so recently taken, refused to observe them, and declared that when he took his oath, it was with a mental reservation in favour of his ecclesiastical privileges.

Henry became furious at this perfidious conduct, and determined on the ruin of the trickster, whom no oath could bind—the ingrate, who embittered the life of the king, whose favour had raised him from obscurity. He summoned the archbishop to appear before the council held at Northampton, which found him guilty of a breach of allegiance, and an act of contempt against his sovereign, and inflicted on him a heavy fine. The next day, the king claimed a large sum from Becket which he said he had lent to him, and on the third day he demanded the enormous amount of 44,000 marks, equal in value to about £400,000 of our present money, as a balance due to the crown, which Becket had left unaccounted for during the time he was chancellor.

Becket was astonished. The king would not accept any excuses, but insisted on the payment of a sum which he knew very well the prelate could not pay. Whether the money had been misapplied or not, does not appear; but it certainly had not been accounted for; and the Bishop of London, who hated Becket, sneeringly remarked, that "the archbishop thought, that, as sins were remitted by baptism, so debts were discharged by promotion." For a moment this bold man seems to have trembled at the consequences of his own conduct; but he soon recovered his haughty pride of heart. Feeling convinced that the king had resolved upon his ruin, he yet determined to make another bold effort to retain the power which was crumbling from his grasp.

One morning in the October of the year that he had signed the Constitutions of Clarendon, Becket dressed himself in his pontifical robes, and, proceeding to church, celebrated with great solemnity the mass of St. Stephen, the first martyr. It began with these words—"Princes sat and spake against me." After this plain allusion to the king as an oppressive prince, and to himself as a lowly martyr to pure and high principles, the archbishop rode to court, and entered the royal presence, bearing the cross in his own hand instead of having it carried before him as usual. The king, who was indignant at this parade, and perhaps suspected that Becket intended to excommunicate him, rose abruptly and left the room, followed by all the bishops and barons. Left in the hall with only a few poor frightened priests, the prelate seated himself upon a bench, with the crucifix still held erect before him as a protection.

In a short time the Bishop of Exeter came, and throwing himself on his knees before the unmoved Becket, represented to him the violent passion of the king, and begged him to submit to his sovereign, and thus save himself and his brethren from ruin. The brief and contemptuous answer he received was, "Thou fearest! flee then; thou canst not understand the things that are of God!"

The doors of the apartment into which the king had retired then opened, and all the bishops issued in solemn procession; and pausing before Becket, one of them, speaking for the rest, thus addressed him:—"Thou wast our primate, but we now disavow thee, because, after having promised faith to the king, our common lord, and sworn to maintain his royal customs, thou hast endeavoured to destroy them, and hast broken thine oath. We proclaim thee a traitor, and tell thee we will no longer obey a perjured archbishop, but place ourselves and our cause under the protection of our lord the pope, and summon thee to answer us before him."

A bitter smile played upon the white lips of Becket; in a scornful tone he said, "I hear," and again relapsed into a calm, dignified silence.

Shortly the doors of the inner chamber again opened, and the grim, steel-clad barons entered, preceded by the Earl of Leicester, who began to read a sentence of imprisonment against the fallen priest. Then Becket rose, and fixing his keen eyes upon the noble, said, "Son and earl, hear me first. Thou knowest with how much faith I served the king; with how much reluctance, and only to please him, I accepted my present charge, and in what manner I was declared free from all secular claims whatever. Touching the things which happened before my consecration, I ought not to answer, nor will I answer. You, moreover, are all my children in God, and neither law nor reason permits you to sit in judgment upon your father. I forbid you, therefore, to judge me. I decline your tribunal, and refer my quarrel to the decision of the pope. To him I appeal; and now, under the holy protection of the catholic church and the apostolic see, I depart in peace." Having thus spoken, Becket passed through the scowling crowd of courtiers and attendants, and leaving the palace, mounted his horse and rode away amidst the applause of the people, who regarded him as a saint, and shouted, "Blessed be God who hath delivered his servant from the hands of his enemies."

Becket's appeal to the pope only added to the enmity of the king, because it was settled, by the Constitutions of Clarendon, that to appeal from any English court to the Roman pontiff was an unlawful act. The archbishop, therefore, fearing the results that might arise from his conduct, and believing that his life was not safe, disguised himself as a monk, hurried by night to the sea-coast, embarked in a little boat, and after a fortnight of peril, landed at Gravelines in Flanders.

CHAPTER XIII.

CONTINUATION OF THE REIGN OF HENRY THE SECOND.—A.D. 1164—1172.

FROM the seaport where he landed, Becket proceeded to throw himself at the feet of Pope Alexander, at Sens, and into the hands of that pontiff he resigned his archbishopric. The pope received the fallen prelate very kindly, and gave him an asylum in the noble abbey of Pontigny, in Burgundy. Becket was also encouraged by the King of France and the Earl of Flanders, who were both interested in disturbing the peace of Henry's kingdom; and the arrogant priest then declared that his cause was the cause of God; that he was the champion of heaven; and that in his person Christ was crucified afresh.

These assertions, which were as foolish as they were daring and impious, soon reached the ears of King Henry, and irritated him to such an extent as to drive him to commit an act of shameful injustice. Not content with confiscating all the property of the fugitive archbishop, he banished all his friends and relations, with their wives and children, amounting altogether to 400 persons, and drove them forth to beg or starve in a foreign land. Thus to punish the innocent who were in his power, because he could not avenge himself on the guilty who was beyond it, was both senseless and tyrannical; but it seems that Henry's anger against Becket was so great, that it disturbed the usual strength and coolness of his judgment.

In the second year of his banishment the deposed archbishop ascended the pulpit of the church of Vezelay, during the festival of the Ascension, and, in the presence of a great multitude of people, pronounced a sentence of excommunication against four of the favourite ministers of the king; against every one who supported or obeyed the Constitutions of Clarendon, which he declared to be abrogated or annulled; and he only withheld the curse of Rome from Henry himself upon a pretence that he might give that monarch time for repentance. When Henry heard of this act of the troublesome priest, he fell into a transport of rage so violent as to resemble madness. He tore off his clothes, rolled upon the ground, and gnawed the rushes, then used as carpets, with his teeth.

A war was afterwards carried on between France and England, because the French king supported the cause of Becket; but it terminated in a truce, at which it was proposed that Henry and his rebellious priest should be reconciled. The pope also assisted in bringing about an arrangement, which Henry, although he now bitterly hated Becket, was not averse to; for both pontiff and king were tired of the struggle, and each respected and dreaded the power of the other.

The conference took place at Montmirail, in Perche; the kings of France and England met; and the stern Becket stood once again in the presence of his insulted sovereign. The moment was a solemn one; the peace of a kingdom depended on the submission of the banished priest to the laws of his country. But neither fear nor misfortune could tame the primate: he said he was willing to be reconciled to his king, and obey him in all things, "saving the honour of God and his church."

Struck with the obstinacy of Becket in reverting to the original cause of the dispute, Henry thus addressed the French king:—"Do you know what would happen if I were to admit this reservation? That man would interpret everything displeasing to himself as being contrary to the honour of God, and so would invade all my rights; but to show that I do not withstand God's honour, this is my offer. There have been many kings of England before; some who had more power than I, and others who had less. There have been also before him many archbishops of Canterbury—great and holy men. What the greatest and holiest of his predecessors did unto the least of mine, that let him do unto me, and I am contented therewith." Still Becket insisted on his reservation, saying, "that he would not give up the honour of Christ that he might recover the favour of a man;" and the French king was so struck with Henry's fairness and moderation, that he declared that the archbishop wished to be "greater than the saints, and better than Saint Peter." Disgusted at Becket's arrogance, both the sovereigns mounted their horses and rode away, without taking any further notice of him; and thus the conference ended.

Another attempt at reconciliation was broken off because Henry would not bestow upon the archbishop the kiss of peace. He excused himself from doing so by saying that he had taken an oath never to kiss Becket; but no doubt a sense of natural repugnance prevented him from saluting the man whom he so bitterly disliked. As Becket insisted on every formality, and would not be reconciled without the kiss, and as Henry as resolutely refused to give it, the conference again ended abruptly.

At length, in the summer of 1170, the king and prelate met again at Touraine, in France; and, on the 22nd of July, all difficulties being overcome, peace was made between the king and Becket. The arrangements were exceedingly honourable to the latter, who was restored to his archbishopric, and all claims against him abandoned. The king even humbled himself so far at this meeting as to hold Becket's stirrup while he mounted his horse, when he was setting out to the coast, to embark for England. After six years' absence the exiled priest again trod the soil of his native land, disembarking at Dover on the 1st of December. It might have been expected that, thus restored to his home, and reinstated in his see, Becket would have lived in peace and charity, as became a minister of the word of God; but even before landing in England, he again lighted in it the flames of dissension. In the preceding June the king had caused his eldest son to be crowned, not as his successor, but his colleague. The ceremony was performed by the Archbishop of York, assisted by the Bishops of London and Salisbury; and Becket, who was then in France, and who deemed the right of crowning the sovereign to be inherent in the Archbishop of Canterbury, obtained from the pope letters of excommunication against the three prelates, for what he considered an invasion of his rights. Those letters one of his adherents, who preceded him to England, succeeded in delivering to the three astonished prelates. When the archbishop himself arrived, after a sort of triumphant progress to several towns, he proceeded to Canterbury, and on Christmas-day he ascended his pulpit in the noble cathedral of that city, where he preached a sermon on the words, "I come to you to die among you." He plainly feared the probable consequences of his factious conduct; yet even at this period, when he seems to have been haunted by the dread of assassination, and the grim red-handed shade of murder disturbed his sleep in restless dreams, he would not permit his fears to have an influence upon his actions. The sacred service over, he solemnly excommunicated a knight who was called Ranulf de Broc, and two of his own clergy, who had treated him disrespectfully on his return to England. Descending from his pulpit, the archbishop left the church; he had preached his last sermon, and was never to bless or curse his fellow-creatures more.

King Henry was residing at Bayeux, on the continent, when the Archbishop of York, and the Bishops of London and Salisbury, who had been excommunicated by Becket, entered his presence, and begged him to interfere and restrain the haughty primate. They exclaimed earnestly—"We implore it both for the sake of royalty and the clergy; for your own repose as well as ours. There is a man who sets England on fire; he marches with troops of horse and armed foot, prowling round the fortresses, and trying to get himself received within them." The Archbishop of York added, that so long as Becket lived, the king could never expect to enjoy peace or tranquillity.

Henry at once saw that the apparent reconciliation between him and Becket was valueless; that his personal humiliation to that arrogant priest was in vain; and that the primate would either raise the authority of the church above that of the state, or perish. In a paroxysm of fury he roared out, "How! a fellow that hath eaten my bread, a beggar that first came to my court on a lame horse, dares insult his king, and tread upon the whole kingdom, and not one of the cowards I nourish at my table—not one will deliver me from this turbulent priest."

It seems that, in the hour of passion, the king wished for the death of the archbishop; but there is plenty of evidence to show that he never sanctioned his assassination. He was a prince of too much wisdom not to know the terrible results which such an act would probably bring upon him. A sentence of interdict upon his kingdom, and of excommunication against himself, were, little as we may regard such solemn mockeries now, subjects of awful consideration in those times of superstition, even to the most powerful princes of Europe. The thoughtless words of King Henry were, however, not without effect; the mailed warriors about him were stung at his taunt of cowardice; and four knights, gentlemen of the king's household, whose names were Reginald Fitzurse, William de Tracy, Hugh de Morville, and Richard le Brez, or le Bret, commonly known as Brito—all gentlemen of the king's bed-chamber—having exchanged dark and meaning glances, soon afterwards retired, unsuspected, from the royal presence.

Calling a council of the barons, the king passed some time in considering what should be done to restrain the usurpations of Becket; and, after a little delay, three commissioners were despatched to arrest him on a charge of high treason. In the meantime the four knights crossed the sea to England, and reached Saltwood Castle, near Canterbury, in the night of Monday, the 28th of December. Taking with them twelve retainers, in case they should meet with resistance, these desperate men, on Tuesday the 29th, proceeded to Canterbury, and went to the palace of the archbishop: there, forcing themselves into his presence without any sign of courtesy or respect, they sat down on the ground before him. Proudly, and without any show of fear, did the prelate meet the dark scowling glances that were bent upon him; but for some time neither he nor they spoke a word.

Becket at last broke this strange silence by asking the conspirators what they wanted? Reginald Fitzurse replied, "We come, that you may absolve the bishops whom you have excommunicated, re-establish the bishops whom you have suspended, and answer for your own offences against the king." Rising with stern dignity, the archbishop spoke at some length in a bold and angry tone: he would not, he said, absolve the Archbishop of York, but would extend that grace to the two other bishops, if they would submit themselves to his authority, and to that of Rome.

"But of whom, then," demanded Fitzurse, anxious to involve the prelate in a quarrel, "do you hold your archbishopric—of the king, or of the pope?"

"I owe the spiritual rights to God and the pope," answered Becket, "and the temporal rights to the king."

"How!" exclaimed the knight bluntly, "is it not the king that hath given you all?"

"No!" replied Becket, in an indignant tone, "No! to God, and to his earthly representative, the pope, I owe my spiritual authority, and my worldly wealth to the king?" Then he told his strange visitors that it did not become men of their rank to threaten him beneath his own roof, and added, with an angry frown, that if he were threatened by all the swords in England he would not yield. The knights rose, saying, "We will do more than threaten," and with dark and savage looks strode away, and left the palace.

Shortly afterwards they returned, each encased in armour, and carrying a naked sword; but Becket's servants had shut and barred the palace gates. Fitzurse beat against them with his heavy mace, but the sturdy doors would not yield. At length the solemn voices of the monks were heard singing vespers in the cathedral; the palace gates were thrown open at the command of the fearless archbishop, and he appeared, preceded by a monk, carrying the sacred crucifix before him. Doubtless he thought this holy symbol of the Christian faith and the Saviour's agony would be his protection; it was only an emblem of his approaching fate. With slow and dignified steps he crossed the cloister, and entered the sacred edifice. His terrified attendants would have closed and fastened the doors, but he forbade them. "The house of God," he said, "was not to be barricaded like a castle. It will protect us sufficiently without being shut; nor did I come hither to resist, but to suffer." The winter's evening was already closing in; the grey mantle of twilight had descended upon the earth; and the vast and gorgeous church was dimly lighted by a small lamp burning here and there before some saintly shrine. Becket reached the altar at the same moment that the fierce and resolute Fitzurse entered the church, brandishing his drawn sword, and shouting, "Follow me, loyal servants of the king." In an instant the four knights entered, and the noble building echoed with the heavy tramp of steel-clad feet upon its stone pavement.

"Where is Thomas à Becket—where is the traitor!" said one of the knights. There was no answer. "Where," exclaimed Reginald Fitzurse: "where is the archbishop?" "Here am I," answered Becket: "no traitor, but a priest. What would you have with me? I am ready to suffer in the name of Him who redeemed me with His blood. God forbid that I should fly for fear of your swords, or recede from justice." "Come hither!" said Tracy, seizing him roughly by the arm; "thou art a prisoner." The blood-shot eyes of the prelate gleamed with a haughty fire as he shook off his assailant with a force that made him stagger; then, turning to Fitzurse, he said, with mild dignity—"Reginald, I have done thee many favours; why comest thou with armed men into my church?" The knight answered, that he must instantly absolve the bishops. "Never," said he, resolutely: "never, until they have offered satisfaction." "Then die!" roared Fitzurse, whose sword, gleaming for a moment in the air, descended the next on the head of Becket. The monk who bore the crucifix held out his arm to ward off the blow; but the arm was broken, and the weapon inflicted a deep red gash on the shaved scalp of the archbishop. Nearly blinded by the blood which poured down his face, he bowed his head, and exclaimed—"To God and to Saint Mary, to the patrons of this church and to Saint Denis, I commend my soul and the church's cause." The savage and wicked deed was soon accomplished; a second blow felled the archbishop on the steps of the altar; a third cleft his skull; while the fourth knight, placing his foot upon the lifeless body, exclaimed—"Thus perishes a traitor!" The murderers fled; the monks rushed in terror to the cathedral, to behold the mangled body of their chief; and a cry of terror and execration arose that night in the city of Canterbury.

Thus, during the Christmas of 1170, perished the bold and ambitious Thomas à Becket, in the fifty-second year of his age.

It is impossible to peruse this narrative without being convinced that Becket was a man of extraordinary abilities; possessing the most heroic courage, wonderful firmness, and remarkable talents for either ecclesiastical or secular government. It is to be regretted that his life was not employed more happily for himself, and more usefully for his fellow-creatures. Much as we may regret that death overtook him in a manner so shocking, and much as we may condemn and detest the ruffians who murdered him, we can scarcely regret his death itself. Had he lived, he would have thrown the whole nation into confusion, perhaps even into a civil war. The great error of his life was, that he mistook ambition for religion, and submission to himself for honour to God: his sincerity we need not doubt; but his judgment we must strongly condemn. The most commendable part of his character was his profuse charity; the most reprehensible his ingratitude to the king, who had raised him from obscurity, and cherished him as his personal friend.

Many of the superior clergy were not sorry to hear of his death; and the Archbishop of York, whom he had excommunicated, stated from his pulpit, that the murder of the unhappy Becket was a signal infliction of Almighty vengeance upon him for his pride and malice. The people generally mourned for him as a martyr, and declared that miracles were wrought at his tomb. It was even confidently asserted and believed, that while the mangled corpse lay in the choir of the church, the right hand slowly raised itself, and made the sign of the cross in benediction of the collected multitude. The eyes also, which had been struck out by the blows of the murderers, were said to have been miraculously replaced by two smaller ones, of different colours. Indeed, no less than five volumes were filled with an account of these miracles, which, according to the author of the work (a monk who, of course, had plenty of time to invent such things), amounted to no less than two hundred and seventy-two. Many of them were very silly, and some more like stories from the Arabian Nights' Entertainments, than an account of the actions of a Christian archbishop. For instance, we are told that a bird that had been taught to speak, having accidentally flown out of its cage, perceived a hawk circling in the air, and ready to pounce down upon it. But the talking bird seemed to have been a very religious little bird; for, in its terror, it called out—"Saint Thomas, help me." Upon this the saint appears to have interfered; for the hawk immediately fell dead, and the devout little warbler escaped. Such, according to this account, was the great holiness of Becket, that even during his lifetime, the Virgin Mary herself condescended to be his sempstress, and sewed his shirt with red silk! Many more of these bold absurdities might be related; but, as old Speed very justly remarks, such "forgeries are only fit for monks to indite, children to read, and fools to believe."

When King Henry heard of the death of the archbishop, he was filled with apprehensions for the consequences, mingled, perhaps, with something of sorrow for the dreadful fate of the man whom he had once loved. He shut himself up in his chamber, and for three days would receive neither food nor consolation; and he sent messengers to the pope to declare his innocence, and express his deep sorrow at the unhappy circumstance. At first these messengers were very coldly received, and Henry expected that his fears would be verified by the pope's pronouncing the dreaded sentence of excommunication against him; but as the king made the most humble submission to the pontiff, took a solemn oath on the gospels and on many sacred relics, of his innocence, and it is even insinuated, distributed his gold very freely among the cardinals, the pope admitted that he believed him guiltless, and suffered him to be reconciled to the church. Two years after the death of Becket the pope canonised him; his body was placed in a magnificent shrine, rendered more gorgeous by innumerable presents of jewels and other costly articles; and the name of the gifted and ambitious son of the London tradesman occupied a place in the calendar, as Saint Thomas à Becket. As to the cathedral where the murder was committed, it was considered desecrated; the bells were not rung; whilst all the hangings were taken from the walls, and the crucifixes veiled, the services being conducted in the chapter-house, without chanting, till the 21st of December, 1171, when the building was re-consecrated with great solemnity.

Attention must now be directed to the affairs of Ireland; which country, in 1171, the powerful Henry annexed to his dominions. He had long contemplated the conquest of Ireland, and had even obtained a bull (as the papal edicts or ordinances are called) from the pope, giving his sanction to the scheme, and charging the inhabitants of the doomed island to submit to the English king as their lawful sovereign. But Henry's hands were so full of other business, and he was so occupied by his quarrel with Becket, that for a long time he laid the pope's bull aside, and kept its existence a secret. Ireland, however, was destined to fall beneath his sway, not so much from the power of his sword, as from the quarrels of its own inhabitants.

In the early part of Henry's reign, Ireland was divided into five different kingdoms, which were called Munster, Leinster, Meath, Ulster, and Connaught. Each of these had its own king; but Roderic O'Connor, King of Connaught, was, by common consent, regarded as the supreme sovereign, and nominal lord of the whole island. The Irish were Christians, and many of their clergy were very learned men; but the people were extremely savage and barbarous. Dermot Macmorrogh, or MacMurchad (for his name is differently spelt) was the King of Leinster. He was a man of great size and ferocity; and on one occasion, when he thought his nobles were getting too much power, he suddenly seized seventeen of them, put several to death, and tore out the eyes of the remainder. Tiernan O'Ruarc, the lord of Breffny, a large district in Leinster, and the determined foe of Macmorrogh, had a very beautiful wife, named Dovergilda. This lady, who, it seems, was quite as false as she was beautiful, encouraged the fierce King of Leinster to seize and carry her off with him during the absence of her husband. Macmorrogh did not require much invitation, so he not only ran away with the lady, but with a good deal of her husband's property into the bargain. In consequence of this outrage, a petty war was kept up between him and O'Ruaro for several years; and the latter, being at last assisted by the King of Connaught, and by many of Macmorrogh's own subjects, who were disgusted with his tyranny, the seducer was driven from his kingdom, and compelled to flee to England for safety.

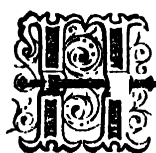
Macmorrogh, however, was not the sort of man to be easily subdued, and he determined at any sacrifice to regain his lost sovereignty. He landed at Bristol in the summer of 1167, intending to solicit the assistance of the English king, of whose wisdom and power he had heard so much. Henry was at Guienne, on the continent, and there the exiled Irishman went to seek him. He was received with great courtesy by the English monarch, who had not forgotten his own project of invading Ireland; but he was not then prepared for so important an action, so he merely received an oath of allegiance from Macmorrogh, who promised to be his true vassal and subject. This he did in the hope that Henry would undertake his cause, and place him on his throne again; but that cautious monarch only gave him letters patent, by which he empowered all his subjects, who were so disposed, to assist the Irish prince to recover his dominions.

Macmorrogh showed the king's letters to a great many nobles and adventurers, and made them liberal promises if they would assist him; but for a long time none of them seemed inclined to do so. At length, a son of the Earl of Pembroke, Richard de Clare, Earl of Strigbul [Chepstow], who was commonly known as Earl Strongbow, entered into an arrangement with him, by which he was to collect such an army as would replace Macmorrogh on his throne, on condition that the Irish king gave him his daughter Eva in marriage, and secured him the succession to his kingdom. After this, Macmorrogh went into Wales, where he was fortunate enough to enlist two young nobles in his cause, and then returned privately to his own country.

Maurice Fitzgerald and Robert Fitzstephens, the Welsh allies of the deposed Irish prince, first sailed to his assistance in 1169, each with a small body of troops; but they were well armed, and well disciplined, so they soon proved their superiority to the native Irish, and Macmorrogh was again made King of Leinster. After one of the battles which took place before this event was accomplished, 300 newly-severed heads were brought and piled in heaps at the feet of Macmorrogh; the savage prince turned them over one by one, to see if he knew any of them. At last he recognised the head of a man who had been his bitter enemy; taking it by the hair, he uttered a cry of joy, and, thanking God for his triumph, he, like a merciless and beastly savage, bit away the nose and lips of the ghastly object.

Encouraged by their success, Macmorrogh and his English friends now contemplated obtaining the sovereignty of the whole island; but before they attempted so bold an exploit, they wrote to Earl Strongbow, who, though he had been collecting troops, had not yet set foot in Ireland. Strongbow arrived in the month of September, 1170, bringing with him a small, but well-appointed army. They marched almost immediately upon the city of Waterford, overcame the citizens, slaughtering them without mercy, leaving the streets filled with fearful heaps of mangled corpses, and many of the houses blackened masses of charred and smoking ruins. Here they were joined by Macmorrogh and his other friends, Fitzgerald and Fitzstephen; and there at once, before the piles of dead were hidden beneath the blood-soaked dust of that desolate city, was Earl Strongbow married to the Princess Eva.

Again the banners of the invaders floated proudly in the air, and the English were on their march to Dublin; and there again they were joined by the fierce Macmorrogh, who had led his native Irish troops by a short way among the mountains. The inhabitants, terrified at the power and success of their foreign enemies, would have purchased peace on almost any terms; but the cruel invaders, who seem to have banished all feelings of humanity from their mailed bosoms, assaulted the city, murdered, plundered, and burnt in every direction; and Dublin became, also, a heap of ruins. Soon after this, Macmorrogh died, and Strongbow became sovereign of Leinster, in the right of his wife Eva, with a good chance of becoming king of the entire island. The native Irish princes, alarmed at their danger, besieged Dublin, where Strongbow was then posted, with an army of 30,000 men; but he soon defeated them, and then there remained no one in Ireland so bold as to challenge his authority.



King Henry had not been indifferent to what was passing in Ireland; he had permitted Strongbow and his associates to hunt down the prey, but he was resolved that none but himself should seize and enjoy it, so he sent a command to the earl to appear before him in person. Strongbow accordingly went to England, and appeased the anger of the king by the most humble submission. He surrendered into his hands the city of Dublin, and all the other towns and forts which he held along the coast of Ireland; upon which Henry permitted him to retain his other possessions so long as he acknowledged himself a vassal of the English crown. Then the king, who had collected a powerful army, embarked with it for Ireland, taking with him Earl Strongbow; and, in the autumn of 1171, they landed at a place called the Crook, near Waterford.

Henry and his army made a triumphant progress through Ireland, and received the homage of its native princes, who readily submitted to his authority. He remained some months in the green island, and held his court at Dublin, where a temporary building of wicker-work was constructed for his accommodation. The Irish nobles were astonished at his wealth and magnificence; and no less astonished at seeing the powerful English king and his courtiers dining upon roasted cranes, which the latter esteemed a great luxury, but the former regarded as loathsome and unnatural. However, when they feasted with the king, they were persuaded to taste the cranes, and at length ate them with as great a relish as the English did. At the present day, people are much too apt to fancy customs that they are not familiar with to be offensive or ridiculous, which, on a further acquaintance, are found to be both pleasing and reasonable. Forbearance and courtesy towards people whose habits and manners are strange and odd to us, is not the least important of the many lessons taught by the perusal of history.—After his successes, King Henry remained in Ireland until April, 1172, on account of the stormy state of the weather; and then, embarking at Wexford, set sail for England.—Thus was Ireland brought into subjection to the English rule.

CHAPTER XIV.

CONCLUSION OF THE REIGN OF HENRY THE SECOND.—A.D. 1172—1189.

ENRY was now at the height of human power and prosperity. He had, by immense concessions, entirely appeased the anger of the pope, who, on account of the murder of Becket, had been exceedingly irritated against him; and he was at peace with his clergy, who had learned to respect his great talents, and bow deferentially to his authority. He was esteemed by his people at home for his good government; and admired or feared by all the princes of Europe for his wisdom and power. The French king, and some other continental sovereigns, were jealous of this prosperity, and through their schemes the great English king received a painful blow from a quarter where he had every reason to expect obedience and affection. This blow was inflicted by the hands of his own children.

At this period of his reign (1172), King Henry had four sons—Henry, who was eighteen years of age; Richard, sixteen; Geoffrey, fifteen; and John, five. His first-born, William, died young. The king had made a princely provision for all his sons. The eldest, Henry, he named his successor in the kingdom of England, the duchy of Normandy, and the counties of Anjou, Maine, and Touraine. Richard was to have the duchy of Guienne, and county of Poictou. Geoffrey was to succeed to Brittany; and Ireland was to recognise John as its future sovereign. By this arrangement each of his sons would be a prince and ruler; and no sovereign in Europe could have left to his children a more brilliant and wealthy patrimony. But these sons, so loved and cared for, were destitute of natural affection, and, instead of being a glory and a blessing to their father, became his curse and source of sorrow.

Henry, the eldest, who had, as previously mentioned, been married, while a child, to Margaret, the infant daughter of the French king, was crowned King of England during the lifetime of his father, in order to remove any chance of dispute as to his succession. So fond was the royal father of his vain and foolish son, that, at the feast which followed the coronation, he even waited upon the prince at table. It would have been graceful in the young man not to have accepted this humiliating instance of affection on the part of his father; but if his royal parent insisted upon it, he should, at least, have received it with thankful gratitude. A very different feeling, however, appears to have influenced him; for when his father observed that "never king was more royally served," the arrogant prince turned to his courtiers, and remarked, "that it was nothing extraordinary if the son of a count should serve the son of a king!"

Prince Henry and his bride, Margaret, were crowned at the same time; and they then went on a visit to the court of the lady's father, the King of France. Louis VII., who was jealous of the great power of Henry, and anxious to injure him in any way, took the opportunity afforded by this visit of poisoning the mind of the young prince against his own father, and exciting him to rebellion. He told the ungrateful youth, who readily listened to him, that, as he was crowned, he had a right either to the throne of England, or the ducal chair of Normandy. The prince, acting upon this pernicious advice, upon his return to England, demanded either one or the other of those countries from his father, that he and his queen might have the means of supporting their lofty rank. To demand his father's crown while that father was in the full maturity of mind and person, and a hundred-fold better capable of governing than himself, was both insolent and ridiculous; but the prince pretended to be much astonished when this strange demand was refused; made use of some abrupt and disrespectful language to his royal parent; and, soon after, fled secretly to France. The king's wife, Eleanor, was a jealous and revengeful woman; her husband's neglect had aroused in her a spirit of bitterness towards him; so she persuaded her sons Richard and Geoffrey that they also had a right to the possessions of their father during his life, and urged them to fly and join their brother at the French court. The ungrateful boys adopted their mother's advice; and the queen, after disguising herself as a man, was about to follow them; but Henry being informed of her intention, she was arrested by his order, and thrown into prison, where she remained for a period of sixteen years.

King Henry sent ambassadors to the French court, to demand that his sons should be given up to him; but Louis answered, that there was no King of England except the young Prince Henry; and he then took an oath to assist the son in driving the father out of his kingdom. The rebellious boys were also joined by many discontented English barons, who disliked the strictness of Henry's just government, and longed for a return of the times when they used to issue from their massive stone castles, plunder the surrounding country, burn the villages, and murder travellers for their property. Such enormities they had committed with impunity during the unhappy reign of Stephen; and they sighed for a return of that age of unchecked violence. The King of Scotland also entered into an alliance with the unnatural sons of King Henry.

Father and sons both applied to the pope, who, to his credit, refused to sanction the unnatural behaviour of the latter, and even excommunicated them; but as the interests of the clergy were not concerned in the struggle, they did not much interfere, and the excommunication was found to possess very little effect. These strange papal denunciations seem only to have been powerful in the cause of mischief. As the curse of words failed to restore the princes to a sense of their duty, the curse of war followed. Several petty battles took place between the troops of King Henry on the one side, and the armies of his sons and their abettors on the other; but the active Henry, who had purchased the assistance of 20,000 Brabançons, was on each occasion the victor.

The French king then desired a peace: Henry was not averse to this; for the heart of the father shrunk from making war upon his sons. The two monarchs met in an open plain between Gisors and Trie; and Henry had the grief of beholding his three graceless sons in the retinue of his mortal enemy He made them the most liberal and extravagant offers if they would only lay down their arms and return to him, as sons to a father; and to his eldest, Henry, he promised even half the revenues of his kingdom upon that simple condition. Perhaps these noble and touching offers might have been accepted; but the Earl of Leicester, who had taken the side of the princes, and no doubt dreaded a reconciliation, offered so gross an insult to King Henry, that the meeting broke up in confusion.

Henry was now threatened by wars abroad, and rebellions at home; his eldest son and the French king attacked the frontiers of Normandy; Geoffrey again drew the sword against his father in Brittany; and Richard, who afterwards became so famous a warrior, headed an army against him in Poictou and Guienne. The great-hearted king was soon in the field, and his valour and activity were rapidly beating down the opposition of his ungrateful children, when he was suddenly recalled to England by the news that the Scots were devastating its northern counties, that the standard of rebellion was raised against him by several powerful barons, and that his eldest son and the Earl of Flanders were then upon the seas, with a formidable fleet, ready for the invasion of England. For a moment Henry's heroic spirit seems to have quailed under these numerous dangers; the ingratitude of his children pierced his heart, and sat heavily upon his soul. His enemies were endeavouring to rob him of the affections of the people by reviving the memory of Becket's murder, and charging him with the guilt of its perpetration. Grief inclines the mind to religion; the spirit bruised by man seeks consolation by trying to approach nearer to God; the king also felt it was necessary to disabuse the popular mind of any prejudice which might exist against him with respect to the death of Becket; and he adopted a very singular means of accomplishing this end, and, at the same time, pouring out the sorrows of his overcharged heart.

Hurrying over to England, he landed at Southampton on the 8th of July, 1174, from whence he immediately rode to Canterbury, travelling all night, and taking no refreshment but bread and water. When he came in sight of the majestic towers of the cathedral, he dismounted from his horse, and taking off his sandals, walked the rest of the distance barefooted. With lacerated and bleeding feet, on the 10th of July he entered the sacred pile, and descending into the crypt, threw himself, in an agony of tears, upon the grave of the archbishop. He seems to have made the clergy aware of his intention; for the Bishop of London then ascended the pulpit, and delivered a kind of apology for the unhappy monarch to the multitude of people who had collected to see this strange instance of royal humiliation. "Be it known to you," said the bishop, "as many as are here present, that Henry, King of England, invoking, for his soul's salvation, God and the holy martyrs, solemnly protests before you all, that he never ordered, or knowingly caused, or even desired, the death of the saint; but, as possibly the murderers took advantage of some words imprudently pronounced, he has come to do penance before the bishops here assembled, and has consented to submit his naked flesh to the rods of discipline."

When the bishop had concluded his discourse, the king rose from the grave of Becket, on which he had been lying prostrate, walked through the church and cloisters to the chapter-house, and taking off the upper part of his dress, he knelt, and presented his naked back to be scourged by all the bishops and monks there present, amounting to about eighty. A more extraordinary scene than this, perhaps, never occurred in any age or country; the most powerful king in Europe, kneeling, half naked, with matted hair and haggard looks, to be scourged by a number of priests, in expiation of a sin which he had never committed. The bishops and abbots first approached with their knotted cords, and each of them gave the king several lashes, saying, as he did so, "Even as Christ was scourged for the sins of men, so be thou scourged for thine own sins." The monks followed the bishops and abbots, and the king knelt the whole time, and received a portion of his punishment from every one. There is little doubt but that the blows were lightly dealt; for the monks looked some day to be abbots, the abbots to be bishops, and the bishops to be archbishops; and they all knew, however depressed in spirits or fortune Henry was at that moment, that he was a talented prince, and would probably soon be again in possession of his usual cheerfulness and power. When the whipping was over, the king descended again to the vaults of the cathedral, and there, amidst the damp and gloomy resting-places of the dead, he threw himself once more upon the grave of the murdered Becket. In this loathsome charnel-house he remained the whole day and night, passing his time in tears and prayers. When the morning broke, when the birds chirped and carolled on the green boughs which waved gently outside the sculptured walls, and the rich rays of a midsummer sun streamed through the painted windows of the vast edifice, the king rose, and leaving the vault, went into the body of the cathedral, and prayed before all the altars and relics. The penance was then completed; and having drank some holy water, Henry mounted his horse and rode away to London. Some writers have accused him of hypocrisy in this strange act of penitential devotion; but, when we consider his political difficulties, and his domestic sorrows, things which will bow down the minds and soften the hearts of the strongest men, extraordinary as the proceeding was, there is good reason to believe that he was sincere in the performance of it.

When the king reached his palace he was seized with a burning fever, the natural results of the exposure and fatigue he had undergone. For five days and nights he lay parched and restless, and then word was brought him that the King of Scots—known as William the Lion, from the device of the king of beasts borne on his shield—was taken prisoner. Instantly he was another man; his illness left him as if by magic; his whole strength of body and hilarity of mind returned, and he was soon again on horseback at the head of a numerous army of his own subjects; for the people pitied their king, whose troubles proceeded from his unnatural children, and they flocked to his standard in thousands. The Scots were humbled, and glad to sue for peace; the English rebels laid down their arms, and bought their pardon by the surrender of their castles; the Earl of Flanders, baffled and humbled, was glad to be reconciled with the great English king; and two of the rebellious princes, Henry and Geoffrey, submitted to their father. The turbulent young Richard, who already loved fighting for fighting's sake, held out for a little while longer; but he, too, was soon glad to lay down his arms, and accept the forgiveness of his generous sire. The extreme clemency of Henry to these vanquished foes was remarkable in that age of sternness and cruelty. The only one to whom he dealt with severity was the King of Scotland, whose attack upon him, in favour of his rebellious sons, had been most ungenerous and uncalled for. Henry kept that monarch in prison until he consented to sacrifice the independence of his kingdom, and, on his knees, acknowledge himself to be the vassal of the English crown. Much of this wonderful success of Henry in war was no doubt attributable to his untiring industry. He travelled from place to place with a rapidity which astonished his foes, and drew from his old enemy, the French king, the remark, that "The King of England neither rides on land, nor sails on water, but flies through the air like a bird. In a moment he flits from Ireland to England, in another from England to France."

And now, for eight happy years, peace prevailed in England; summer and winter came and went, and the sword remained in its scabbard; seed-time and harvest-time succeeded each other; the earth was watered by the sweet dews of heaven, and not by the blood of its children; and plenty and prosperity smiled in the homesteads of the humblest. During this period Henry greatly improved the system of jurisprudence, and the administration of the laws. He abolished the practice of commuting, by fines, the commission of murder, and other heinous crimes; those fines being, not in accordance with the wealth of the accused, but, in the cases of murder, varied according to the rank and position of the victim. He improved the imperfect jury system which then existed, and rendered it nearly the same as it is at present; and he instituted the circuits through the provinces, to be annually taken by the judges for the administration of justice. The trial by ordeal still existed; but it was greatly modified, and was not often resorted to; and the trial by jury was made the rule, that by ordeal the exception. Henry also took measures for the defence of the country; ordaining, that all who possessed land should provide themselves with arms, and be ready to come forward in the service of their country when required.

At the end of this period—in 1183—King Henry's sons began to quarrel among themselves; the princes Henry and Geoffrey making war upon their brother Richard. The king, who seems to have dearly loved them all, interposed and made peace between them; but these unnatural sons and brothers were incapable of long remaining in concord together; and Prince Geoffrey even declared, that "they could never possibly live in peace with one another, unless united in a common war against their own father." Shortly afterwards Prince Henry again revolted against his father; but, in about a month, deserted his followers, and besought his parent's forgiveness. It was instantly accorded; and shortly after he again deserted and betrayed his noble and affectionate sire; and, joining his brother Geoffrey, who also was in arms against his father, prepared to give him battle. The wicked career of this modern Absalom, who seemed so anxious to become a parricide, was suddenly arrested by a power alike heedless of hypocrisy, and deaf to entreaties. A sudden illness seized him at Château-Martel, near Limoges; and the treacherous prince himself felt that the hand of death was upon him. In this situation he was seized with an agony of remorse for his perfidious conduct to his father, for whom he sent, imploring him to visit and forgive him. The royal parent would have hurried to the bedside of his repentant son, but his advisers very properly represented, that this message might be a falsehood, and a snare laid to effect his assassination. He was compelled to admit the probability of such a revolting circumstance; so, taking a ring from his finger, he sent it to his dying son, as a token of his forgiveness and affection.

The ring was presented; the guilty and wretched prince pressed it earnestly to his lips, and begged the attendant priests to drag him, with a rope, out of bed, and lay him on a heap of ashes, that he might expire in an act of penance for his numerous and monstrous deeds of filial ingratitude. Death soon closed this scene of terror; and in 1183, the royal profligate, then in his twenty-seventh year, breathed his last. When King Henry heard of the death of his son he was seized with the deepest affliction; three times did that strong man faint away; and then, with many tears, he accused himself of hard-heartedness for refusing the last request of the prince.

After the burial of Henry, Prince Geoffrey craved and received his father's forgiveness; and for a few months this strange family lived in peace. Then the covetous or ambitious Geoffrey suddenly demanded of his father the earldom of Anjou, and, meeting with a refusal, once again fled to the French court, and levied troops to fight against his father. But it seemed as if the hand of God interposed to punish these ungrateful sons; for, soon after Geoffrey's arrival in France [A.D. 1186], he was dismounted at a tournament, and trampled to death beneath the feet of the horses who were prancing proudly round the gaudy lists. He left a widow, the Lady Constance, who, soon after his death, became a mother; her child was named Arthur; he was the unhappy Prince Arthur whose sad tragedy, during the reign of his uncle John, has always excited so much grief and pity.

Louis VII. of France was dead; and his son, Philip II., a bold and clever prince, succeeded him. Philip gave Geoffrey a very grand funeral, and then invited King Henry's third son, Richard, to come and see him. Richard accepted the invitation, and he and Philip lived together, apparently in great concord and affection. But the crafty young King of France had his ends to serve; and the result of this visit was, that Richard once more [A.D. 1187] rebelled against his father, once more failed in his wicked design, and once more received the pardon of his fond, forgiving parent.

In a preceding chapter, the efforts which were made throughout Europe to rescue the tomb of the Saviour from the hands of the Turks and Saracens, have been mentioned. After hundreds of thousands of men had perished by the fatigues of the journey, by sickness, and by the sword, the soldiers of the cross triumphed; Jerusalem was taken, its inhabitants butchered with a frightful ferocity, and the conquerors, with blood-bespattered arms and faces, threw themselves upon the ground before the tomb of Jesus, and gave way to the most extravagant acts of devotion. Jerusalem was captured in the year 1099, and the famous Godfrey of Bouillon was crowned king of the Holy City. But the Saracens, though crushed for a time, again made head, and reduced their Christian conquerors to great distress. A second crusade was undertaken in 1147, in which more than 200,000 men are said to have perished; but still the Christians were unable to retain their supremacy, and at length a Saracen prince, of great bravery and talent, named Saladin, drove them from Jerusalem [A.D. 1187], and established himself as its ruler. When this news reached Europe, Pope Urban III. is said to have died of grief in consequence; and his successors, Gregory and Clement, devoted themselves to exhort the potentates of Europe to revive this terrible contest. The English king responded to the call, and so did Philip of France; both of them received the symbol of the cross from the hands of the Archbishop of Tyre, and both solemnly swore to become soldiers of Christ, and "brothers-in-arms for the cause of God."

War, however, cannot be carried on without money; so Henry imposed a heavy tax upon his people, for the purpose of getting ready an army to go to Jerusalem; and as this tax did not yield a sufficient sum to enable him to accomplish his intention, he sullied his usual justice by extorting an immense amount from the Jews. But an event occurred, which not only prevented Henry from going to the Holy Land, but shortened and embittered the remainder of his existence.

His son Richard had been affianced, when a boy, to the Lady Alice, or Adelais, the sister of Philip the French king. When the parties were old enough for the marriage to be solemnised, the lady was residing at the English court; but Richard, who was at war with his father, was of course absent from it. The prince was not an ardent lover; indeed, he seems to have been quite indifferent about the princess, and never even claimed her until a strange report was spread abroad that his father himself loved her. Whether this was true, or a mere idle tale, cannot now be determined; but it should be remembered that Henry was in his fifty-sixth year, and it is rational to suppose that so wise a monarch would not, at that age, endeavour to win the affections of a young girl, especially of one who was engaged to his own son. It does not seem, either, that Prince Richard believed the rumour; or, indifferent as he was to the attractions of the princess, he would not, under such circumstances, have been willing to fulfil his engagement of marrying her.

But Richard, who feared that his father intended to disinherit him for his repeated acts of ingratitude, and place his younger brother John on the throne instead, now imperatively demanded the hand of the Princess Alice, and also that his father should proclaim him heir both to the crown of England and his continental possessions. Henry, who remembered how his eldest son had behaved to him after such an act of generosity, resolutely refused. Richard was indignant; he joined the French king [A.D. 1188], and defied his father; and the English king rushed from the scene of meeting, his heart breaking with grief at the conduct of his children. The iron constitution of Henry now gave way; his affections had been repeatedly trampled upon by those whom he most loved; he lost his health and activity; he experienced several reverses in war; many of his barons deserted him and joined his son; sickness and sorrow paralysed his efforts; and the almost broken-hearted king was compelled, in this prostrate condition, to purchase peace from his own son and the French king upon any terms they were pleased to dictate.

Among other conditions, he was required to pardon all his barons and vassals who had deserted him to join Richard. He consented to do so; indeed, he consented to everything demanded from him, for a dim apathy had clouded his great and once active mind, and he seemed regardless both of the extent of the demands made upon him, and the humility of his concessions. With a heavy sigh he turned in his bed, and desired to see the list of the traitors whom he was to forgive. It was handed to him, and the first name upon it was that of his youngest and darling son, John—the only one of his legitimate children who had never before rebelled or fought against him. Until that sad moment he had been ignorant of this wicked desertion, and the knowledge of it fell upon him like a thunderbolt. With a cry of despair he started up in his bed, his sunken eyes glared wildly, and his white lips quivered as he asked, in tones of hysterical agony, "Is it true that John, the child of my heart, whom I have loved and cherished more than all the rest, and for love of whom I have drawn down on my head all these troubles, hath verily betrayed me?" The envoys told him that it was even so. Falling back in his bed despairingly, and turning his face to the wall, the broken-hearted king exclaimed, "Now let everything go as it will; I have no longer any care for myself or the world."

His attendants removed their dying sovereign to the beautiful castle of Chinon, near Saumur, by the side of which flowed the river Loire; it had been a favourite spot of his in happier times, but its pleasant scenery brought him no consolation then. It was evident that his last hour was approaching; his mind wandered, and he now and then uttered some rambling exclamations with reference to his fallen fortunes and the ingratitude of his children. "Shame!" he cried, "oh, shame! a conquered king! I a conquered king! Cursed be the day on which I was born, and cursed of God the children I leave behind me." Soon afterwards he sighed heavily and sank back into the arms of his natural son Geoffrey, who had ever been most affectionate and dutiful to him: the trials of the royal father were over—he was no more.

He died on the 6th of July, 1189, in the fifty-sixth year of his age, and the thirty-fifth of his reign. No sooner was he dead than his body was deserted by his attendants, who stripped it of everything of value, and even robbed the room of its furniture. At length the last duties of the survivors were paid to the dead monarch; his body was conveyed to the abbey of Fontevraud, and there it was met by Prince Richard, who seems to have experienced some feelings of remorse for the unnatural conduct which had caused his father's death. Uncovering the face of the corpse, which still bore an awful expression of mental anguish, he gazed upon it for some time in a sorrowful manner; then shudderingly replacing the cere-cloth, he knelt for a little while in prayer. He had not been more guilty than his brothers; but it was his last act of parricidal rebellion that had cleft his father's heart, and brought him prematurely to the grave with anguish. There was an old superstition, universally believed by our ancestors, that the body of a murdered man would burst out bleeding afresh at the touch or presence of its murderer. It was reported that the corpse of King Henry bled from the nostrils on the appearance of his son Richard. Of course this could not have happened, for, at the moment of death, the blood flows back into the heart, and the little which is left in the veins congeals into a mass, and loses its fluid state. It could not, therefore, have poured from the body except by a miracle; and we know that miracles ceased from the time that the apostles were called from the earth to an eternity of glory. They were performed as evidences of the divine origin of the religion of the heaven-descended Jesus; and that object accomplished, they ceased for ever. But though we must reject this story respecting the body of King Henry, it is mentioned to show that, even then, despite the brilliancy of his rank and the amount of his power, the future King of England was regarded by his people as a parricide.

Very different accounts exist of King Henry's personal character; and he certainly seems to have been a singular mixture of both virtues and vices. That he was the most illustrious of the Norman kings that had yet ruled England, and that his long reign was productive of many blessings to the country, cannot easily be disputed. He found the land in ruin, and the people in despair; he left the one prosperous, and the other contented. His ambition was enormous; and he used to say, in his hours of triumph, that the whole world was not too much for the dominion of one great man. He never hesitated to serve this ambition by any means in his power; and he is said to have been a perfect master of dissimulation, and to have hesitated at no falsehood if it could promote his aims. He was also exceedingly passionate, and impatient of all contradiction, resembling a tiger in his fits of fury; an unfaithful husband, and much attached to pleasure. On the other hand, he was dignified, generous, and very affectionate to those to whom he was attached. He did not possess that cruelty which so often disgraced the characters of princes of his time; but though haughty and overbearing to the proud, he was gentle to the distressed, and affable to the poor. He was graceful and engaging in conversation, very moderate at table, fond of literature and discussion, singularly industrious, and capable of bearing much fatigue without injury.

A singular story is told, which admirably illustrates his indifference to the pleasures of good living. One day the monks and prior of Saint Swithin presented themselves before him, and, in a very lamentable manner, complained, that the Abbot of Winchester, who was also their abbot, had cut off three dishes from their table. "Indeed," said the king; "and how many has he left you?" "Only ten," replied these gluttonous monks, who tried to look at him as lean and miserable as their well-fed and comfortable state would permit. "Ten!" exclaimed Henry in astonishment; "why, I myself only have three dishes at my table, and I shall enjoin your bishop to reduce yours to the same number." The looks of the disappointed monks, as they retired from the presence of their austere sovereign, must have been downcast and ridiculous enough. This luxury on their part was doubtless the more offensive to the temperate Henry, from the fact, that the Normans, though very choice in their eating, were seldom guilty of the coarse gluttony, and excessive drinking, which characterised the Saxons. There is an old Norman proverb, which shows that the manners of that people were simple and temperate. It runs thus:—

To rise at five, to dine at nine,
To sup at five, to bed at nine,
Makes a man live to ninety-nine.

This proverb gives also some idea of the domestic arrangements of our Norman ancestors. With all their vices and foibles, they were unacquainted with that great modern folly of turning night into day.

A very interesting description of Henry's personal appearance is contained in a letter from his confidential friend and agent, Peter of Blois, to the Archbishop of Palermo; a part of which deserves extracting, for it is quite a portrait in words. "You are aware that his complexion and his hair inclined to red; but the approach of old age hath altered this, and the hair is turning grey. He is of middle size, such that among short men he seems tall, and even among tall ones not the least in stature. His head is spherical, as if it were the seat of great wisdom, and the special sanctuary of deep schemes. In size, it is such as to correspond well with the neck and the whole body. His eyes are round, and, while he is calm, dove-like and quiet; but when he is angry they flash fire, and are like lightning. His hair is not grown scant, but he keeps it well cut. His face is lion-like, and almost square. His nose projects in a degree proportionate to the symmetry of his whole body. His feet are arched; his shins like a horse's; his broad chest and brawny arms proclaim him to be strong, active, and bold. In one of his toes, however, part of the nail grows into the flesh, and increases enormously, to the injury of the whole foot. His hands, by their coarseness, show the man's carelessness; he wholly neglects all attention to them, and never puts a glove on, except he is hawking. He every day attends mass, councils, and other public business, and stands on his feet from morning till night."

Besides his two sons, Richard and John, Henry left three daughters, Matilda, Eleanor, and Joan. He also had several natural children, two of whom, Geoffrey, who attended him in his dying moments, and William Longsword, so called from the weapon he carried, attained to some distinction. Their mother was a daughter of Walter, Lord Clifford, a baron of Herefordshire. Her name was Rosamond; and, on account of her great beauty, she was called "The Fair Rosamond." A romantic story is told, of Henry's keeping her in a bower, situated in the midst of a maze at Woodstock, where it is said his wife, Queen Eleanor, having discovered the hidden fair one, compelled her to choose between being put to death by a dagger which she carried, or else by drinking a draught of poison. This old tale is now known to be untrue. Henry loved and lived with the beautiful Rosamond in his youth; but long before his death she retired, in a fit of penitence, to the little nunnery of Godestow, and spent the remainder of her life in devotion. The following lines were written over her grave:—

"This tomb doth here enclose the world's most beauteous rose; Rose, passing sweet ere while, now nought but odour vile."

A long time after, the bishop of the diocese ordered her bones to be dug up and thrown out of the church, because of her unchaste life. This uncharitable order was obeyed; but the nuns, who loved the memory of poor Rosamond, collected them again, and buried them in the church, near a flower-wreathed cross, under a large stone, upon which was engraved these simple words:—

"All you which pass this way, this cross adore, and pray That Rosamond's soul may true rest possess, for aye."

During the long and prosperous reign of Henry, commerce began to be more cultivated and respected than it had ever before been in England; and London rose to be a very important city, exporting goods to distant countries, and receiving in return for them gold and spices from Arabia, jewels from Egypt, rare cloths from India, weapons from Scythia, furs from Norway and Russia, and wines from the rich vineyards of France. This shows that during Henry's reign the people were making slow but certain advances in civilisation. Trade, industry, and popular intelligence, not war, parade, and conquest, are the foundations on which the real and only lasting prosperity of nations can be reared. But although London was rising in importance, we must not suppose it bore the faintest resemblance to the vast and crowded city which it is in the present day. A monk, of the name of Fitzstephen, has left us a curious and interesting account of it. Ludgate, he tells us, was then the west end of London; from there to Westminster was nothing but fields and gardens. Moorfields, or Finsbury, was a sheet of water, into which ran many little streams, that were employed in turning old rustic-looking water-mills; the high grounds about Islington and Pentonville were covered with rich grass and fields of waving corn; while much of the country beyond was still a thick, romantic forest, where wild boars browsed beneath gigantic oaks, where the foot of the hunter sometimes lingered, but in which, from the time of the creation, probably no human creature had ever dwelt.

CHAPTER XV.

THE REIGN OF RICHARD THE FIRST, CALLED CŒUR DE LION.—A D. 1189—1193.

PRINCE RICHARD was detained upon the continent for nearly two months after the burial of his unhappy father; but he had sent letters to England, commanding the instant liberation of his mother, the Queen-Dowager Eleanor, from prison; and that lady, who was possessed of a strong mind and a hard heart, governed the country as regent until her son's arrival. When Richard landed, he proceeded at once to Winchester, and took possession of a considerable treasure which his father had left. He was in his thirty-second year when he ascended the throne, and his coronation took place on the 3rd of September, 1189. It was conducted with remarkable magnificence, in the noble old abbey of Westminster, where the prince, standing upon the steps of the altar, took from it the regal crown with his own hands—an act which was understood to imply that he received it only from the Deity; and, handing it to the Archbishop of Canterbury, that prelate placed it upon the head of the new sovereign.

The royal ceremony was, however, attended by an act of extreme wickedness and cruelty. During the reign of Richard's father, the Jews had, on most occasions, been treated with much lenity by the English sovereign, and that persecuted race had increased considerably in the land. Devoted to the peaceful pursuits of commerce, they were both harmless and valuable citizens; but, as they always preferred trading to labour, their wealth, and the seeming ease with which they obtained it, generally excited the envy and hatred of their Christian neighbours. They were also hated from religious motives, because their ancestors, more than eleven centuries and a-half before, had put to death the Saviour of the world. The ignorant and bigoted Christians did not reflect upon the shameful injustice of punishing a people for an act committed by the nation from which they were descended, and from whom they were separated by so vast a period of time. Nor did the narrow-minded people of that age consider, that if the Jews then living were in any way guilty of the great sin committed by their ancestors so many years before, God, and not man, was their judge; and that none should presume to wrest the sword of vengeance from the awful hand of the Deity.

But hatred and intolerance are among the evil passions which render men and women incapable of calm reflection, and even tend to extinguish all feelings of gentleness and humanity in their bosoms. The Jews were very much disliked; the dead king, Henry, and his predecessors, Henry I. and William Rufus, had been accused of favouring them too highly; and Richard, probably to gain popularity with the thoughtless and cruel, issued a proclamation, forbidding any Jews to be present at his coronation. Before this proclamation appeared, many Jews had prepared rich presents for the new king, that they might obtain from him the same grace and protection which they had hitherto enjoyed. Gifts are generally welcome, and these wealthy Jews presumed to approach their sovereign, and to lay their treasures at his feet. Richard accepted the presents, and permitted the givers to remain; but a quarrel arose between them and the Christians, and the former were violently driven out of the hall, where the king sat at dinner. A report instantly arose among the multitude outside the walls of the palace, that Richard had commanded the destruction of the persecuted people. This supposed order was too much in unison with the savage feelings of the vast mob to be neglected: the Jews were first beaten with staves and pelted with stones; and as the fury of their assailants grew more excited, they were murdered in the streets, with no further pity than if they had been a horde of wolves or other dangerous beasts. Many of them fled to their houses, and barred the doors; but there the mob pursued them, uttering fierce shouts and denunciations; and, in their horrid fury, setting fire to the dwellings in which the unhappy Jews had taken refuge. In some cases, men, women, and children perished in the flames, while their despairing cries of agony, and vain shrieks for assistance, were only answered by savage peals of laughter; in others, as they were rushing from amidst the blazing ruins, they were received upon the points of the swords and spears of their murderers, and so perished. In some instances, the aged and the sick were thrown out of the windows of their own dwellings, into fires which had been lit beneath in the streets. These monstrous acts of unprovoked barbarity continued all one afternoon, the whole night, and the succeeding day. Indeed, the houses of so many Jews were consumed, that it was, at one time, feared the whole city would be destroyed.

Richard, as soon as he found what was taking place, sent some of his chief officers to put down the tumult, and afford protection to the wretched victims of this savage outbreak of ignorance and superstition; and at length went himself to endeavour to put a stop to the fury and excesses of the masses. But hours elapsed before quiet was restored. Glanville, the lord justiciary, was directed to ascertain who were the leaders of the riot, and cause them to be punished; but, on inquiry, it was found that so many wealthy citizens were involved in it, that it was thought prudent to take no further notice of the matter. All that Richard did, was to order three men to be hanged, because they had accidentally burnt the houses of some Christians along with those of the Jews. Unhappily this dreadful massacre was not confined to London. When the news reached the provinces, the fanatics at Norwich, York, Stamford, and other places—many of whom really thought that in killing a Jew they were doing good service—followed the example of those in the metropolis; and the great majority of Jews then in England fell victims to their fury. If these acts of barbarity had occurred during the reign of Henry II., they would not have been allowed to pass without strict investigation, and a rigid visitation of justice upon those who were engaged in them. As it was, the peeople were so much interested in the crusades—and so many of the actual murderers of the Jews were soon on their way to the Holy Land—that little or nothing was done.

Richard had "taken the cross"—that is, engaged himself to join the crusades or holy wars—before the death of his father; and after his coronation—having first discarded and disgraced those who countenanced or assisted him in his rebellion against Henry: whilst he retained in their offices the faithful servants of the late king—all his thoughts and actions were directed to the raising of a sum of money which would enable him to embark an army for Palestine. He adopted means equally impolitic and injudicious for this purpose. He sold many of the crown lands, royal fortresses, and even towns; and declared that he would sell London itself, if he could find any one wealthy enough to buy it. All places of profit and honour also he sold to the highest bidder, and compelled many rich men to lend him large sums of money, which he knew he had neither the means nor the intention of repaying. The royal pardon was also sold to any criminals who were rich enough to purchase it; and the fortresses of Roxburgh and Berwick were restored to the King of Scotland, who was released from the obligation of doing homage, except for the possessions he held in this country. By these means Richard was enabled to raise an enormous army, and a princely fleet.

Though making such immense preparations for a war in the service of religion (or, rather, in favour of what the mistaken enthusiasts of that age considered to be the cause of religion), Richard was by no means very devout, or particular in his own conduct. Indeed, his loose behaviour called down upon him the reproof of a zealous preacher of the crusades, who thought that, in consideration of his earnestness in the cause, he might presume to condemn the sins of his sovereign. He advised Richard to get rid of his notorious vices, particularly his pride, avarice, and voluptuousness, which he called the king's three daughters. Richard, who, with all his evil qualities, had some sparks of goodness in him, and was, besides, gifted with a ready and brilliant wit, immediately turned upon the preacher, and said, with a sarcastic smile, "I have found out fit husbands for all these daughters. My pride I bequeath to the haughty Templars and Hospitallers, who are as proud as Lucifer himself. My covetousness I give to the white monks of the Cisteraux order, for they covet the devil and all. But of my voluptuousness, I can bestow it nowhere better than on the priests and prelates of our time, for therein have they their most felicity."

Before Richard sailed for Palestine, he wished to provide for the safety of his kingdom during his absence; or, to speak more correctly, he was anxious to prevent any attempt being made to deprive him of the crown while he was away. He knew that his brother John had cast a longing eye upon the throne, so he appointed Hugh Pudsey, the Bishop of Durham, and Longchamp, Bishop of Ely, to be regents of the kingdom until his return. Prince John himself had expected to obtain this important position; but, though disappointed, he did not complain, for he hoped, and, indeed, believed, that his brother would never come back alive from Palestine. He was invested, before Richard sailed, with the Earldoms of Cornwall, Dorset, Gloucester, Somerset, Derby, Nottingham, and Lancaster: the king thinking, by this munificence, to secure his loyalty.

Late in the winter of 1189, and not four months from the time of his coronation, the impatient Richard and his army embarked in the most numerous and noble fleet that had ever left the shores of England. Proceeding to Normandy, he was there met by the French king, Philip; for they had agreed to join their armies, and fight together for the conquest of Palestine. The two sovereigns met on the 28th of June, 1190, on the plains of Vezelay, near Burgundy. There they embraced, and swore to protect each other's life and honour; and both beheld, with a natural exultation, the vast masses of troops under their command, which, together, are said to have amounted to the immense number of 100,000 men. The two armies marched in company, with banners flying, and the sounds of martial music rising like a song of triumph into the air, as far as the city of Lyons. There Richard embarked; and Philip proceeded to Genoa to join a fleet that he had hired, but with an agreement that they should meet again at Messina, in Sicily.

Richard had invented a very singular code of laws for the government of his army and navy. If any man committed a murder while at sea, he was to be tied to the dead body of his victim, and thrown overboard. If the murder was committed on land, the offender was to be bound to the body, and buried alive with it. A man who stabbed another, or struck him so violently as to draw blood, was to have his hand cut off; while lighter blows were punished by plunging the man who gave them three times into the sea. Swearing and bad language were corrected by a fine; while those who were detected of theft, were condemned to have their heads shaved, hot pitch poured thereon, and then a quantity of feathers shaken over them. Thus tarred and feathered, and resembling birds or beasts more than men, the thief found it no easy thing to get rid of this strange badge of disgrace. These laws were, however, conceived in too merciless and whimsical a spirit to continue long in practice.

The English fleet met with many accidents before it arrived at the port of Messina. Richard's ship had been compelled to anchor for repairs at the mouth of the river Arno, near the famous city of Rome; and whilst detained there, the king met with some curious adventures. Leaving his vessel, he went to Naples, where he visited all the most memorable and attractive places in that city. Passing the noble line of mountains, called the Apennines, he proceeded to Salerno, one of the most beautifully situated and civilised cities of Italy. From there he rode across the Pæston plain, through Cilento and Calabria, to Mileto. He seldom strayed very far inland; and his ships sailed closely hugging the shore. Leaving Mileto, the impatient monarch rode on with only a single knight as his attendant—an act of recklessness which nearly cost him his life, though in a manner very different from that which might have been anticipated.

Passing through a village, he was told that there was a poor man in it who had a remarkably fine hawk. Throughout England it was not lawful for any one, except knights and nobles, and the possessors of landed property, to keep these highly-prized birds. The king, from some motive, unintelligible to us of the present day. went to the peasant's cottage, and seized the hawk. The act was a theft; for he had no right either to the bird or to punish the man for keeping it; and looking at the question in the abstract, it was a mean, ungenerous action, because the hawk was of great value, and the owner of it was poor. Acts of that kind were certainly opposed to the character and general conduct of Richard. The man from whom the hawk was taken did not submit quietly to the loss, but ran after the king, and angrily demanded his property. Richard refused to surrender it; and soon a crowd of swarthy, dark-eyed peasants collected and attacked him with their sticks. One of them even drew a long knife; and Richard, incensed at this action, struck the man with the flat of his sword. The blow does not seem to have been a very light one, for the weapon broke in the king's hand; and the brave and warlike Richard, who afterwards became the terror of the East, was compelled to fly from the fury of a mob of angry rustics. Fortunately for him, a priory was near, where he took refuge, or the King of England might have forfeited his life for stealing a hawk, and insulting its owner. Of course, theft was not in the king's thoughts; and he probably deemed that he had the same right in Italy, which he undoubtedly would have had in his own country—that of seizing the bird, as it was in the possession of a person prohibited from keeping it.

At length, Richard and his fleet entered the harbour of Messina, in the island of Sicily, which Philip, the French king, had reached a little before him. Richard had a private cause of quarrel with Tancred, the King of Sicily, which he now determined to settle. His youngest sister, Joan, had been married to the late king of that island; and as he died without children, and as it was not lawful for a woman to govern, Tancred, his cousin, was chosen by the people for their sovereign. Joan had opposed the election of Tancred; so, when he was made king, he put the widow in prison, and deprived her of her property.

Richard first insisted on the liberation of his sister, who was instantly sent to him; and he then demanded her dowry. This Tancred would not easily give up; still, he contrived to pacify his formidable adversary. But the English king was not perfectly satisfied; so he seized a monastery on the sea-shore, near Messina, and turning out all the monks, converted the building into a garrison. This led to a quarrel between his soldiers and the people of Sicily; and a great body of the latter approached, armed, towards the English camp. A scuffle ensued; an English knight was wounded; and then Richard himself, rushing upon the scene, called his troops to arms. A general attack took place, and the Sicilians were soon driven into the town of Messina. The fiery monarch took the town by storm, and planted his victorious banner upon its walls. Philip, the French king, was exceedingly angry at this, for Richard had no right to attack Messina; and if it was to be considered a conquered city, the honour of the victory should have been shared equally by the allied armies; so Philip commanded some of his soldiers to pull down the English standard. The proud Richard said he would take down the standard himself, but would not permit any one else to do so. The cause of offence being thus removed, the kings of England and France, who had been so near quarrelling, were reconciled.

Richard and Philip, with their armies, were compelled to pass the winter in the island of Sicily; and other points of dispute arose between them; but in the latter end of March (1191) they again embarked on the broad waters of the Mediterranean. Richard took with him a young and beautiful lady, the Princess Berengaria (a daughter of the King of Navarre), to whom he was engaged to be married. The French princess, Alice, he now positively refused for his bride, declaring that she had been loved by, and had loved, his late father, King Henry. Her brother Philip was very angry at first, but permitted himself to be pacified; it might be that he feared the story of his sister's dishonour was true, or, perhaps, he did not wish such a subject talked about. At any rate, the marriage was broken off, and the beautiful Berengaria visited King Richard at Messina. She came in company with his mother, Eleanor; but that lady left her with her future husband, and returned to England.

Away went the gallant English fleet over the sunlit sea towards the city of Acre, carrying with it Richard's widowed sister Joan, and his intended bride, Berengaria. A forest of masts, adorned with gay streamers, rose into the air; for the fleet consisted of fifty-three large galleys, and more than a hundred small ones; but mariners in those days were not very skilful; and when Richard had nearly arrived at the end of his long voyage, some of his ships were driven by a storm upon the island of Cyprus. The inhabitants of this place were Greeks, governed by a prince of the name of Isaac, who called himself their emperor. Though descended from that ancient and elegant people, the Greeks of Cyprus were both inhospitable and barbarous. They plundered the wrecks of two English ships which had been cast upon their coast; and instead of assisting the unfortunate mariners and crusaders who were in them, shut the wretched men up in prison.

When King Richard heard how his followers had been treated, he swore an oath that he would be revenged. He disembarked all his troops; fought with and defeated Isaac on the 5th of June, 1191; took away his daughter and his kingdom, threw him into prison, and appointed some English governors of the island. This punishment for barbarity, though exceedingly severe, was richly deserved. The deposed Isaac grieved very much for the loss of his daughter, whom Richard gave as a companion to the Princess Berengaria; but it seems that he grieved more at the loss of his dignity, and complained very bitterly that he was subjected to the disgrace of wearing iron fetters. Richard, on hearing this, ordered silver ones to be forged for him; and the captive tyrant is said to have been much pleased at this expression of respect for his rank.

From fighting Richard turned to love: having subdued Cyprus, he himself surrendered—not to a warrior, but to a lady; for in that beautiful island he solemnised his marriage with the Princess Berengaria. A good deal of feasting and revelling followed this event, and then the English fleet was once again upon the sea. The passage now was but a brief one; and, at last, on the 8th of June (1191), Richard and his army reached the longed-for port of Acre, and landed on the shores of Palestine, nearly a twelvemonth after they had embarked at Lyons.

The strongly fortified town of Acre had been besieged for nearly two years by all the crusaders in Palestine; 150,000 Christians—some say 300,000—had perished before its walls by the sword and the plague; and still Acre held out. Shortly after the arrival of the kings of France and England, the brave Saracens were compelled to surrender to the multitude of their assailants, and the crusaders entered the town in triumph. There a new quarrel arose between Richard and Philip; and the latter, on the plea of illness, resolved to return to France. It is said that he was jealous of the superior military reputation of Richard, and that he also desired to take advantage of the absence of the latter to disturb the peace of England. Richard expostulated with him on the subject of this strange desertion; but Philip was not to be moved: he would return to his native country, though he consented to take an oath not to make war on the dominions of Richard during his absence, and also to leave an army of 10,000 soldiers in Palestine, under the command of the Duke of Burgundy.

The lives of the Saracens who were in Acre when that city was taken, were spared, on condition that they should restore the wood of the true cross on which our Saviour was crucified, set at liberty a number of Christian captives, and pay an enormous sum in gold; and several thousand Saracens were kept prisoners as hostages for the performance of these conditions, which were to be fulfilled within forty days. The forty days passed, and neither the cross, the captives, nor money were sent; therefore the unhappy Saracens' hostages were led out beyond the French and English camps, and all savagely murdered. The stern Richard himself presided over this inhuman slaughter, in which about 3,000 persons perished—a cruel act, committed in the name of religion; and, by many, really believed to be one of stern and strict religious duty. When the Emperor Saladin heard of it, he retaliated by putting to death all his Christian prisoners.

From Acre, Richard marched in the direction of Jerusalem; and every night, when his army halted, the heralds cried aloud three times, "Save the holy sepulchre!" and every soldier, on his bended knee, answered, "Amen." During his march the English king was met by the brave and talented Saladin, at the head of an enormous army, and a battle took place between them, in which the great Saracen was defeated and compelled to retreat. Indeed, such was the dread inspired by the courage and immense strength of Richard, that his enemies constantly fled in terror before him. He carried a ponderous battle-axe, the steel head of which weighed no less than twenty pounds: few men besides himself could wield it; and when raised by his strong arm, every stroke of it sent an enemy to his grave.

Richard then proceeded to Jaffa, and from thence to Ascalon. The fortifications of this city had been dismantled by Saladin, and the English monarch set to work to restore them. The common soldiers had lost their ardour in the cause: long absence from home, sickness, and the swords of the Saracens, had wonderfully reduced their numbers and cooled their zeal. To set them an example of persevering energy, the great Richard himself worked upon the battlements like a common mason, and the princes and nobles in his camp followed his example. No one refused this rough work except the Duke of Austria; who, when Richard demanded why he did not do as the other princes and nobles did, replied haughtily, that he would do nothing of the kind, for he was the son neither of a carpenter nor a mason. On receiving this answer, the fiery king lost his temper, and, forgetful of all the usages of even decent society, struck or kicked the duke; and with much abusive language, turned him and his followers out of the town. This rudeness he had afterwards occasion to repent.

The fortifications of Ascalon were soon finished; but the zeal of the Christian armies was still declining, and Richard was obliged to open a negotiation for peace with Saladin, to whom he declared that all he required was the possession of Jerusalem, and the wood of the true cross. Saladin replied, that the Saracens were quite as desirous to keep Jerusalem as the Christians were to obtain it; and that, with respect to the cross, he would not countenance such an act of gross idolatry as the worship of a piece of wood. Thus baffled, it is said that Richard even proposed that the Christian and Mahometan religions should be united; and that, to show his sincerity, he offered his sister Joan in marriage to Saphadin, the brother of Saladin. This eccentric and curious overture produced no result.

Again Richard started on a march towards Jerusalem; but he was fated never to reach the Holy City, though he approached within sight of it. He received news of disorders in England; his army was weak and spiritless, and an immense body of Saracens lay between him and the city in which Christ taught and suffered. Sadly did the warlike king give the command for a counter-march; but his last and most brilliant battle in Palestine was yet to be fought. It was at Jaffa, where, after the display of a courage which merits the praise of being truly heroic, he obtained a victory over his great rival, Saladin. A truce was then concluded [A.D. 1192], for three years, three months, three weeks, three days, and three hours. This singular arrangement was made because the number three was ignorantly supposed to possess certain magical qualities, which would tend to make the truce more binding. By this agreement, Jaffa, Acre, and some other seaport towns, were to remain in the possession of the Christians, and all pilgrims were to have the liberty of visiting Jerusalem, and worshipping at the tomb of the Saviour, without being subjected either to insult or exorbitant tolls.

When the treaty was concluded, many civilities passed between Richard and Saladin; but the former, notwithstanding, sent word to the Saracen prince, that he might depend upon seeing him once more, to try and recover the Holy Land out of his hands. Saladin, with a generous courtesy, replied, "That if it must be his fate to lose that part of his dominions, he would rather it should be to the King of England than to any other monarch in the world."

This Mahometan prince was a brave and generous enemy, and anxious to win the esteem even of the Christians, whom he rigidly protected while they visited the holy sepulchre. "What do your soldiers say of your king and of me?" he asked of the Bishop of Salisbury, when that prelate came to Jerusalem. The bishop replied, "My king is acknowledged as one surpassing all men in valorous deeds and generous gifts; but your fame also stands high; and were you but converted from your unbelief, there would not be in the world two such princes as you and Richard." The high-minded Saladin did not live long after he had concluded the truce with Richard. He was, probably, worn out with the excitement and fatigues of war, for he fell sick and died at the city of Damascus. In his last moments, he ordered his winding-sheet to be carried like a standard through every street in the city, while a herald went before, calling aloud, "This is all that remains of the mighty Saladin, the conqueror of the East." In his will he ordered many charitable gifts to be bestowed upon the poor, without distinction of Jew, Christian, or Mahometan. This wise warrior knew that there were just men of all faiths, and he would not presume to condemn any class of men for the manner in which they worshipped the merciful and beneficent Lord of all. Some of us may learn a useful lesson from this comprehensive charity of the dying follower of a false prophet.

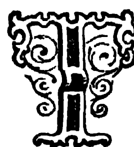
It was in the month of October, 1192, that Richard re-embarked with his fleet to return to England. As he took a last view of the Syrian shore, and the dim blue mountains beyond it, he cried out, in a tone of melancholy earnestness, "Most holy land! I commend thee to God's keeping. May He give me life and health to return and rescue thee from the infidels!"

The fleet was soon overtaken by a storm, and separated: some vessels were wrecked on the shores of Barbary and Egypt; others took refuge in friendly ports, and at length arrived in England. The ship in which Richard's wife and sister were reached Sicily in safety; but the king was not so fortunate. Not daring to pass through France, on account of the jealousy which King Philip entertained towards him, he sailed to the Adriatic, intending to find his way home through Austria, Germany, and Belgium. He proceeded safely up the Adriatic; but a storm drove him upon the coast, near Venice. He and his companions then disguised themselves in plain garments, and proceeded to the town of Goritz, where he sent a messenger to the governor, to ask for passports for Baldwin of Bethune and Hugh the merchant. That he might easily obtain them, he sent a ruby ring of immense value as a present. The governor was a very acute man; he knew that no merchant could afford to make so costly a present, and he guessed at once how matters stood. "This," said he, to the messenger, "is the present of a prince, not of a merchant; your master's name is not Hugh, but King Richard; but tell him, from me, that he may come and go in peace."

On receiving this answer, Richard was struck with fear; many of the continental princes hated him bitterly, and he dreaded the result if he fell into their hands. Purchasing some horses, he fled by night, accompanied only by one attendant, and a boy, who acted as interpreter. The governor of Goritz must have betrayed Richard's secret, for a large reward was offered for the apprehension of the royal fugitive; and the King of England and hero of Palestine, after travelling for three days and nights, almost without food or rest, was compelled at last, from sheer exhaustion, to enter a little village near Vienna.

The king sent his boy to Vienna to buy food and some other comforts. When he arrived, his gay dress and profusion of money excited some suspicion; but he had the cleverness to turn attention from him. On visiting the market the second time, he was not so fortunate, for a pair of gloves were discovered hanging at his girdle, of a kind so costly that they could be only worn by princes. The citizens seized the poor boy and beat him, and threatened to cut out his tongue and put him on the rack, unless he confessed who and where his master was. In a moment of terror he revealed the hiding-place of the distressed sovereign, and a band of soldiers was instantly sent to capture him. They found Richard in bed fast asleep; but when aroused, the brave prince drew his sword, and, although he saw that resistance against such numbers was mere madness, yet he refused to surrender to any one but their leader. That leader was Leopold, the Duke of Austria, the same that Richard, when in Palestine, had struck or kicked on the walls of Acre. Advancing to the fallen king, with a grim smile he said, in a sarcastic tone of mock sympathy, "You are fortunate, and ought rather to consider me as a deliverer than as an enemy; for, by the Lord! if you had fallen into the hands of the Marquis Conrad's friends, who are hunting for you everywhere, you had been but a dead man, even if you possessed a thousand lives." Then, turning to his followers, the duke commanded them to place the downcast monarch in prison.



Conrad, Marquis of Montferrat, to whom Leopold alluded, had been the titular King of Jerusalem. He and Guy de Lusignan had married the two daughters of Godfrey de Bouillon, whom the Christians, when they captured Jerusalem in 1099, had made king of the Holy City. On the death of Godfrey, Guy de Lusignan, as the husband of his eldest daughter, Sibylla, succeeded him. On her dying without issue, Conrad, as the husband of Isabella, the youngest daughter, claimed the honorary title; for such it was, the city being again in possession of the infidels. Guy was not willing to yield what was a mere titular dignity; and, as Richard espoused his cause against Conrad, the latter became the decided enemy of the King of England. He had also quarrelled with the chief of an heretical set of Mahometans, who settled in Persia, A.D. 1090, and soon after were found in Syria. These people were called Assassins, or Assassinians, from their training up young men to assassinate such persons as their chief devoted to destruction. That chief was called "Ancient of the Mountain," and "Old Man of the Mountain." Some of these assassins Conrad had put to death, probably because they had murdered persons connected with him. The chief demanded satisfaction for the death of his subjects; and Conrad refused to give it: the result was, that one day he himself was murdered in the streets of the city of Tyre. Everybody at Palestine knew very well who was the author of the crime; no one suspected Richard of any knowledge of it; and the dying Conrad even recommended his widow to the care of the English king; but Philip, the King of France, animated by his hatred for Richard, declared that he believed that monarch to be the assassin; and when he returned to Europe he spread the shameful calumny in every direction. This was the reason that Conrad's European friends were seeking the life of King Richard.

When Henry VI., the Emperor of Germany, heard that the Austrian duke had imprisoned Richard, he immediately demanded the person of the captive, saying —"A duke must not presume to imprison a king; that belongs to an emperor." The duke, however, would not give away his prisoner; but he had no objection to sell him; and he did sell him during the Easter of 1193, for a large sum of money. The emperor, who hated Richard even worse than the kicked duke did, threw his new purchase into a dungeon, and, for a long while, no one even knew the place where the late powerful and triumphant King of England was confined. In his obscure German prison we must for a time leave him, and revert to what had occurred in England since he left it.

CHAPTER XVI.

CONCLUSION OF THE REIGN OF RICHARD THE FIRST.—A.D. 1193—1199.

HE last chapter ended with King Richard's imprisonment in Germany, in the year 1193; we must now go back, for a short time, to the year 1190, when he left Normandy for Palestine.

It has been stated, that, when Richard left England, he appointed the Bishops of Durham and Ely to be regents until his return. The first was a purposeless man; but the last, Longchamp, was strong-minded, ambitious, and unscrupulous, and soon managed to get all the power of the state into his own hands. He was of low birth, for his grandfather had been a common serf, or slave, and many of the barons despised him on this account; but Richard, who admired his talents, cared nothing about his origin, and Longchamp was shrewd and powerful enough to make most of the barons treat him with respect, and some of them even with humility. As he was rapacious in his government, and sent the king enormous sums abroad, that careless monarch was indifferent to what his representative did at home. Longchamp, therefore, seized every source of wealth and power in the kingdom, and lived more magnificently than many sovereigns. In his own house, besides a vast retinue of servants and attendants of many kinds to wait upon him, he had a numerous and richly-dressed guard to protect him. When he travelled, 1,000 horsemen went with him, and he was followed by numbers of minstrels, troubadours, and jongleurs. Even nobles and knights were proud of being admitted as his followers; and when he stopped for the night at any monastery, his attendants were so numerous that they are said to have consumed the produce of three whole years. Many complaints were made of Longchamp's extortions and insolent ambition, but, however he acted towards the barons, who hated him, he was always faithful to the cause of the king, his master, and might well, says an old chronicler, be styled the prince and priest of England.

The greatest danger that threatened Richard at home, was the ambition and treachery of his brother John. The king, as we have stated, had been very liberal to him, presenting him, besides the seven earldoms, with other riches and honours; but nothing could win the affection of that worthless prince, who, immediately after Richard's departure, began plotting to obtain the crown. It is, therefore, not surprising that he hated Longchamp, and that a quarrel should have arisen between them.

When Richard was some distance upon his journey, John began to conduct himself as though he shortly expected to become king; and a troublesome baron, who was a friend of his, seized Lincoln Castle, and defied the authority of Longchamp. The regent besieged the castle, but while he did so, Prince John collected an army, and seized some other castles. Then Longchamp called a meeting of the barons, and told them that John was seeking to usurp the crown; but, as they cared very little about the matter, Longchamp was compelled to submit, and the prince triumphed. For a short time the dispute was settled, but it soon broke out again; John declared Longchamp a traitor, and called a meeting of bishops, barons, and citizens, who resolved that the regent should be deposed, and that the plotting prince should be elected as the chief governor of the kingdom. From this title to that of sovereign there was but one short step, and that step he was prepared to take the moment he heard of any mischance occurring to his brother Richard. He knew that the king intended his little nephew, Prince Arthur, to succeed him on the throne, which, of course, he had a right to do, because he was the son of his elder brother, Geoffrey; but when the powerful brother, whom he feared, was dead, John determined to silence and frown down the claim of his feeble nephew.

Deprived of all his power, which was now in the hands of the prince, Longchamp felt that his life was no longer safe in England; so, disguising himself as a woman, he left the country and fled to Normandy, from whence he wrote an account of these proceedings to King Richard, and where he determined to remain until his sovereign's return.

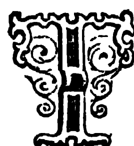
While Prince John was acting against the interests of his absent brother, Philip was also plotting against him. He had taken on oath not to make war upon any of Richard's dominions while that monarch was fighting for the cross in Palestine; but, with a shameful disregard of that oath, as soon as he returned home from the Holy Land, he made preparations to invade Normandy. Although he was thus devoid of honour, and indifferent to perjury, his nobles seem to have been influenced by a better feeling, and they refused to follow him. The pope also threatened him with excommunication if he violated his oath, and made war on the possessions of the absent champion of the Roman church. Thus defeated in his treacherous scheme, Philip tried another way of injuring, and, if possible, ruining the king towards whom he had lately sworn to act like a brother. He opened a communication with Prince John, offered him his sister Alice in marriage (the lady whom Richard had lately rejected), encouraged him to conspire against his brother, and promised to give him possession of all Richard's continental dominions.

Such was the state of affairs when Richard's return to England was constantly expected; and although, during the short time that he had ruled before his departure, he had been by no means a good king, still the people, who were delighted with the many reports they heard of his heroic conduct, anticipated his arrival with impatience, and were prepared to welcome him with affection. Week after week, and month after month passed on; many of the crusaders had returned from the shores of Asia to the loved land of their birth, but still Richard was absent. Then doubts arose as to his safety; and many strange tales were told of his probable fate. The people feared that their brave king was dead; and John already felt, in imagination, the regal diadem of England encircling his crafty head.

All this time King Richard lay in his dungeon, jealously guarded day and night; and it is impossible to say how long he might have remained there, but for a letter which the Emperor of Germany sent to the King of France;—perhaps, until he had become a grey-haired and forgotten man, bent and childish with long captivity; or until he had died in his fetters, and been buried like a dog beneath the stones of the cell in which he was confined. But his fate was not to be so tragical; the letter which revealed the circumstances of his captivity fell into the hands of his friends, the story was spread abroad, and a feeling of indignation against his oppressors ran throughout Europe. John, who was then in France, hurried over to England, seized the castles of Windsor and Wallingford, swore that his brother had died in prison, and demanded the crown as his right. But the people would not believe him; the barons armed and drove him back; and the nation was filled with joy at this strange discovery of their lost king. In the meantime, the crafty Philip invaded Normandy; but he met with no better success than his colleague, John: he was beaten by the Earl of Leicester, and returned to France with much less bravado than when he had started from it.

The pope threatened to excommunicate the Austrian duke and the German emperor, unless Richard was instantly released from confinement. Nearly every prince in Europe professed to be shocked at their unjust and tyrannical conduct; and the emperor at length consented to release Richard upon receiving an enormous ransom for him. The captive king does not seem to have been so unhappy in prison as might be imagined: sometimes he was melancholy and despondent, but at others he amused himself by writing and singing verses, and with joking and drinking with his keepers, who, delighted with his wit, and admiring his great strength and bravery, grew quite attached to him. Perhaps he sometimes thought of the last hours of his dead father—that kind father, whose heart he had helped to break; and if so, he must have looked upon his imprisonment as an instance of divine retribution.

The emperor, perhaps, to justify his own conduct, brought Richard before the Diet of the empire at Worms—an assembly which was composed of all the princes and prelates of high rank in Germany. While on his way there, the king was met by two abbots, who had been sent from England to console him upon his misfortunes, and assure him of the faithfulness of his people. He received them with great joy; though, when they told him all his brother's treachery, he looked grave; but almost immediately afterwards he exclaimed, smiling—"My brother John will never gain a kingdom by his valour." When brought before the Diet, Richard was charged with having committed several crimes, the chief of which were, his insult to the Duke of Austria, and, through him, to the whole German people; his imputed assassination of the Marquis Conrad; and his having, by a shameful truce, abandoned Jerusalem to the grasp of Saladin.



Richard, in a bold and eloquent speech, completely monarch to be the assassin; and when he returned to Europe he spread the shameful calumny in every direction. This was the reason that Conrad's European friends were seeking the life of King Richard.

When Henry VI., the Emperor of Germany, heard that the Austrian duke had imprisoned Richard, he immediately demanded the person of the captive, saying —"A duke must not presume to imprison a king; that belongs to an emperor." The duke, however, would not give away his prisoner; but he had no objection to sell him; and he did sell him during the Easter of 1193, for a large sum of money. The emperor, who hated Richard even worse than the kicked duke did, threw his new purchase into a dungeon, and, for a long while, no one even knew the place where the late powerful and triumphant King of England was confined. In his obscure German prison we must for a time leave him, and revert to what had occurred in England since he left it.

CHAPTER XVI.

CONCLUSION OF THE REIGN OF RICHARD THE FIRST.—A.D. 1193—1199.

THE last chapter ended with King Richard's imprisonment in Germany, in the year 1193; we must now go back, for a short time, to the year 1190, when he left Normandy for Palestine.

It has been stated, that, when Richard left England, he appointed the Bishops of Durham and Ely to be regents until his return. The first was a purposeless man; but the last, Longchamp, was strong-minded, ambitious, and unscrupulous, and soon managed to get all the power of the state into his own hands. He was of low birth, for his grandfather had been a common serf, or slave, and many of the barons despised him on this account; but Richard, who admired his talents, cared nothing about his origin, and Longchamp was shrewd and powerful enough to make most of the barons treat him with respect, and some of them even with humility. As he was rapacious in his government, and sent the king enormous sums abroad, that careless monarch was indifferent to what his representative did at home. Longchamp, therefore, seized every source of wealth and power in the kingdom, and lived more magnificently than many sovereigns. In his own house, besides a vast retinue of servants and attendants of many kinds to wait upon him, he had a numerous and richly-dressed guard to protect him. When he travelled, 1,000 horsemen went with him, and he was followed by numbers of minstrels, troubadours, and jongleurs. Even nobles and knights were proud of being admitted as his followers; and when he stopped for the night at any monastery, his attendants were so numerous that they are said to have consumed the produce of three whole years. Many complaints were made of Longchamp's extortions and insolent ambition, but, however he acted towards the barons, who hated him, he was always faithful to the cause of the king, his master, and might well, says an old chronicler, be styled the prince and priest of England.

The greatest danger that threatened Richard at home, was the ambition and treachery of his brother John. The king, as we have stated, had been very liberal to him, presenting him, besides the seven earldoms, with other riches and honours; but nothing could win the affection of that worthless prince, who, immediately after Richard's departure, began plotting to obtain the crown. It is, therefore, not surprising that he hated Longchamp, and that a quarrel should have arisen between them.

When Richard was some distance upon his journey, John began to conduct himself as though he shortly expected to become king; and a troublesome baron, who was a friend of his, seized Lincoln Castle, and defied the authority of Longchamp. The regent besieged the castle, but while he did so, Prince John collected an army, and seized some other castles. Then Longchamp called a meeting of the barons, and told them that John was seeking to usurp the crown; but, as they cared very little about the matter, Longchamp was compelled to submit, and the prince triumphed. For a short time the dispute was settled, but it soon broke out again; John declared Longchamp a traitor, and called a meeting of bishops, barons, and citizens, who resolved that the regent should be deposed, and that the plotting prince should be elected as the chief governor of the kingdom. From this title to that of sovereign there was but one short step, and that step he was prepared to take the moment he heard of any mischance occurring to his brother Richard. He knew that the king intended his little nephew, Prince Arthur, to succeed him on the throne, which, of course, he had a right to do, because he was the son of his elder brother, Geoffrey; but when the powerful brother, whom he feared, was dead, John determined to silence and frown down the claim of his feeble nephew.

Deprived of all his power, which was now in the hands of the prince, Longchamp felt that his life was no longer safe in England; so, disguising himself as a woman, he left the country and fled to Normandy, from whence he wrote an account of these proceedings to King Richard, and where he determined to remain until his sovereign's return.

While Prince John was acting against the interests of his absent brother, Philip was also plotting against him. He had taken on oath not to make war upon any of Richard's dominions while that monarch was fighting for the cross in Palestine; but, with a shameful disregard of that oath, as soon as he returned home from the Holy Land, he made preparations to invade Normandy. Although he was thus devoid of honour, and indifferent to perjury, his nobles seem to have been influenced by a better feeling, and they refused to follow him. The pope also threatened him with excommunication if he violated his oath, and made war on the possessions of the absent champion of the Roman church. Thus defeated in his treacherous scheme, Philip tried another way of injuring, and, if possible, ruining the king towards whom he had lately sworn to act like a brother. He opened a communication with Prince John, offered him his sister Alice in marriage (the lady whom Richard had lately rejected), encouraged him to conspire against his brother, and promised to give him possession of all Richard's continental dominions.

Such was the state of affairs when Richard's return to England was constantly expected; and although, during the short time that he had ruled before his departure, he had been by no means a good king, still the people, who were delighted with the many reports they heard of his heroic conduct, anticipated his arrival with impatience, and were prepared to welcome him with affection. Week after week, and month after month passed on; many of the crusaders had returned from the shores of Asia to the loved land of their birth, but still Richard was absent. Then doubts arose as to his safety; and many strange tales were told of his probable fate. The people feared that their brave king was dead; and John already felt, in imagination, the regal diadem of England encircling his crafty head.

All this time King Richard lay in his dungeon, jealously guarded day and night; and it is impossible to say how long he might have remained there, but for a letter which the Emperor of Germany sent to the King of France;—perhaps, until he had become a grey-haired and forgotten man, bent and childish with long captivity; or until he had died in his fetters, and been buried like a dog beneath the stones of the cell in which he was confined. But the people would not believe him; the barons armed and drove him back; and the nation was filled with joy at this strange discovery of their lost king. In the meantime, the crafty Philip invaded Normandy; but he met with no better success than his colleague, John: he was beaten by the Earl of Leicester, and returned to France with much less bravado than when he had started from it.

The pope threatened to excommunicate the Austrian duke and the German emperor, unless Richard was instantly released from confinement. Nearly every prince in Europe professed to be shocked at their unjust and tyrannical conduct; and the emperor at length consented to release Richard upon receiving an enormous ransom for him. The captive king does not seem to have been so unhappy in prison as might be imagined: sometimes he was melancholy and despondent, but at others he amused himself by writing and singing verses, and with joking and drinking with his keepers, who, delighted with his wit, and admiring his great strength and bravery, grew quite attached to him. Perhaps he sometimes thought of the last hours of his dead father—that kind father, whose heart he had helped to break; and if so, he must have looked upon his imprisonment as an instance of divine retribution.

The emperor, perhaps, to justify his own conduct, brought Richard before the Diet of the empire at Worms—an assembly which was composed of all the princes and prelates of high rank in Germany. While on his way there, the king was met by two abbots, who had been sent from England to console him upon his misfortunes, and assure him of the faithfulness of his people. He received them with great joy; though, when they told him all his brother's treachery, he looked grave; but almost immediately afterwards he exclaimed, smiling—"My brother John will never gain a kingdom by his valour." When brought before the Diet, Richard was charged with having committed several crimes, the chief of which were, his insult to the Duke of Austria, and, through him, to the whole German people; his imputed assassinatiou of the Marquis Conrad; and his having, by a shameful truce, abandoned Jerusalem to the grasp of Saladin.

Richard, in a bold and eloquent speech, completely cleared himself from these shameful accusations. Standing proudly erect, he said he was, as King of England, exempt from answering for his conduct before any court, except that of heaven; but yet, for the sake of his honourable name, he would condescend to justify himself before that noble and august assembly. If, he continued, he had been wanting in civility to the Duke of Austria, he had already received a heavy punishment for that outbreak of passion; and it was more becoming in princes embarked together in so holy a cause, to forgive each other's infirmities, than to pursue a small offence with bitter and rancorous animosity. As to the murder of the Marquis Conrad, he said, that if the whole tenor of his life had not shown him incapable of so base an act, it was in vain for him, at present, to make any apology, or bring forward the many arguments which he could produce to prove his innocence; and that, however he might regret the necessity of his truce with Saladin, he was far from being ashamed of it; for he thought it extremely honourable, that, though abandoned by all the world, supported only by his own courage and the remains of his national troops, he could yet obtain such conditions from the most powerful and warlike emperor that the East had ever produced. Then, while his large blue eyes shot forth indignant glances, he complained bitterly of the cruel treatment he had met with; that he, the companion of the sacred cross, should, after expending the blood and treasure of his subjects in the common cause of Christendom, be intercepted by Christian princes in his return to his own country; be thrown into a dungeon and loaded with irons; be obliged to plead his cause as if he were a subject and a malefactor; and, what he regretted even more, be thus prevented from making preparations for a new crusade, and redeeming the holy sepulchre of Christ from the profane dominion of infidels.

All the princes present were astonished at Richard's eloquence, convinced of his innocence, and shocked at the tyranny which had been practised towards him. Still the emperor would not release him without a ransom, and that ransom was fixed at the large sum of 150,000 marks, to be divided between him and the duke, and hostages were to be given as security for the payment. Instantly a tax was levied in England; the people gave their wealth; the monks the plate of their churches and monasteries; the bishops, abbots, and nobles paid a fourth of their yearly rent; and 70,000 marks were sent over to Germany, hostages being given for the payment of the remainder. Richard was then set at liberty; and on the 13th of March, 1194, he landed once again upon the shores of England. He had been absent rather more than four years, fourteen months of which he had passed in prison. His escape was fortunate, for the perfidious emperor sent his guards after the royal captive, with orders to bring him back; as he had changed his mind, and desired to keep both the prisoner and the money that had been paid for his ransom. But he was defeated in his base attempt to detain the king: the soldiers arrived too late; and Richard's vessel, with all sails set, was scudding rapidly over the blue sea towards the cliffs of Sandwich before they reached the place of his embarkation. When Philip of France heard that the English king was at liberty, he sent this message to his confederate, Prince John—"Take care of yourself; the devil is broken loose." John, who was as timid as he was treacherous, had taken care of himself already, and fled from the reach of his brother.

Great was the joy in England when the people again beheld their king; he was received everywhere with enthusiastic welcomes, and the citizens of London gave him a gorgeous entertainment. To do away with any evil impression that might have arisen from his captivity, he caused himself to be crowned again, and took back the castles, towns, and offices which he had sold to various persons before he went to Palestine. After that he confiscated the estates of his brother John, and prepared to avenge himself on the French king.

A great struggle might have been expected between these distinguished sovereigns; but Richard was poor, and Philip was not wealthy; so after several petty encounters, which ended rather in favour of the English, the two monarchs agreed to a truce for a year. The most remarkable incident connected with this contest was the craven perfidy of Prince John. Deserting Philip, whom he had sworn to assist, he went and threw himself at the feet of his brother, and humbly begged his forgiveness. Richard, with a kingly magnanimity, answered, "I forgive him, and hope I shall as easily forget his injuries as he will forget my pardon."

In the latter part of the year that Richard returned to England, his oppressor, the Duke of Austria, met with an accident which caused his death. He was thrown from his horse at a tournament, and the animal falling upon him, crushed his foot. Fever and mortification followed; and in his dying moments, the duke, who had been excommunicated for his conduct to the English king, bought absolution from the church by returning to Richard the money he had wrung from him, and the hostages whom he held as security for the remainder.

A great deal of money had been extorted from the poor to carry on Richard's wars in France, and much discontent arose among the labouring classes in consequence. They said that they had to pay the burdens of the state, while the rich contrived to be almost free from taxation. They held tumultuous meetings, which caused great riot and disorder. Though they took improper means to redress their grievances, there is no doubt they had a just cause of complaint; but their violence alarmed well-disposed citizens, a great number of whom took part against them. There was a lawyer then in London, whose name was William Fitz-Osbert, a determined and eloquent man, and very good to the poor, who, in return, became much attached to him. In imitation of his Saxon ancestors, he let his beard grow to a great length, and was popularly known by the nickname of "Longbeard." He used to address orations to the people in public places; and the mob was so delighted with these discourses, that they called him the "Saviour of the Poor."

At this time Richard was in Normandy, and Longbeard went over to him, and laid the complaints of the people before their king. He was received without anger, and a promise given him that the wrongs he spoke of should be inquired into. The monarch, however, soon forgot the oppressions of his subjects, and nothing was done for them. Then Longbeard and his followers entered into a secret and unlawful association, and it is said that 52,000 people bound themselves by an oath to obey him in all things. In the excited state of mind in which these ignorant men were, it is not wonderful that they committed many outrages, and frequently plundered or insulted the rich. These riots were laid to the charge of Longbeard, and the government summoned him to appear and answer for his conduct. He obeyed the summons; but went attended by such a vast multitude of people, that it was considered prudent to dismiss him. Still, Hubert Walter, the chief justiciary of England, was determined to arrest this dangerous demagogue, who had now become the terror of the citizens of London, particularly of the wealthier portion of them. To carry out this determination was no easy matter, as Longbeard seldom went anywhere without being attended by a great number of people. At length he was met walking with only nine of his followers, and instantly surrounded. Drawing his knife, he stabbed the man who seized him, fled with his companions, and took refuge in the church of St. Mary-le-Bow. Here they made a desperate resistance, and for some days kept their assailants at bay, who at last set fire to the church; Longbeard and his friends, flying from the flames, were instantly seized, bound, and dragged away to the Tower. There Hubert Walter immediately sentenced them to be hanged; and the mistaken patriot and his followers were hurried off to Smithfield, and executed.

The noisy people who had been so ready to riot and plunder, now very quietly left "their saviour" and his companions to their fate. Not a hand was raised to rescue them from the executioner; though, after Longbeard's death, the mob stole his body, and the gibbet on which it was suspended. They declared he was a saint and a martyr, and that miracles were performed by the corpse; while they cut the gibbet into little pieces, and distributed them as sacred relics. Thousands of people visited the spot where he had been hanged, to kneel and pray there; many, it is said, were healed of almost incurable diseases while they were thus occupied; and a large hole was left in the ground, from so many enthusiasts having carried away a little of the earth on which the gibbet stood. It was some time before these wild proceedings could be stopped, and a very much longer time before the fate of Longbeard was forgotten by his admirers.—This unhappy man perished in the year 1196—a year in which England was visited, first by a famine and then by the plague In that age, and for long after, the people generally lived in such close and dirty houses, that if they fed for some time on a scanty supply of bad, innutritious food, they were almost certain to fall victims to contagious sickness: and it may rather be said, that by dirt, bad air, and bad food, they made the plague, than that they were visited by it.

In the year 1197, war broke out again between the kings of England and France: it was carried on very savagely, both sovereigns occasionally putting out the eyes of their prisoners; but neither Richard nor Philip gained much advantage by it. In this war—early in 1198—the battle of Gisors was fought, in which the French were defeated. In this battle, Richard's parole was "Dieu et mon Droit" ("God and my right"); a motto which, from that time, has formed part of the royal arms of England. This was the principal engagement; and the two kings, having fought until they were each tired, or had no more money to pay their soldiers, again entered into a truce for twelve months.—The old chroniclers tell an anecdote connected with this war, which is worth preserving. The Bishop of Beauvais, a very bitter enemy of Richard's, fought on the side of the French king. He was, no doubt, a much better soldier than a preacher; and he rode to battle arrayed in a complete suit of bright armour, and laid about him very resolutely. He was taken prisoner, and brought before the English king, who ordered him to be heavily ironed, and put into prison. Two of the bishop's inferior clergy waited upon Richard, and implored him to have respect for the sacred character of their superior, and treat him with more lenity. After listening courteously to their appeal, the king answered—"You yourselves shall judge between this man and me. Much I could forgive, but I cannot forgive the wrongs he has done me. When I was a captive in the hands of the emperor, and when, in consideration of my rank, my gaolers were beginning to treat me more gently and respectfully, your master arrived, and spoke with the emperor. I soon experienced the effects of his visit; for, the next morning, a chain was put upon me, such as a horse could hardly bear. What he now merits at my hands declare yourselves, and be just." The abashed priest bowed and withdrew.—Pope Celestine then interceded with Richard on behalf of the imprisoned bishop, whom, in the language of the church, he called his son. The witty king sent the blood-stained coat of mail, which the bishop had worn in battle, to the pontiff, with a message couched in the words which Jacob's sons once addressed to that patriarch—"This have we found: know now whether it be thy son's coat or no." The pope was offended at the violent conduct of the bishop, and felt that he deserved his fate; so, with a grim smile, he answered, that the warlike priest "was neither his son nor the son of the church; and that he should be ransomed at the king's will, because he was rather a servitor of Mars than a soldier of Christ."

At Limoges, in France, there lived, at this time, a nobleman named Vidomar, who was a vassal of the English king. By some accident he discovered a treasure upon his domains, part of which he sent to Richard as a present. The king, as superior lord, demanded the whole of it; but Vidomar refused to give him more than half. Furious at this denial, Richard hurried to Limoges, and besieged Vidomar in his castle at Chaluz. After a short resistance, the garrison offered to surrender, if the king would only spare their lives. The stern monarch would not grant this reasonable condition; but replied, that since he had taken the trouble to come and besiege the place in person, he would take it by storm, and hang every one within it. The very day he made this savage threat, Richard, in company with Marcadée, the leader of a troop of Brabançons, in the king's pay, approached the walls of the castle, to see where the assault could be best made. While thus occupied, a young archer, named Bertrand de Gurdan, recognised the king, and discharged an arrow, which whizzed swiftly through the air, and buried its forked head deep in the left shoulder of the monarch.

Stained with blood, and suffering acute pain, Richard was led to his tent; a surgeon approached to extract the weapon; but he conducted the operation in so rough and unskilful a manner, that mortification followed, and the patient soon felt that he was dying. In the meantime the castle had been taken by assault, and every one in it hanged or slaughtered, except Bertrand, who had been reserved for some more savage punishment. The dying monarch desired to see him; and the archer, loaded with chains, was brought into his presence. Regarding the youth sternly, he said—"Wretch! what have I done unto thee that thou shouldst seek my life?" The bold Bertrand stood proudly erect, as he exclaimed—"What have you done to me? you have killed with your own hands my father and my two brothers; and you intended to have hanged me. I am now in your power, and you may take revenge by inflicting on me the most severe torments; but I shall endure them all with pleasure, if I can but be sure that I have been so happy as to rid the world of so great a tyrant."

Richard, though stern, and sometimes cruel, had a generous heart, which frequently prompted him to noble actions: he was struck with the courage of the man who had given him his death-blow, and the truth of his defence. "Youth," he exclaimed, "I forgive thee!" Then he added—"Loose his chains, and give him a hundred shillings." Bertrand departed; but he was not so fortunate as to escape; the brutal Marcadée seized him without the knowledge of the king, and caused him first to be flayed alive, and then hanged—a shocking sentence, which, to modern ears, sounds almost as incredible as it was revolting.

The king's sufferings were great, and his last moments were spent in contrition and acts of devotion. He died on the 6th of April, 1199, in the forty-second year of his age. For ten years he had wielded the regal sceptre of England; but he did not pass quite one year of that time in the land he governed. His heart, according to his last commands, was buried at the magnificent cathedral of Rouen; his entrails in Poictevins; and his body was laid in the earth in the abbey of Fontevraud, at the feet of his father.

In his last hour he remembered the unnatural rebellion of his early life, and wished, even in death, to show a tardy repentance and submission to his royal, but unhappy parent. He left no legitimate children to succeed him; and, strange as it may appear, seems never to have met his Queen Berengaria since their ships were parted by a storm on their return from Palestine. On account of his undaunted courage he was called Cœur de Lion; that is, lion's heart. There is one tradition which says that this name was given him because he tore out the heart of a lion, to whose fury he had been exposed by his enemy the Duke of Austria; and another, which states that he was attacked by a lion in the plains of Syria, and that although he had gone out unarmed, he seized the savage beast by the mane, and, thrusting his hand down its throat, tore out its heart. Modern writers reject these tales as untrue; but they show the idea that the king's subjects entertained of his wonderful strength and boldness.

Richard's great military renown, his heroism, and his generosity, won him the love and admiration of his people: but he cannot be classed with the really good kings. He was revengeful, domineering, and ambitious; always haughty, and too frequently cruel. At the same time he was open and frank—sincere, and truly brave; and possessed some noble touches of character, which caused him to contrast most favourably with his brother John.* His cruelties proceeded from impulse rather than from evil principles: his wrong-doing was frequently the result of carelessness; and he many times displayed a princely magnanimity in forgiving injuries. It is said, also, that he loved his people; but his greater love of glory, and his intense desire to distinguish himself in what was then the great object of all Christian princes—wresting the Holy Land from the hands of the infidels—prevented him from devoting himself to the promotion of their prosperity and happiness. In looking for the favourable points of his character, we must say that he was more brilliant than just; a great soldier rather than a good king. It should be added, that he was exceedingly fond of poetry, and wrote some himself, which is said to possess considerable merit.

In this reign lived the famous outlaw, Robin Hood, whose wild exploits and great skill in archery form the subject of so many of our old English ballads. Our knowledge of him is partly traditional; that is, it has come down to us from age to age by word of mouth; and some writers have even doubted his existence. There seems no just reason for doing so; although many of the adventures attributed to him are probably nothing more than fictions. It is said that he was a nobleman by birth, his proper title being the Earl of Huntingdon; but having squandered his estate in dissipation and extravagant riots, he took to the woods, and, collecting a band of ruined, reckless men, lived by plunder; preferring that wild and dishonest way of life to honourable industry, or a servile dependence upon wealthy friends. He never robbed any but the rich; prevented his band from insulting or plundering ladies; and was exceedingly generous to the poor. His charity was so great, that he was much loved by the common people; and to this day his memory is cherished with respect and admiration. The mind is always prone to invest the romantic with attributes that frequently do not in any way pertain to it; and though we may be dazzled by the exploits which are related of this equivocal character, it must not be forgotten that actions, however chivalrous, and charity, however boundless, can never excuse theft; and a public robber must ever be regarded as a scourge to his country.

Robin Hood and his band occasionally infested Yorkshire; but they generally dwelt in the wild, sequestered coverts of the beautiful and romantic forest of Sherwood, in Nottinghamshire. The most celebrated of his companions was a man of remarkable height, humorously called Little John; Friar Tuck, a dissolute monk, who had turned robber; and Maid Marian, his mistress. In consequence of the many daring deeds of Robin, a reward was set upon his head; but, by his great bravery and cunning, he baffled every attempt made to arrest him. At length he fell ill of a fever, and went to a nunnery in Yorkshire for medical assistance. Having fancied that bleeding would do him good, a treacherous monk bled him to death, for the sake of the reward which had been offered for the life of the unfortunate outlaw. He was buried in the nunnery of Kirklees, in Yorkshire, and a tombstone, on which was engraved the following epitaph, placed over his grave:—

"Robert, Earl of Huntingdon,
Lies here, his labour being done;
No archer like him was so good;
His wildness named him Robin Hood.
For thirteen years, and somewhat more,
These northern parts he vexèd sore;
Such outlaws as he and his men,
May England never know again."

During the crusades, the practice of wearing coats of arms first arose in England. Closed up in their ponderous suits of armour, which covered even the face, the knights and warriors had no means of knowing each other; this led to each of them wearing some particular device painted or worked upon his shield; and thus we have the origin of heraldry. Richard, probably in allusion to his name (Cœur de Lion), had three lions emblazoned on his shield—a device which has been retained upon the royal arms of England to the present day.

CHAPTER XVII.

THE REIGN OF KING JOHN, CALLED SANS-TERRE, OR LACKLAND.—A.D. 1199—1213.

JOHN was called SANS-TERRE, which means, literally, without earth; because his father, Henry II., left him no lands to govern, but merely recommended him to the care of his elder brother. He had not a strict right to succeed to the throne; and if he had been a just man, would probably have remained a "lackland" to the end of his life—a position which would have been better for himself, and a thousand times better for his country. According to what is called the law of primogeniture, which means the law that relates to the succession of titles and estates, the eldest son of a king or nobleman has a peculiar privilege or birthright. By this birthright all his father's estates descend to him; and when he dies they descend in like manner to his eldest son. This applies only to landed property; and though it may sometimes make the elder brother of a family rich, and leave all the younger ones comparatively poor, still, as it entails many obligations, it is not without practical advantage to society.

John was Henry's fifth son; and Geoffrey, who was the fourth, died before his father; but he left an infant son, Arthur, who, after the death of Richard without issue, was, according to the law of primogeniture, the true heir to the throne. John had, however, long determined to wrest the crown from his nephew; and when the news reached him, in Normandy, of King Richard's sudden and unexpected death, he immediately seized the royal treasures at the castle of Chinon, and hurried over to England. There everything was in confusion; for, in those times, a king's death was an opportunity for riot and plunder, which badly-disposed people seldom permitted to pass by without getting all they could out of the general excitement. Many of the barons oppressed and robbed the people; so the people imitated the example of their betters, and oppressed and robbed each other. But the active Hubert Walter, the Archbishop of Canterbury and late justiciary of the kingdom; together with William Mareschall, the Earl of Strigul; and Geoffrey Fitz-Peter, who were all favourite ministers of the late king, set to work to restore peace and tranquillity. These three powerful men took the side of John; and, calling a great meeting of prelates and barons at Northampton, induced the assembly to swear fealty to the absent prince. Richard had mentioned Arthur as his successor; and many would have preferred the young prince, instead of his uncle, for their sovereign; but when John arrived in England, he produced a will, made, he said, by the late king when dying, by which he was named as the successor to the crown. Some people suspected this will to be a forgery; and when we consider the character of John, it is very likely that it was; still it created a considerable impression in his favour.

The new sovereign was crowned King of England at Westminster, on the 27th of May, 1199; but he was expressly declared an elected, and not an hereditary ruler; that is, it was said he did not succeed to the throne by his own right, but was chosen to fill it by the will of the nation. This was then a novel doctrine, which had never before this time been applied to the royalty of England. On this occasion, the Archbishop of Canterbury, before placing the crown upon the head of John, turned to the bishops, barons, and people who thronged the abbey, and thus addressed them:—

"Ye well know that no one can have a right to the crown of this kingdom, unless for his great virtues he be elected to it, and then anointed king. Thus it was with Saul, who was not the son of a king, nor even royally connected; and thus also was it with David. It was so ordained, that he whose merits are pre-eminent, might be chosen as the lord of all the people; and if, among the family of our deceased king, there is one so happily endowed, he ought to have our preference. This I say touching the noble Duke John, here present, the brother of our late excellent king. He is of the same blood, and possesses the same great qualities; and therefore, having invoked the Holy Spirit, we elect him our king."

John was two-and-thirty years old when he ascended the throne—an age which, in many respects, made him preferable to the boyish Arthur; but he had already shown himself so treacherous and cruel, that no one liked him, and all the Norman nobles took up arms in favour of his nephew. Philip, the crafty King of France, also took up the cause of Arthur, because he thought it would be an excellent means of throwing England into confusion; and war immediately broke out between him and John. Hostilities were conducted in a very trivial manner, and, after being prolonged for some time, a peace was concluded between the two sovereigns. To make it the more lasting, John gave his niece, Blanche of Castille, in marriage to Philip's eldest son, Prince Louis. The result of this peace was, that Arthur was abandoned by King Philip, and lost his only chance of succession to the English crown.

Even so early as the second year of John's reign, he began to show his evil disposition. He had been married for about ten years to a beautiful and amiable lady, named Avisa; she was a daughter of the powerful Earl of Gloucester, and had brought a great fortune to her husband. In the course of a royal progress through his kingdom, John met the elegant Isabella, daughter of the Count of Angoulême, a lady whose gracefulness and beauty made her the subject of general admiration. She had lately been married to the Count de la Marche; though, on account of the extreme youth of the bride and bridegroom, they had not yet lived together. The king saw the graceful girl, and loved her; that is, if the word love can be used to express any emotion felt by such a selfish, cold-hearted man as John. But he so far admired her as to induce him to divorce his Queen Avisa, and (in defiance of the fact that Isabella was the wife of another) to carry her off and marry her himself. He bribed her father to consent to this shameful action, and I suppose induced the young lady herself to do so; but the wronged husband immediately revolted, and took up the cause of Prince Arthur. The pope, Innocent III., who at that time ruled at the Vatican, expressed great disgust and anger at John's unprincipled and immoral behaviour.

In the year 1202, King Philip again encouraged Arthur in his hopeless claim, and excited him to attempt to obtain the English crown by force. "Will you desert your rights?" said he. "Would you not be a king?" "Indeed would I," answered the youth, who was but fifteen years of age, and therefore ignorant of the dangers that threatened him. "Here, then," rejoined Philip, "are 200 knights; march with them and take the continental provinces which are yours, while I invade Normandy." Away went the simple prince with the paltry force which the French king had placed at his disposal; and the people of Brittany having sent 500 more knights, and 4,000 soldiers, he fancied himself already a military hero.

It happened that Arthur's grandmother, the Queen-Dowager Eleanor, who had never liked him, was staying at the town of Mirabeau, near Poictiers. The young prince thought, or some of his friends told him, that it would be an admirable thing to seize the town, and take the old lady prisoner. With her in his power, he fancied his uncle John would come to terms, and, perhaps, even abandon the crown in his favour. Off he marched, with banners flying and drums beating, to Mirabeau; the town yielded to him, but Eleanor escaped: this royal fox had seen too many adventures to be captured by so young a huntsman. Taking refuge in a strongly-built and fortified tower, she kept his troops at bay. This military exploit of the young prince does not represent him in a very amiable light; it seems as if he was actuated by the same spirit which induced his reprobate father, Geoffrey, to rebel against his parent. It was an unseemly and unnatural thing for a boy to be making war against his grandmother, a woman of eighty, and wishing to consign her grey head to a prison: the case, also, is aggravated when it is recollected that Arthur was the aggressor. His punishment, however, was at hand, and it was a dreadfully disproportionate and terrible one. John, hearing the danger of his mother, hurried off with an army to her assistance. In a little while the tables were turned; for the aged Eleanor was in safety, and Arthur a prisoner in the hands of his grim uncle. Two hundred knights and nobles were captured with him; whom John loaded with irons and shut up in dungeons in Normandy and England, where they mostly perished from neglect and want. Twenty-two of these noblemen are said to have been starved to death in Corfe Castle.

Arthur was sent a prisoner to the castle of Falaise, and here John had a meeting with his nephew. The hypocritical king was at that moment plotting the death of the now defenceless boy; yet he spoke kindly to him, and said he wished to win his confidence and affection. "Give me mine inheritance," replid Arthur boldly; "restore to me my kingdom of England." A dark scowl passed over the pallid face of John, and his suspicious, furtive-looking eyes glared with passion. Soon afterwards, he proposed to one William de la Bray to undertake the murder of the young prince; but Bray replied indignantly, "that he was a gentleman, not a hangman." Then the tyrant made the same wicked proposition to Hubert de Burgh, who was warder of the castle. Hubert, also, was disgusted; but he pretended to comply with John's horrid wish, in order that he might save the unhappy prince. When some ruffians arrived from the king to execute the sinful deed, he sent them back, saying that Arthur had died in prison, and then buried an empty coffin, in order to give a colour to his report. So loud a cry of indignation followed this event, especially in Normandy, that John was alarmed; and Hubert, to calm his fears, confessed that Arthur still lived.

This confession was fatal to the imprisoned prince. John soon recovered from his fears; and then, taking Arthur out of the custody of the pitying Hubert, removed him to the castle of Rouen. Powerless as Arthur was, John could not rest while he lived; the tyrant knew that no one loved him, and he feared, that when his nephew became a man, he might be the cause of his dethronement. Again he determined to murder the helpless boy; and this time he resolved to trust to no hands but his own to execute the infamous deed of blood.

Some doubt exists as to the precise manner in which the murder was accomplished; but the account which is generally believed to be correct is the following. One night, during the month of April, in the year 1203, the poor lonely boy was suddenly roused from his sleep, and told that he must descend to the foot of the tower. The river Seine flowed by the foundations of the castle, and the bleak spring winds moaned round its walls, and rushed in sudden gusts up its stone flights of steps, as the shivering and alarmed boy followed his gaoler down them. Arrived at the grim portal, he beheld his stern uncle John; his figure was shrouded in a mantle; but his cold, cruel-looking eyes glared in the starlight, like those of a crouching tiger. By his side was Walter de Maulac, his esquire, a man infamous for his barbarity. In a moment the unhappy young prince was conscious of the fate that awaited him, and, throwing himself upon his knees, he implored his uncle to spare his life. John was unmoved, and gave De Maulac a sign to strike the blow; but even this fellow did not like to kill a mere boy in cold blood, and he hesitated. Cursing De Maulac for cowardice, the tyrant seized Arthur by the hair, and stabbing the shrieking boy, threw his yet warm and quivering body into the river. The character of John is stained with many other deeds of mean dastardly cruelty; but this one fearful act alone is sufficient to cover his memory for ever with a load of infamy; and he did not altogether escape the consequences of this wicked murder. A cry of indignation arose against him, and he became an object of universal detestation. The people of Brittany, who were much attached to Arthur (for he was their prince), took up arms against his assassin; and Philip, the French king, summoned him, as his vassal, to appear and stand a trial by his peers. John, of course, did not obey this summons, so Philip declared him a parricide, a traitor, and an enemy to France; and adjudged him to forfeit all the dominions which he held in that country.

Philip had very little sympathy for the sad fate of young Arthur; but he had a great desire to obtain possession of Normandy, and all the towns which the English held in France. He therefore raised an army, for the purpose of putting in force the sentence of confiscation he had passed upon the regal murderer. The enraged Bretons flocked to his standard in vast multitudes, and he was joined [A.D. 1204] by many of the Norman barons. Town after town fell before him, or surrendered to his rule; while King John remained in idleness at Rouen, surrounded by vulgar flatterers, and spending his time in feasts and dances. Not that he felt any pleasure in these ill-timed revels: news was constantly reaching him of the disgraceful loss of his dominions in France, and he plunged into dissipation to try and forget his shame. Sometimes, on being told of a new loss, he would pretend that he despised his foes; and, in a tone of ridiculous bravado, say—"Let them go on; let these French and this rabble of Bretons go on; I will recover in a single day all that they are taking from me with so much pains." But though he talked thus bravely when the French were at a distance, as soon as they came near Rouen, he rode off as fast as his horse could carry him, and, hurrying on board ship, fled for safety to England.

Instead of collecting an army for his defence, the coward John then wrote to the pope, and begged him to interfere in his behalf; and, strange as it may seem, the supreme head of the Christian church sent two legates to the French court to plead the murderer's cause. But if the pope smiled on deeds of blood, heaven did not, and the eloquence of the legates was spent in vain. John then raised an army; but his barons refused to follow him out of England; and before the year 1205 closed, he had lost possession of Normandy, Anjou, Maine, Touraine, and Poictou; and scarcely a rood of land was left him in France. Thus disgraced by the cowardice of their king, the English people were losing that high reputation for courage and ability which they had enjoyed during the reign of the great Henry II., and even in the time of his less capable son, Richard. John's timidity and indolence also exposed him to the contempt of his barons; and it is no wonder that they soon both despised and defied him. As England fell in power and estimation, so France rose; and Philip, more through John's despicable cowardice than from his own genius, conferred, in a few years, as much military glory upon his country as might, under other circumstances, have cost him ages to attain.

At length John went with an army over to France, where he burned the town of Angers, and committed a number of cruelties; but he and Philip afterwards consented to a truce for two years. He might now have devoted himself to promote the happiness of his people, and win back the esteem of his barons; but his unhappy temper would not long permit him to live in peace, and he soon engaged in a quarrel with an adversary far more dangerous than the French king. In the year 1206, Hubert Walter, the Archbishop of Canterbury, died; and a dispute arose who should be his successor. The Roman pontiffs had long claimed the power of filling vacant bishoprics in any country throughout Christendom: in England this claim had never been admitted; but Pope Innocent III., a man of great talent and ambition, thought he would take advantage of John's weakness and unpopularity to establish the right of Rome to regulate the affairs of the church of England.

The king had recommended John de Gray, the Bishop of Norwich, to the vacant see of Canterbury. The pope refused to sanction that appointment, and nominated Stephen Langton, an Englishman by birth, but who had long been closely connected with the court of Rome, to be the future archbishop. The monks of Canterbury had to decide between obedience to their sovereign and obedience to the pope: they chose the latter, and accepted Langton as their spiritual ruler. Sensible that John would feel angry at this proceeding, Pope Innocent endeavoured to pacify him in a singular and rather foolish manner. He sent a legate from Rome, who presented the English monarch with four valuable rings, and desired him to consider four things concerning them; namely, their form, number, matter, and colours. Their form, he said, being round, was an emblem of eternity, which had neither beginning nor end; and from that he ought to learn the duty of aspiring from earthly things to those of heaven. Their number, four, being a square, denoted steadiness of mind, not to be overthrown either by adversity or prosperity; but fixed for ever on the firm foundation of the four cardinal virtues. The matter or substance of the rings being gold, the most precious of metals, signified wisdom, the most valuable of all accomplishments; and justly preferred by Solomon to riches, power, and all other attainments. As to colour, that of the sapphire represented faith; that of the emerald, hope; that of the ruby, charity; and that of the topaz, good works. In the sapphire, therefore, you have what you are to believe; in the emerald, what you are to hope; in the ruby, what you are to love; and in the topaz, what you are to practise; to the end that you may proceed from virtue to virtue, till you come to the vision of the God of Gods in Sion.

John was not to be deluded by these toys into a surrender of one of the most important prerogatives of his crown: he regarded the rings with contempt, and dismissed the legate with anger. Then, in one of those fits of mad passion to which he was ever subject, he sent two blunt, coarse-mannered knights, and a band of soldiers, to take vengeance on the monks of Canterbury by driving them from the land. Rushing, with drawn swords, among the frightened priests, the knights thus addressed them:—"In the king's name we command you to quit the realm as traitors; away with you instantly, or we will set fire to your convent, and burn it and you together." The downcast monks departed, and, wandering abroad, were received into convents on the continent, and hospitably provided for. That their disobedience to the king demanded inquiry, and perhaps punishment, cannot reasonably be doubted; but John's barbarous conduct was in defiance of all law, and utterly unworthy of the ruler of a great country.

The pope immediately sent John another message, exhorting him not to oppose God and the church, nor persecute that cause for which the holy martyr, Sir Thomas à Becket, had sacrificed his life, and which had exalted him to an equality with the highest saints in heaven. This was a quiet hint to John that his strong-minded father, Henry, had been compelled to submit to the power of Rome; but the passionate king disregarded the hint, and set the pope at defiance. Our great poet, Shakspeare, has represented John as scornfully inquiring of the legate—

> "What earthly name to interrogatories
> Can task the free breath of a sacred king?
> Thou canst not, cardinal, devise a name
> So slight, unworthy, and ridiculous,
> To charge me to an answer, as the pope."

This language is the invention of the poet; but something like it was doubtless used by John, and the horrified cardinal returned to Rome to relate the circumstance to his spiritual superior. Innocent then sent a command to the Bishops of London, Ely, and Worcester, to wait upon the king, and threaten that they would lay his dominions under an interdict if he persevered in his rebellion against the church. The prelates obeyed the papal mandate; but when they came to the threat, John turned livid with passion, and foamed at the mouth, as he roared out—"By God's teeth! if you, or any of your body, dare to lay my dominions under an interdict, I will banish you all to Rome, and confiscate your property. As for the Roman shavelings, if I find any in this country, I will tear out their eyes, and cut off their noses, and so send them to the pope, that the nations may witness their infamy."

The bishops, without reply, withdrew from the presence of the king; but in a few weeks afterwards (in March, 1208), they pronounced the solemn sentence of INTERDICT upon all John's dominions, and then fled from the country. It was well for them they did fly, or their lives might have paid the forfeit for thus defying their sovereign, and bringing misery and confusion upon their native land. However criminal John was in other respects, he was only foolhardy and obstinate in this; and these cowardly bishops, in order to vex him, severely punished his people. The effect of an interdict upon a nation has been already stated; and it is difficult to convey an idea of the intense gloom and desolation which, in that superstitious age, it produced throughout the country. All religious services to the living, and consolation to the dying, were strictly prohibited; while the dead, instead of being laid in consecrated ground, were buried in fields and gardens, or thrown into ditches to rot. Monks walked about with solemn steps and downcast looks, labour was deserted, and everywhere there reigned an awful silence, as if the land had been desolated by the plague.

This strange state of things lasted for five years, and the interdict was only removed at the end of that period [in A.D. 1213], in consequence of John's submission to the pope. This instrument of papal vengeance would have had far less effect if John had been loved by his people: for if every one had agreed to stand fast by their sovereign, the priests would not have dared to carry out the sentence of interdict very strictly, and it would, in consequence, have been but lightly felt. The pope at Rome only pronounced the sentence; the clergy in England inflicted the punishment. The pope was a supreme despot, who assumed authority over the whole earth, and they were his spiritual guards and executioners. These monks and bishops acted a most unpatriotic part, and showed very little Christian love and charity for their fellow-creatures; but whenever ignorance and superstition have been general, the pure, gentle, forgiving spirit of true religion has ever been forgotten or trampled on.

John's tyranny so disgusted his subjects that no one cared to serve him, and the interdict was observed in all its gloomy force. He had practised every kind of paltry annoyance against his barons, prohibiting them from their favourite amusement of hunting feathered game, breaking down all their hedges and fences near his forests, that his deer might pasture in their fields; and, what was far worse, bringing dishonour upon their families by his wicked pleasures. Knowing how much he was hated, and constantly in dread of a revolt against his authority, immediately after the sentence of interdict had been passed, he obliged many of his nobles to place their children in his hands as hostages of their loyalty and obedience to him. One day, his messengers went to the castle of a baron, named William de Braouse, to demand his son. Lady Braouse was a woman of more spirit than wisdom, and she exclaimed, "My son shall not go near him; he murdered his own nephew, whom he ought to have protected, and I will not place my boy in his power!" The noble was sensible of his wife's imprudence, and, after checking her, he said to the officers, "If I have done anything against my sovereign, I am ready to make him satisfaction without hostages, according to the judgment of his court and my peers." Knowing the savage temper of John, Braouse fled to Ireland with his wife and child; but the merciless tyrant discovered their hiding-place, and put the lady and her son in prison, where they died from starvation: the husband, also, might have shared the same fate, but he contrived to escape to France.

As the sentence of interdict upon John's dominions failed to reduce him to submission to the power of the Roman priesthood, the pope, a year afterwards [A.D. 1209], pronounced another sentence—that of excommunication against John himself. Excommunication consisted in solemnly uttering, with a great deal of ceremony, an awful and malicious curse upon the person against whom it was directed, excluding him from all religious service or consolation in this world, and declaring that an eternity of horrible anguish awaited him in the next. Fortunately for the happiness of us all, the power of man does not extend further than this life; neither popes nor tyrants can carry their malice beyond the grave. After that, our fate rests only in the hands of God; his power alone elevates us to bliss, or consigns us to punishment; and we may rest satisfied that his merciful judgments are not swayed by the curses of any arrogant priest.

But though excommunication can have no influence on a man's eternal happiness, it had, in former ages, a great effect upon his worldly prospects; and this John soon discovered. He was powerful enough to prevent the sentence from being read aloud in the churches; but it soon became known throughout the kingdom. One Geoffrey, the Archdeacon of Norwich, who also possessed an important office in the Court of the Exchequer, heard of it while he was sitting on the bench, and remarking to his associates that it was a dangerous thing to serve under an excommunicated king, rose instantly and left the court. This was an improper desertion of his duty, and merited punishment; but John, as was usual with him, resented it with a malicious fury. He commanded the priest to be seized and thrown into prison, and a leaden cope of great weight to be fixed upon his head. From this and other rough treatment the archdeacon soon died.

Such severity, however, did not do away with the effects of the excommunication; most of the bishops stole secretly out of the kingdom, and many of the barons followed their example. An old monkish chronicler relates, that, in this emergency, John even applied for assistance to the powerful Emir, Mohammed al Nassir, chief of the Moors of Spain; and offered, in return, to embrace the Mahometan faith, and hold the English crown as a vassal of the Emirs; but that the negotiation ended in nothing. It is possible that this story may be untrue; but, considering the character of John, it is by no means improbable.

To relieve the monotony and gloomy weariness which haunted him at home, John, in the year 1210, raised an army and proceeded to Ireland, where many English nobles had taken refuge and defied his authority. He reduced most of them to obedience; and having received the homage of the Irish chieftains, who offered no resistance, he returned triumphantly to England.

The next year he invaded Wales, and marched as far as Snowdon; and having exacted a tribute from the country in cattle and horses, and taken away eight-and-twenty youths of noble family as hostages for the peaceable conduct of the country, he again returned to his own kingdom. Of course he required money for these two expeditions, and he obtained it by the most oppressive measures. But, of all his subjects, none suffered so much as the unhappy Jews, who were robbed in the most shameful manner, thrown into dungeons, and tortured until they consented to pay large sums for their liberty. From one very rich Jew, John demanded the enormous sum of ten thousand marks. The wretched man declared that he did not possess so much; upon which the infamous tyrant committed him to prison, and ordered one of his teeth to be drawn every day until he paid the money. The executioner began with the double teeth, and the oppressed Jew had the courage to undergo seven operations. Then the power of endurance failed him, and he surrendered his wealth to the extortioner.

As neither the sentence of interdict nor that of excommunication had succeeded in humbling John, the pope, in the year 1212, pronounced his DETHRONEMENT; and called upon all Christian kings and nobles to assist in wresting the crown from the head of one who so impiously defied the church. This call was responded to by John's old enemy, King Philip of France, who collected a fleet of no less than 1,700 ships for the purpose of invading England. The pope blessed his banner, and promised him a remission of all his sins, if he succeeded in driving John into exile. The English spirit was roused by this act; and when John summoned every man capable of bearing arms to be ready to defend their country, 60,000 men flocked to his standard. His bold seamen, too, sailed over the channel; attacked a French fleet, which they met at the mouth of the river Seine; defeated it, burned the town of Dieppe to ashes, and, after proceeding defiantly along the whole Norman coast, returned to England in triumph. The consecrated banner which the pope had given to King Philip had no effect in saving his ships from the just anger and patriotic revenge of the English mariners.

Still the cowardly John shrunk from the impending struggle; and when Pandulph, the pope's legate, asked for a private conference with him at Dover, he readily granted it. The priest then gave him such an eloquent description of the power of the French armament—of the hatred with which he was regarded by both his barons and his people, and of the secret conspiracies hatching against him, that the miserable tyrant was overcome with terror. Pandulph assured him, that if he would submit to the supreme pontiff, he should be again received into the church, which would extend to him her protection, and save his dominions from the threatened invasion by Philip. It is difficult to imagine how John could descend to the abject and humiliating act which the legate induced him to perform. Having promised to admit Stephen Langton to the office of Archbishop of Canterbury; to restore all the banished clergy, and make compensation for the mischief he had done to them, he went to the church of the Templars at Dover; and there, on his knees before Pandulph, declared, that not constrained by fear, but of his own free will, and by the advice and consent of his barons, he, for the remission of his sins, resigned his kingdoms of England and Ireland to God, St. Peter and St. Paul, and to Pope Innocent and his successors in the apostolic chair; and that he agreed to hold those dominions as a vassal of the church of Rome, and pay to it a yearly tribute of 1,000 marks. He then offered a sum of money as an emblem of his subjection; but the haughty priest contemptuously trampled it beneath his feet. This infamous act of John's, by which the whole nation was disgraced, took place on the 15th of May, 1213. In return, the legate, Pandulph, undertook to save England from the invasion of the French king. Other hands were at work, however, in the cause of England's honour; and her independence was not long sacrificed to the ambition of Rome.

CHAPTER XVIII.

CONCLUSION OF THE REIGN OF KING JOHN.—A.D. 1213—1216.

SHORTLY before King John had resigned his crown into the hands of the pope, a man of singular but impressive appearance had been preaching in the streets of Pontefract, and other towns. He was a religious enthusiast, and spoke with such a zealous warmth, and so much rude eloquence, that his sermons were listened to by vast bare-headed crowds with the greatest respect. He was known as Peter the Hermit. But it was not to preaching alone that Peter confined himself; he aspired to be considered as a prophet; and the multitude admitted his claim to that character. The poor man, who was probably a little crazy, might very likely have lived, and preached, and prophesied in peace, but that he had the imprudence to predict, that, before the Feast of the Ascension, the king would be unknighted. For this he and his son were seized by the tyrant and thrown into prison. The superstitious John, however, trembled, for he thought the prediction meant that he should die; and a dread of its possible truth influenced him in his submission to Pandulph. Strangely enough, that submission took place on the eve of the Feast of the Ascension; and thus it may be said that the hermit's prediction was fulfilled. It is likely that it required no miraculous knowledge to guess that John would, before that time, do some act which would disgrace him. This sort of fulfilment, however, did not pacify the king's fears; he thought the hermit had prophesied his death; and as he was still alive, he considered Peter as an impostor, and condemned both him and his son to be dragged to the gallows at the tails of horses, and then hanged. This wicked sentence was executed at the town of Warham.

When Pandulph left England, elated by the triumph he had obtained over its recreant king, he proceeded at once to France, and presented himself before Philip, whom he informed that John was now a penitent son of the church, a vassal of Rome, and that he, as a Christian prince, could not presume to attack a country which was the patrimony of St. Peter. The French king was astonished at such a sudden change on the part of the pope. He told the legate that he had undertaken the invasion of England at the express invitation of the Roman pontiff; that he had spent a large sum of money in preparation; and that he could not think of abandoning a contest in which he felt so certain of victory. All the expense, he added, had fallen upon him, but all the advantage had been reaped by the pope; he felt that he had been made a tool of in the affair; therefore, instead of giving up the attack upon England, he resolved to urge it on at once. Pandulph had passed his word to do that which he had no power to effect; and, to a large extent, John's beggarly humiliation to the pope was useless.

Cowardly as the king himself was, there were bold hearts yet beating in England; and a fleet of 500 ships was collected at Portsmouth, under the command of William Longsword, one of the sons of Fair Rosamond, and half-brother to John. Seven hundred knights, and a large body of common soldiers, were embarked in these vessels, and away they sailed, with the daring intention of attacking the enemy's fleet (which was three times more numerous than their own), even before it left the harbours of France. This led to the first great sea-fight between the French and English, and it ended in the total destruction of the French fleet [A.D. 1214]. Longsword having discovered, by means of some boats which he sent out as spies, that a great number of the French ships in the haven were left with only a few people in them (for most of the soldiers and sailors had gone on shore to enjoy themselves), immediately attacked the deserted fleet, captured a number of ships, and threw the rest into such confusion, that, after a desperate struggle, they were forced to yield. Three hundred ships were taken by the English; 100 more were burnt; and King Philip, fearing that the rest might also fall into the hands of his enemies, set fire to them himself, and then, half mad with disappointment, fled for safety to the interior of the kingdom.

Thus Philip, who had conspired against a nation's independence, was deservedly punished for his conduct. The pope's sentence of dethronement against John would have been only idle talk, if the officious French monarch had not attempted to carry it into execution; and the consequence was, the complete destruction of the fleet it had cost him so much to collect. At this period there was great joy in England; its arms were victorious; its king was reconciled to the church; the sentences of interdict and excommunication were removed; and there was yet a chance for the tyrant to devote his energies to the advancement and happiness of his people. That chance was offered in vain; no thought of good ever entered the heart of John; and, bad as things had been in England during his reign, they were to be far worse before it was ended.

Intoxicated with his success, John thought of following it up by an invasion of France, and he summoned all his barons to meet him with their followers at Portsmouth. But the barons had lost all confidence in their king; they hated his person, and despised his cowardice; and though they met in arms, they refused to embark with him to France. John attempted to shame them into compliance by setting sail himself with only a few ships; but when he had gone as far as Jersey, and found that they did not follow him, he swore a great oath of vengeance, and then returned. Mad with passion, he led a band of foreign mercenary troops to the north of England, to punish the barons who were most refractory. They marched along, burning villages, and wantonly murdering the people, until they reached Northampton. Here the king was overtaken by Langton, the Archbishop of Canterbury, who, though he had been forced upon the kingdom by the pope, was a just man, and a lover of his country. "These barbarous proceedings," said he, "are in violation of your coronation oaths; if your barons have offended, they must be judged by their peers, and not be wantonly harassed by arms." "Mind you your church," replied the king, "and leave me to govern the state!" But the bold archbishop was not to be easily frowned down; and having threatened John and his foreign followers with excommunication if they continued their outrages, the king gave up his design of taking vengeance on his barons by force of arms, and adopted the milder mode of summoning them to answer for their conduct.

Though previously compelled to abandon the invasion of France, John, in 1214, entered into a league with the Emperor of Germany, the Earl of Flanders, and the Earl of Boulogne, against Philip. This confederacy was a very formidable one; and the intention of the princes who composed it was, to subdue France, and divide that extensive country between them. Otho, the German emperor, entered France with an army of 100,000 soldiers; but this immense force was utterly defeated by King Philip, at a little village called Bouvines, between Lisle and Tournay. John, who had laid siege to the castle of Angers, never staid to fight at all, but ran away at the approach of the French, and that so quickly, that he left all his tents and stores behind him.—On the 18th of September, he concluded a humiliating peace with Philip at Chinon, and then returned to England.

On his arrival here, he conducted himself worse than before, and became more morose and ferocious than ever. Geoffrey Fitz-Peter, his justiciary, a wise and good man, whom John had always feared, had died during his absence. On hearing of the death of this faithful minister, the king gave a grim laugh, and exclaimed—"It is well; in hell he may again shake hands with Hubert, our late primate, for he will surely find him there. By God's teeth! now, for the first time I am King of England." This insolent ingratitude was soon to be punished, for difficulties were arising in which the miserable tyrant felt the loss of the man whose memory he had reviled.

Langton, the Archbishop of Canterbury, had assembled the discontented barons during the month of November, 1214, at St. Edmondsbury. There he read to them a copy of an almost forgotten charter given by Henry I. to his people, and exhorted them to insist on a renewal and observance of it. Excited by that rational love of liberty which is natural to English minds, and influenced by a disgust for the tyrant who was plunging the country into ruin, the barons, one by one, laid their hands upon the high altar of the church, and swore that if the king refused to sanction the charter they should present, they would unite in a war against him, and never cease from it until he consented to their demand. They then parted, to collect men and put their castles in a condition fit for defence, agreeing to meet again in London at Christmas-time.

Christmas-time came, and the king, who was at Worcester, found himself deserted, except by his personal attendants; for none of the great barons presented themselves at his silent court. John learnt what was going on, and, pale with fear and passion, hurried up to London. Then the barons appeared before him, and he demanded to know what they wanted. Presenting their petition, they awaited an answer in silence. At first, John tried to frighten them by threats and loud swearing; but as this produced no effect, he begged them to grant him until Easter for consideration. Knowing his treacherous character, they were not very willing to do so; but at length they consented, and then returned home.

In the period between Christmas and Easter, John tried his utmost to raise himself above the power of his barons: he began by courting the clergy, and bestowing upon them many privileges he had hitherto been very unwilling to yield. He wrote to Archbishop Langton, to win him to his interest; but that just priest was inflexibly true to the cause he had adopted. John then appealed to the pope, whom he implored to protect him against what he called the treasonable violence of his vassals; and, to win the good-will of the Roman pontiff, he promised to lead an army to the Holy Land. Indeed, he did nearly everything but what he ought to have done; and that was, to have granted the reasonable demands made upon him. The pope regretted these disturbances in England, which he thought might interfere with the absolute power he had so recently acquired there. He did not wish to hear subjects talk about rights and liberties, for those were forbidden words in the Roman church; so he wrote letters to the king, the barons, and the clergy. He desired John to treat his nobles with indulgence, and grant any reasonable demands they might make; the clergy he exhorted to promote peace between the contending parties; and to the barons he expressed his decided aversion of their employing force to extort concessions from their reluctant sovereign. This good advice was, as good advice generally is, disregarded by all parties; and things remained in just the same condition as they were before the pope was appealed to.

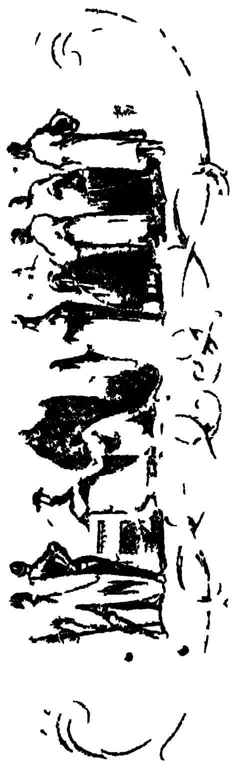
Easter [A.D. 1215] arrived; the king was keeping his court at Oxford; and the barons, attended by 2,000 knights, and an immense body of retainers, marched in military order to within fifteen miles of his residence. There they were met by a deputation from John, consisting of Archbishop Langton, the Earl of Pembroke, and the Earl of Warrene, who desired to know what were the liberties which they demanded from their sovereign? The archbishop, and the two nobles who accompanied him, were in league with the revolted barons; but, for form's sake, they had undertaken to appear on behalf of the king. Presenting the scroll which contained a list of their requirements, the allied nobles added—"These are our claims; and if they are not instantly granted, our swords shall do us justice." The messengers returned, and placed the document in the hands of the trembling John. After looking over the parchment, he burst into a fit of useless passion, and raved out—"And why do they not demand my crown also? By God's teeth! I will not grant them liberties which will make me a slave!"

When this answer was reported to the barons, they prepared at once for war; and choosing Robert Fitz-Walter as their leader, proclaimed themselves "the Army of God, and of Holy Church." Marching to Northampton, they laid siege to the castle; but it proved too strong for them, and they were obliged to abandon it. This was a bad beginning, and they began to feel very anxious for the result of their proceedings; failure would probably be ruin and death to them all; and they now became aware that the side which the great body of the people embraced would be the triumphant one. Proceeding to Bedford, they were delighted to find that the people there opened their gates, and welcomed them as deliverers and patriots. Messengers then arrived from London, desiring them to visit the metropolis; for all parties were alike disgusted with the worthless king. Gladly did they accept the invitation; and, on the following Sunday, with military tramp, and in solemn silence, they marched into the old city. The only sounds heard were the regular footfall of the soldiers, and the rattling of their gleaming, but ponderous armour. The next day they issued a proclamation, requiring all earls, barons, and knights who had hithero remained neutral, to join them against the tyrant, unless they desired to be considered as enemies to their country. This proclamation was heartily responded to; and, in a little while, the parties in this extraordinary quarrel were, on the one side, the whole nobility of England, backed by the great mass of its people, and, on the other, the almost totally deserted John.



At first he was paralysed with fear, and unable to arrive at any conclusion; but then his habitual hypocrisy came to his aid. Assuming a hollow smile, he sent a messenger to the revolted barons; and after, in vain, begging them to refer all disputed points to the pope, or to eight nobles, who should be chosen, half by him and half by them, he said that they had done well, and he would grant any liberties they might require. Thus, at last, he was compelled to yield, in shame and confusion, what, at first, he might have given with grace and honour.

This was in the year 1215; the day appointed for granting the demands of the charter was the 15th of June; the place was to be Runnymede, a meadow between Windsor and Staines. These particulars should ever be remembered by all lovers of constitutional liberty, as they pertain to a most important event, and one that will always remain famous in English history. Princes may learn from it to govern wisely, and, above all things, to avoid a tyrannical obstinacy; and the people may also learn how to respect and preserve those rational liberties which are so dear to Englishmen, and which were won at the cost of so much anxiety and danger. In after-times, this struggle between a tyrannical king (Charles I.) and his aroused people was repeated, but with a different result. John, by submission, saved himself; but the other despot fell a victim to his obstinate misgovernment.

The famous meeting between John and his barons took place at the time named. A few nobles and gentlemen, together with eight bishops, attended the king; but in their hearts most of them favoured the popular cause. Perhaps the only one who sincerely wished that the king might triumph over the insurgent barons, was the talented and crafty cardinal, Pandulph, who had come from Rome to counsel and assist him, and now stood by the side of the humbled and gloomy tyrant. Several days were spent in debate; and then, on the 19th, John signed the celebrated MAGNA CHARTA, as it is called, or, the GREAT CHARTER; because it is regarded as the foundation of the liberties of Englishmen.

From his extreme reluctance to sanction this celebrated document, it might be supposed that it was intended to destroy, or, at least, to greatly weaken, the royal power, if not entirely to change the form of government. It does little more, however, than restrain wanton tyranny, and ensure a just administration of the laws. It is such a charter as no amiable and honest prince could have had any hesitation in bestowing upon his subjects; its great defects being, that it did not go far enough, and that the great body of the people were not benefited by it so much as were the barons and clergy. It ran to a great length, and contained sixty-one articles; but it will be sufficient just to allude to its principal features. Its best points were, that it took away from the king (not entirely, but to a great extent) the power of robbing widows and orphans of their estates, and of giving wealthy heiresses in marriage to any poor, profligate noble, whom the sovereign might select as a husband for them. It provided that justice should not be sold, refused, or delayed to any one; that no person should be arrested, or put in prison, or have his goods taken away from him, except by a legal judgment, and according to the laws of the land; that no one, whether rich or poor, should have unreasonable fines imposed upon him for small offences; and that no rustic labourer, or villein, as he was called, should, for any fine, have his carts, ploughs, and farming instruments taken away from him; that there should be the same weights and measures throughout the kingdom; that merchants and tradesmen should be allowed to attend to their business without being harassed by exorbitant tolls; that no officer of the king's should take away the horses, carts, or wood of any one without the owner's consent; and that all free men should be permitted to leave the kingdom, and return to it, whenever they wished to do so. These were the most important of those liberties which John had, with a blasphemous oath, declared would, if granted to his people, render him a slave!

The only regulation that was really offensive, was not essentially a part of the charter itself, but an arrangement which it was found necessary to enter into, to ensure its observance. The king would not have carried out any new laws to which he had so great an aversion; so five-and-twenty of the most powerful barons were chosen to act as preservers of the public liberty. The power conferred on these nobles was very considerable; but it was necessary to give them great authority in consequence of the false, deceitful character of John. If the king violated the decrees of the Great Charter, they were to admonish him on the subject; and if he refused redress, they were empowered to make war upon him and distress him, by seizing the crown lands and castles until he should return to the course of justice and the observance of his word. If, however, any such war arose, his person, and that of his queen and children, were always to be respected as sacred and inviolable. This regulation had, no doubt, many objectionable points; but without it, and with such a king as John upon the throne, the charter would have been no better than waste parchment.

When the Great Charter was signed, the vast multitude dispersed with joy; and John, full of sadness and malice, rode away to Windsor Castle. There, shutting himself up in his chamber, and attended only by a few foreign mercenary soldiers, he abandoned himself to the bitterest emotions of rage and despair. He gnashed his teeth, and bit his pallid lips, until the blood started from them; and, throwing himself upon the ground, swore numbers of revolting oaths, and even gnawed sticks and rushes, in the excess of his impotent passion. When exhausted with these wild manifestations of fury, he sent two of his partisans abroad, one to implore the aid of the pope, and the other to collect a horde of foreign soldiers to come and harass his English subjects; then, in a fit of sullen melancholy, he went to the Isle of Wight, and would keep no society except that of sailors and fishermen. His object seems to have been to attach the common people to his person; but he was not successful.

The effect of John's foreign messages was soon felt; for the pope declared the Great Charter annulled and abrogated, and pronounced a general sentence of excommunication against all those barons who should attempt to maintain it. Small parties of foreign soldiers also were constantly stealing into the land; Poictevins, Gascons, Flemings, and Brabançons—the refuse of other countries—ready to fight for or against any one for hire, and willing to murder even their own brothers for pay. Luckily, an immense number of these ruffians were overtaken by a tempest while crossing the channel, and drowned; and John bewailed their loss with groans and curses. Leaving the Isle of Wight, he had taken up his residence at Dover, where he collected his mercenaries, and proceeded to lay siege to Rochester Castle, which the barons had seized as security for his good conduct, when they saw so many foreign soldiers entering the country.

The mask was now laid aside, and civil war commenced between the king and his nobles. Rochester Castle was defended by William d'Albiney, together with 140 knights and their retainers. For eight weeks they fought bravely against the tyrant; but at length they were compelled by famine to submit. John swore he would hang them all upon the battlements; but one of his foreign officers, named Savaric de Mauleon, representing that perhaps the barons would retaliate in the same manner upon any prisoners whom they might take, the king sent all the knights to prison, and slaughtered the common soldiers only; who, of course, had done nothing but obey the orders of their lords. D'Albiney was a skilful and valiant soldier, and his captivity was greatly deplored by the barons, who had been prevented by John's foreign troops from coming to his assistance. Indeed it was necessary for them to remain in London for the protection of that wealthy city, which the tyrant longed to devastate.

The nobility in the north of England were particularly obnoxious to John, and he determined to punish them by laying waste their estates. During the Christmas of 1215, he marched in that direction with his army, which was composed of men little better than savages. Some idea of the character of the leaders of these men may be formed from the names bestowed upon them. There was "Falco, without bowels;" "Mauleon, the bloody;" "Walter Buch, the murderer;" "Sottim, the merciless;" "Godeshall, the iron-hearted," and many others of the same stamp. John marched first to Nottingham, and from thence to Yorkshire, burning every village and house upon the road. The inhabitants were murdered in cold blood, or put to the most horrible torture to make them confess where they had hidden their moneys and valuables. The conduct of his foreign soldiers was more like that of a host of demons than a company of human beings; the unconscious infant, the shrieking maiden, and the grey-haired, feeble old man, all alike fell beneath the blows of their weapons. It seemed as if mercy had been banished from the earth; and the tyrant, anxious not to be outdone by the meanest ruffian among his followers, himself set fire, every morning, to the house where he had slept the previous night. All who were not openly for him he considered as enemies, and slaughtered them without pity. His progress was marked by burning towns, ruined castles, and disfigured bodies of the unburied dead. The suffering people of the north were reminded of William the Conqueror's expedition of murder throughout their country; for, since the time of that monarch, no such dreadful scenes had been perpetrated in England. Many dark and terrible outrages there had been, but none so extensive and desolating as those committed in John's march to the north.

If ever there was a proceeding that called for the interference of the pope, it was this. If the power of the Roman church had been exerted to arrest these scenes of blood and terror, and John threatened with instant excommunication unless he desisted from his career of murder, we should naturally regard that power with some respect and admiration. Did the pope interfere at this fearful time? Yes, indeed he did. But it was to encourage the king, to excommunicate the principal barons by name, and to lay the city of London under an interdict! Ever the masked enemy of liberty, the Roman pontiff would not at first speak out; but, when called upon to act, he threw his influence into the scale of tyranny, and sacrificed every holy emotion of charity, love, and religion to its support. It is, however, some consolation to know, that, as the sentence of interdict had not been incurred by any spiritual misconduct, neither the priests nor the citizens of London would pay any attention to it; people said their prayers, buried their dead, christened their children, and married each other just as usual. And what was more, the church bells frequently rang out a merry peal, as if to proclaim that the citizens would not make themselves miserable, either for the pope abroad, or their own tyrant at home.

But however cheerful the Londoners might try to be, the country was in a gloomy and desperate condition. It was dreadful to think of the consequences if John were permitted to go on burning and murdering throughout the land; and he was surrounded by such masses of foreign troops, that the barons were only able to remain in London, and act on the defensive. Under these circumstances, they decided upon taking a dangerous, and what, we cannot help thinking, was a disgraceful step. They sent to their old enemy, Philip, the King of France, and offered the crown of England to his eldest son, Louis. That prince had married John's niece, the Lady Blanche, of Castille; therefore, the barons were pleased to assume, that if John were removed, Louis would have some sort of right to the English sovereignty. The French king was delighted at this offer; but he would not accept it, until four-and-twenty sons of the most powerful among the English barons were placed in his hands as hostages for the safety of his son. This was done, and on the 30th of May, 1216, the French prince landed on the shores of England with a powerful army.

John had collected his vast bands of mercenaries at Dover; but the moment the French arrived, he fled to Bristol, burning and destroying everything he could in his hurried flight. Prince Louis soon entered London, where he was hailed as a deliverer, and the nobles and citizens offered him homage. The few barons who had still followed John then deserted him; immense numbers of his foreign troops, who were French, would not fight against the son of their king, and, therefore, went over to the side of Louis; a widely-spread insurrection arose in the north of England, extending even as far as Lincolnshire; and the King of Scotland prepared to make war upon John in the north. The tyrant was terrified, and even the consolation of the Roman legate could scarcely keep him from despair.

Several military movements then took place; but neither the French troops nor the English barons showed any decision of character or brilliancy of courage; had they done so, John must have been speedily subdued. The conduct of the barons excites surprise; they had done so much, and endured so long, yet now, either from fear or weakness, they did scarcely anything. They joined Prince Louis in the siege of Dover Castle, but neither he nor they were able to take it. Discontents and jealousies began to arise between them and their allies. The French treated the English with arrogance, and the English regarded the French with suspicion and dislike. Just at this time, a French nobleman, the Viscount de Melun, was seized with a dangerous illness; and feeling his death approaching, he sent for the English barons. Many of them attended at his bedside, when he made the following startling revelation:—"Prince Louis and sixteen of his nobles, have bound themselves by an oath, that when this kingdom shall be subdued, and he crowned as its king, all the English who have joined his standard shall be banished for ever as traitors, not to be trusted. Their whole offspring will be beggared or exterminated. Doubt not my words; I, who now lie dying before you, was one of the conspirators." Shortly after this strange confession, the viscount breathed his last.

Some writers have suspected this incident to have been a mere invention; but, whether true or false, it was generally circulated and believed among the English at that time. Dissatisfied and fearful, the barons held secret meetings; and, repenting the step they had taken of calling in foreign assistance, resolved to desert Louis and return to their allegiance under John; thinking, perhaps, that the latter had learnt some wisdom in adversity, and that he would gladly accept their submission, and govern better in future. To such a melancholy ending would this great and once glorious struggle have come, but that a power greater than that of kings and nobles was aroused; the angel of death unfolded his sombre wings, and the tyrant's days were numbered.

After bringing him level with the dust, fortune once again seemed to smile upon John; he established himself at Lincoln, which city he had subdued; bands of English yeomen fought on his side, from a feeling of hatred to the French and love of their country; while many bold English cruising vessels captured the supplies which were coming from France, for the use of Louis and his troops. Somewhat cheered by these demonstrations in his favour, John collected a considerable army, with the intention of fighting one great battle to secure his crown. In the month of October, 1216, he marched to the town of Lynn; but he had forgotten none of his old habits; for, on the road, he robbed and burnt all the farm-houses belonging to the abbey of Croyland. From Lynn he started for Lincolnshire. An estuary, or arm of the sea, extends some distance into the land between Norfolk and that county. It is called the Wash, and at low tide the sands are left uncovered for a considerable distance; but when the tide rises they lie beneath deep water. Either from caprice, or because it was a shorter way, John determined to convey his troops and baggage across the sands. Probably he could have accomplished the passage without danger; but he chose the wrong time, and before the army reached the opposite shore, they heard the roar and gurgling of the rapidly rising waters. Flying in terror, most of them reached the land; but the waves rolled in with so much power, that they carried away all the carriages, horses, and treasure, and even the crown and regalia of England. Many of the soldiers also were swept away by the merciless sea, and John, with a cry of despair, felt that his last hope had perished.

With bloodshot eyes and burning brain he rode to the abbey of Swineshead, where, heart-sick and anxious, he rested for the night. In his excitement, he drank an immoderate quantity of new cider, and ate voraciously of peaches. An unnatural thirst seems even then to have parched him up. At length he retired to rest; but, after a short uneasy slumber, awoke in a burning fever. Still he rose at an early hour the next morning, and insisted on resuming his march; with some difficulty he mounted his horse, but his sufferings were too acute to permit him to continue on it, so he was carried forward in a litter. That night he stopped at the castle of Sleaford; but anguish of body and anxiety of mind would not permit him to rest, and the next day he again commanded his attendants to march. The progress, however, was brief and difficult; and, when he reached Newark Castle, John felt that his last hour was at hand. He desired to see a confessor, and the abbot of Croxton attended him. It was evident that he was dying, and the venerable priest inquired where he wished to be buried? The tyrant groaned, and then muttered, "I commit my soul to God, and my body to St. Wulstan." Shortly afterwards, this scourge of his country expired, and the evil spirit that had so long haunted England was laid powerless for ever.

There is a tradition that John was poisoned by a monk whom he had offended; and that the latter, first tasting the liquor to induce the king to drink it, also perished from its effects. But none of the chroniclers of that time mention the circumstance; it was first alluded to sixty years after the king's death, by a writer named Thomas Wykes, as a report. No reasonable doubt can be entertained that it was a fabrication. John was buried at Worcester cathedral, of which St. Wulstan was the patron saint. His death took place on the 18th of October, 1216; he was in his forty-ninth year, and had misgoverned England for seventeen years. He left two sons—Henry, born in 1206, and therefore ten years old, and Richard, born in 1209, and therefore seven; and three daughters, Joan, Eleanor, and Isabella.

In his character, John was utterly mean and detestable; a complication of all human vices, without, as far as we know, one redeeming virtue. A disobedient son, an unfaithful husband, a treacherous friend—he was, also, a political hypocrite and a merciless tyrant. The Roman emperor, Augustus, said that he found Rome made of brick, and left it marble: John found England in prosperity, and left it in desolation. Never had the country been so humbled as during his reign, and never were its dominions so curtailed; all that his predecessors had gained he lost, and that, too, under disgraceful circumstances. History, in all its blood-stained records of royal evil-doers, scarcely presents one so meanly profligate and revolting as our un-English king, John.

CHAPTER XIX.

THE REIGN OF HENRY THE THIRD; CALLED HENRY OF WINCHESTER.—A.D. 1216—1253.

TEN days after the death of John, his eldest son, Henry, was crowned at Gloucester, by Gualo, the pope's legate, who had for some time been residing in England. The crown had been swept away by the sea in the Wash, near Lincolnshire; so a plain ring of gold was placed, instead, upon the head of the boy-king, who was but ten years old. This coronation might have proved a worthless form, had it not been for the exertions of Cardinal Gualo, and the great wisdom and integrity of the Earl of Pembroke. The cardinal, however, knew the value of his services, and did not give them for nothing: he induced the young king to consent to do homage to the pope; to hold England and Ireland as a vassal of Rome, and to pay the tribute of 1,000 marks a year, which his father had promised.

Louis, the French prince, was still in England with his army; and now that John was dead, he trusted he should soon acquire the sovereign power. Most of the great barons were on his side, and he was in possession of the wealthy city of London. The affairs of the country looked gloomy enough, and fortune did not seem to smile upon the prospects of the little king. In this state of things, the Earl of Pembroke called a great council of prelates and nobles at Bristol, and there he was chosen Protector of the kingdom until Henry should be of age. A better choice could scarcely have been made, for he was both a sound statesman and a good soldier; faithful to the cause of the young king, and anxious to restore the nation to peace and prosperity. His first act was to induce Henry to confirm the Great Charter, in which, however, several important alterations had been made. It was ratified again in the course of the same year; and then a second was granted, called the Charter of Forests. This was a great concession to the people, for it abolished the barbarous punishments which had been inflicted upon those who killed the king's deer, and substituted milder and more reasonable ones instead. It also provided, that all the forests which had been enclosed since the reign of Henry II., should be thrown open. Pembroke then wrote letters, in the name of the king, to the barons who sided with Prince Louis; in which he said, that whatever cause of dislike they might have had to the late King John, they could not possibly have any to the present sovereign, who was too young to have offended any one. He added that Henry was an amiable young prince, desirous of forgetting all past disturbances; that he was now their king, and the true descendant of their greatest monarchs. Therefore he trusted they would abandon the cause of a foreign prince; and, by returning to their duty, restore the independence of the kingdom.

This wise and persuasive conduct of the earl, together with his well-known honourable character, won many of the barons to the cause of young Henry; but the French prince had no intention of abandoning the country, or his pretensions to rule over it. Leaving Dover Castle, which he was unable to conquer, Louis besieged and took that of Berkhampstead; and then, as it was Christmas-time, he and the Protector entered into a truce, which was prolonged until Easter, 1217. During this time the prince went over the sea to France, for more soldiers and money; and, in his absence, several of the English nobles deserted his standard, and joined the cause of the king. When Louis returned to England, several of his ships were attacked and captured by our cruisers; and, in revenge, he burnt the town of Sandwich, where he landed, to ashes, and then marched away to London.

When the truce was over, Pembroke, the Protector, laid siege to the castle of Mount Sorel, in Leicestershire, which was in the hands of the French, and Louis sent the Count of Perche with an army to defend it. The French were so numerous that the English prudently declined the contest, and retired. This filled the Count of Perche with delight: he instantly imagined himself a hero; and, in his military enthusiasm, marched away to Lincoln, with the intention of subduing the town and castle. The town's-people opened their gates and received him; but the castle held out bravely: it was commanded by a woman, Nichola de Camville, who encouraged the defenders to great exertions, and animated them with a lofty spirit. Still it would probably have fallen before the superior numbers of the French; but that the Protector, with a small army, suddenly appeared before Lincoln on the 19th of May. The garrison in the castle was so encouraged by this succour, that it issued out and rushed upon the French, while, at the same time, the English outside the town scaled the walls, and attacked the French cavalry in the streets. Here it was impossible for the horsemen to form in order of battle: they were, therefore, thrown into confusion, and almost instantly defeated. Indeed, it was a general surrender rather than a battle; and the English soldiers, in contempt, gave it the name of "the Fair of Lincoln." Very few people were killed; but the Count of Perche was one of them; for when called upon to lay down his arms, he declared he would not yield to any English traitor. A common soldier, irritated by the word traitor, thrust his pike into the eyelit-hole of the count's helmet; the point entered his brain, and the haughty Frenchman fell to the ground a corpse.

Prince Louis was very discouraged on hearing of this affair; but a still greater misfortune awaited him. A fleet of eighty large ships, and many smaller vessels, in sailing from France to bring him assistance, was met and attacked, near the Kentish coast, by the brave Hubert de Burgh; the same Hubert who once saved the life of poor Prince Arthur, during the time of King John. An engagement took place; and although Hubert had only forty ships, he gained a decisive victory. It is said that he employed a singular stratagem. Having the wind in his favour, he sailed down upon the French vessels, and approached so close as to be able to throw a quantity of quicklime into the faces of the sailors on board; this so blinded them, that they were unable to defend themselves, and thus became an easy prey.

After this second disaster, the English barons, seeing that the cause of Louis was hopeless, abandoned him in great numbers, and the French prince was at last glad to enter into any honourable terms to secure his own safety. As the Protector was equally glad to get rid of him, the matter was soon arranged; prisoners on both sides were exchanged, and the barons who had remained with Louis were restored to their estates and honours. That prince also released them from their oaths and obligations to him, and promised never to join them again in any confederacy against the young English king. Having thus utterly abandoned his claim on the crown of this country, Louis embarked on the 14th of September, 1217, and set sail for France, heartily sick of the struggle, and, no doubt, very sorry that he had ever engaged in it. The few barons who had held out with him to the last, then presented themselves at court, where they were pleasantly received; all ill-feelings seemed to be forgotten, and once again it appeared as if fortune would smile cheeringly upon the land and people of England.

The only parties who suffered severely, now that the war was ended, were the clergy. In adhering to the cause of Louis and the discontented barons, they had disobeyed the orders of the pope, who favoured the young king. They had also committed the grave offence of disregarding a sentence of interdict, which had been pronounced upon the country; and of excommunication, which had been uttered against Louis; and for these things they were severely punished by Cardinal Gualo, the pope's legate. Some were suspended from the execution of their clerical duties; others were deposed and turned out of the priesthood; and almost all subjected to the payment of heavy fines. Indeed, the pope's object was to gain money, and in that he succeeded; for an enormous sum was collected from these fines and confiscations. In fact, all throughout this reign the rapacity of the pope was displayed in the most unblushing manner. It has been calculated, that, during a part of it, the church of Rome drew from England, in various ways, a yearly sum of 730,000 marks, or twelve times more than the whole civil revenue of the kingdom amounted to. Pope Gregory IX. is said, in a few years, to have extorted from the English clergy and people, the enormous sum of 950,000 marks, which a celebrated modern historian estimates as being equal to 15,000,000 of the sovereigns in use at the present day. The chief benefices were bestowed upon Italian priests, who could not even speak the language of the country; and who, instead of performing their religious duties, oppressed and plundered the people. Such a shameful disregard had these priests for the spiritual wants of the nation, and even for all outward appearances, that the king's chaplain held at one time 700 livings, and dissipated their revenues; while in most of those places no religious instructor whatever was provided. To repeat all the extortions which the pope and his agents practised in England during this period, would fill a volume; indeed, there was not, throughout Europe, such another deluded, pope-and-priest-ridden nation. It is, however, some satisfaction to know that the papal power had reached its climax; and from about this period it began slowly —though at first, indeed, very slowly—to decline. Even the English clergy and people, superstitious as they were, had begun to think of altogether throwing off the authority of the pope.

For nearly two years the country enjoyed peace and good government; that is, if we except the oppression of the clergy: but then the Earl of Pembroke, the wise Protector, died, and his power in the state was shared between Peter de Roches, the Bishop of Winchester, and the bold and kind-hearted Hubert de Burgh. These two ministers quarrelled and opposed each other; and many troublesome barons, chiefly foreigners whom King John had brought over to England, taking advantage of the weakness thus shown by the government, began to plunder their poorer neighbours, and commit many disgraceful outrages. Among them was one Fawkes de Breanté, a dishonest ruffian, whom John had raised from a low position in life to be a baron. This man laughed at justice, and set law at defiance; and at one time no less than thirty-five verdicts were found against him for violently seizing other people's property. The only attention he paid to these was, to go, with a number of his armed followers, into the court of justice, seize the judge who pronounced them, and shut him up as a prisoner in Bedford Castle. He then made open war upon the king, but was defeated and taken prisoner. Such a man ought to have been treated like a wolf or a tiger, and put to death, that quiet honest people might live in safety; but, by a mercy which was rare in those times, his life was spared, and he was only banished from the land. The secret of this was, that Fawkes de Breanté was a baron, and the barons did not like that any one of their rank should be subjected to the extreme penalty of the law. It was not the sacredness of human life, but their own pride and rank that they respected; and when, shortly afterwards, a riot broke out, in consequence of a foolish quarrel between the common people of London and Westminster, about a wrestling match, they were punished severely enough; for their leader was hanged without any trial, and many of his most riotous followers condemned to have their feet cut off.

When King Henry was sixteen years old, Hubert de Burgh obtained the consent of the pope to declare him of age; and he then demanded that the refractory barons should deliver up their castles to the king. This was a wise step; for when these troublesome nobles had been deprived of the vast fortified buildings in which they and their troops resided, they would be compelled to live more like private gentlemen than so many captains of banditti. The barons, however, had no intention of giving up their castles, most of which belonged to the king, and the nation was threatened with that terrible affliction—a civil war. But Hubert's courage and prudence were triumphant; some of the castles he took by siege, others surrendered to him; and at length all the royal castles were placed in the power of the king. After taking Bedford Castle, Hubert ordered eighty of the foreign knights and soldiers, who had defended it, to be hanged. These men were all robbers, and oppressors of the people who lived near them, and therefore richly deserved their fate. Peter de Roches, although a Christian bishop, had encouraged the refractory barons in their resistance to the laws, from a wicked feeling of spite against Hubert; but he now resigned his office and left the country. He was a foreigner, a Poictevin; and a number of troublesome foreign adventurers—men who did nothing but swear, and brawl, and rob—followed him out of the kingdom. Possibly they had some unpleasant suspicions of ending their lives as their friends had done, after the siege of Bedford Castle; at any rate, they went after De Roches, and the people were heartily glad to get rid both of one and the other.

In the year 1225, the English king declared war against France; that is, war was declared for him: for, although he was then in his nineteenth year, he was still quite a child in mind. The reason for the war was this: when Prince Louis was compelled to abandon England [A.D. 1224], after he had vainly sought to become its king, he entered into an agreement to restore Normandy, and the towns in France which his father had won from King John, to the English rule. And as he was now King of France, the English called upon him to fulfil his promise. This he not only positively refused to do, but even laid siege to, and took, the town of Rochelle, which had been in the possession of the English. An army, therefore, was sent to France, under the command of the king's uncle, the Earl of Salisbury; but as the French king was just then employed in carrying on a shamefully cruel war against a quiet, unoffending people, named the Albigenses (who, as they differed in their religious opinions from the church of Rome, were called heretics), the pope interfered, and threatened the English with excommunication if they molested Louis. In consequence of this threat, the English entered into a truce with the French, and the invading army marched, rather disgracefully, home again. Four years afterwards, war was again declared against France, and the English king himself led an army there; but his feeble, unwarlike character only exposed him to ridicule: he passed his time in feasts and military pageants, while the French took the few towns yet remaining to him in France; and, after a time, he returned in shame to England.

Henry, as he advanced in years, continued to be passive and weak-minded; but while he had a clever minister to manage his affairs for him, things went on pretty smoothly. He was fortunate enough to possess one of great talents and integrity in Hubert de Burgh, who had always been a faithful follower both of him and his late father. For this reason some years passed on without anything remarkable occurring. When historians are silent, that is usually a proof that a nation is tranquil, if not prosperous; for, unfortunately for the world, history is, to a painful extent, an account of crimes and oppressions. What we have next to relate is not an exception to this remark, and it shows the character of Henry in no favourable light.

For eight years Hubert had conducted the affairs of the country, when suddenly (in 1231) the capricious king, who was now five-and-twenty years old, took a strange dislike to him. Hubert's firm government had caused him many enemies among those barons who loved riot rather than order, and plunder better than peace; and the king, withdrawing his favour, left his wise and faithful minister exposed to the schemes of all who hated him. As no wrong could be charged against him, he was accused of many ridiculous and even impossible things. It was urged that he had won the king's affections by enchantment, and that he had taken from the royal treasury a magic ring, which had the power of making its wearer invulnerable. Hubert, who was very rich, saw that his ruin was determined upon; probably his great wealth was the cause of the proceedings against him, for the king was poor, and had cast a greedy eye upon the treasures of his minister. Fearing that his life was in danger, he fled and took sanctuary in Merton Abbey.

Thither the ungrateful king sent messengers to seize him; but when reminded by the clergy of the sacrilegiousness of the attempt, he immediately sent other messengers to call the first back. He then granted Hubert a delay of four months, that he might prepare a defence for the charges that had been brought against him. Scarcely had the king performed this act of justice, than he again changed his mind, and sent Sir Godfrey de Crancumb with 300 soldiers to seize the persecuted minister. They found him, during the night, in the town of Brentwood, in Essex. He was in bed; but being roused and alarmed by the multitude which was approaching the house, he escaped in his night-clothes, and fled for safety to the parish church. The holy character of the place, he thought, would save him from his pursuers; for even the worst of criminals were protected from the law while they remained within the walls of a church or convent: the blood-stained murderer was safe from arrest, so long as he did not leave the sacred asylum. But the rude soldiers who sought to seize the fallen Hubert, seem to have set even the generally respected superstitions of the country at defiance. With furious cries they burst into the church, some brandishing their naked swords, and others carrying gleaming torches. There they beheld him standing heroically erect by the altar, his right hand grasping a crucifix, and his left holding the consecrated host. Those most sacred emblems of the suffering Saviour would, he supposed, awe his stern assailants into submissive reverence. He was mistaken: they dragged him from the church, undressed as he was, tied him upon a horse, and hurried him off to the Tower of London.

So loud a cry of indignation arose in consequence of this violation of sanctuary, that Henry ordered Hubert to be carried back to the church; but declared that he would put the sheriff of Essex to death if he permitted the persecuted man to escape. Without fire or food, the fallen statesman was at length compelled to come forth and surrender himself; and then the captors carried him a second time in triumph to the Tower. A few days afterwards he was placed on his trial; and the ungrateful king, having confiscated all his property, committed him a prisoner to the castle of Devizes. From this prison he contrived to escape; and, in time, his estates were restored to him; but he was wise enough never again to aspire to the post of royal favourite and minister. There are few weak-minded princes that have not been guilty of the sin of ingratitude; indeed, it seems to be a vice very common to frivolous characters. Where the mind is devoid of good principles, the heart seldom cherishes strong affections.

After Hubert's disgrace and downfall, his old rival, Peter de Roches, who had returned to England, succeeded him in managing the affairs of the kingdom. This man soon became universally hated; he surrounded the weak king with foreigners, and induced him to bestow upon them every office of profit and honour. He encouraged the king's dislike to his English barons, and to the Great Charter, and behaved to the people with injustice and contempt. The English nobles withdrew from the councils of their sovereign; and when summoned to attend, they came armed and with numerous followers, declaring, that unless Henry dismissed the crowd of foreigners by whom he was surrounded, they would drive both them and him out of the country, and give the crown to some one who was more worthy to wear it. This threat led to several little battles, or rather skirmishes; and also to the murder of the Earl of Pembroke, the son of the wise Protector who governed the country so well when the king was a child. The earl fled into Ireland, where he was followed and savagely murdered by the contrivance of the minister and bishop, Peter de Roches. For a time the priestly assassin triumphed; but he grew more rapacious and insolent than ever, and, at length, declared that the barons of England must not presume to put themselves on an equality with those of France, but submit themselves as inferior in rank and condition. It often happens, that men who will endure many gross injuries with patience, will instantly resent an insult. It proved so in the present case, and the nobles were agitated by a perfect storm of passion. Their anger was shared by the people and the clergy. Edmund, the new Archbishop of Canterbury, went to court, attended by a solemn retinue of prelates, and publicly threatened the king with excommunication if he did not instantly dismiss De Roches and his swarm of insolent foreign adventurers. The king trembled and consented; and the minister and his unworthy attendants were banished, to the great joy of the whole nation. After the fall of De Roches, Edmund, the Archbishop of Canterbury, held the chief power of the state; which he administered with wisdom and justice.

During the rule of his predecessor, the provisions of the Great Charter were constantly violated. When Henry was reminded of this, and of his oaths to preserve them, he replied—"Why should I observe this charter, which is neglected by all my grandees, both prelates and nobility?" In this way do foolish or wicked people urge the vices of others as an excuse for their own; it is like saying, that because a citizen is robbed by a thief, the citizen would be justified in robbing his own honest neighbour. The answer to the king was a very proper one—"You ought, sir, to set them the example."

When Henry was nine-and-twenty years of age, he married, on the 14th of January, 1236, Eleanor, the daughter of the Count of Provence, who came to England, attended by an enormous retinue. The king was delighted at being once again surrounded by foreigners, and everything that he had to give he bestowed upon them. One of the queen's uncles he made his chief minister; while all the young nobles who were his wards, he married to young ladies of Provence, who had come over to England with his queen. Nor were the relations of his wife Henry's only foreign favourites; his mother, Isabella, the widow of King John, had married again. And what was strange, she had married that very Count of La Marche from whom John had at first taken her, and settled with him at Guienne. She had four sons from her second marriage—Guy, William, Geoffrey, and Aymer; and now she sent them all over to England to be provided for by their half-brother, Henry. He behaved to them with remarkable liberality, and the result was, that they were followed by fresh herds of needy adventurers; until at length the court of England was a kind of refuge for destitute foreigners, and English faces were almost banished from the face of the king.

Henry was poor, and his foreign dependents were so greedy, that in a little time he had nothing more to give: under these circumstances they induced him to apply to the pope for a bull to permit him to take back all the land he had ever given to any of his English subjects, that he might bestow it upon the foreigners. This was too much for the most patient minds to bear; and the nation was so indignant, that though the king obtained the bull, he feared to use it. Henry then applied to his parliament for money; but the assembled barons told him he must first send away the foreigners, who were consuming the substance of the land. These Poictevins and Gascons carried their arrogance to a length which, natural enough, roused the anger of the barons and people; they were constantly in the habit of breaking the laws of the Great Charter; and when reminded of it, answered contemptuously—"What signify these English laws to us?" As the king's want of money increased, and he would not yield to the demands of his barons, he adopted various shabby and dishonest means of obtaining funds. He compelled many rich subjects to lend him sums of money, which he never repaid; and he demanded gifts from the nobility and clergy, which they were obliged to bestow unless they were powerful enough to set him at defiance. These compulsory gifts he called benevolences. To him belongs the disgrace of beginning this extortionate practice; though, unfortunately, it continued very long after his time.

In spite of his poverty, Henry had the folly, in the year 1242, to quarrel and go to war with Louis IX.: and, at the instigation of his father-in-law, the Count de la Marche, he himself led an expedition into Guienne. There he was thoroughly defeated in two battles; and, after saving himself by flight, contrived to reach England covered with disgrace. The English people were much hurt at these defeats, and they heartily despised their incapable sovereign.

Once again at home, Henry passed his time in indolent pleasures, and in providing the money for them by illegal and extortionate practices. He plundered the poor Jews in a shameful manner; and begged so constantly from town to town, and from noble to noble, that he won the disgraceful notoriety of being the sturdiest beggar in all England. Once or twice he summoned his barons to meet him in parliament; but they read him a very stern lesson on his meanness, trickery, and bad government. As he refused to dismiss his foreign favourites, the barons refused to grant him a shilling; and, from that time, he looked upon an English parliament as a collection of his personal enemies. In this extremity, his parasites advised him to sell his plate and the crown jewels. He inquired—"Who would buy them?" The ready answer was—"The citizens of London, of course." A bitter sneer passed over the features of the bankrupt king as he replied—"By my troth, if the treasures of Augustus were put up to sale, these citizens would be the purchasers! These clowns, who assume the style of barons, abound in all things, while we are wanting in common necessaries." From that time he did all in his power to annoy the Londoners, and to check their prosperity.

Even kings cannot live for a long time altogether upon extortion; unlawful profits are generally very brief ones; and Henry, having wrung, borrowed, and stolen money from every quarter that he could think of, was, at last, from sheer destitution, compelled to summon his barons in parliament, and humbly beg their assistance. He said that he wanted a sum to enable him to go to the Holy Land, and recover the tomb of the Saviour from the hands of unbelievers. His cowardice and deceit were too well known for this story to obtain the slightest credit; but, although the stern barons most probably smiled in contempt as they listened to this palpable pretence of their truly feeble-minded sovereign, they consented to yield him a liberal grant, on condition of his entering into a new and solemn confirmation of their liberties. Henry consented; and during the month of May, 1253, he met his barons, prelates, and abbots at a solemn assembly in the noble old hall at Westminster. The Great Charter was then read in a ceremonious and very solemn manner. All the bishops and abbots were dressed in their canonical robes, and each held a burning taper in his hand. When the reading was over, the Archbishop of Canterbury pronounced the curse of excommunication against every one who should, in future, violate the charters of the land. When his last words died away, all the priests suddenly dashed their lighted tapers on the ground; and as the flame was extinguished in smoke, emitting an unpleasant smell, they cried out—"May the soul of every one who incurs this sentence so stink, and be extinguished in hell!" A scene more imposing, especially in that age of superstition, can scarcely be imagined. Every one present was touched by a feeling of religious awe, which was heightened when the king rose and exclaimed—"So help me, God! I will keep these charters inviolate, as I am a man, as I am a Christian, as I am a knight, and as I am a king crowned and anointed."

No sooner, however, was this solemn ceremony over, than the weak Henry returned to his foreign favourites, forgot his vow, broke the charter, ruled in the most arbitrary manner, and strengthened the dislike and contempt felt for him by both barons and people.

CHAPTER XX.

CONCLUSION OF THE REIGN OF HENRY THE THIRD.—A.D. 1253—1272.

AFTER Henry's solemn confirmation, in Westminster Hall, of the Great Charter and the Charter of Forests, he led an army to Guienne, to punish Alphonso, the King of Castille, who had induced the nobles in that province to rebel against him. For a wonder, this expedition was conducted without dishonour, and ended at last in peace and a marriage; Henry's eldest son, Prince Edward, afterwards the famous and strong-minded, though stern and cruel, Edward I., being wedded to Eleanor, the graceful and amiable daughter of Alphonso. But though triumphant, the English monarch returned from the south of France in an almost penniless condition.

Henry was now to give a convincing proof that his head was pretty nearly as barren and empty as his purse; for he suffered the pope to use him much in the same way as, in the old nursery story, the monkey is said to have used the cat's paw; that is, thrust it between the bars of the fire to get out the chestnuts he intended to eat. It was in this manner: Pope Innocent IV. laid claim to the kingdom of Sicily, because its sovereign had died while under sentence of excommunication. But that sovereign left a son, named Conrad, a bold, determined man, who had no idea of submitting to the usurpation of the pope; and, having gathered an army, very plainly told him so. His people also stood by him; and Conrad set the pope at defiance, and ascended his father's throne. Innocent now saw that it was one thing to claim a kingdom, and another to get possession of it; and he saw, also, that he would be baffled in his unjust proceedings unless he could get some one to help him with an army. In this position he offered the sovereignty of Sicily to a number of European princes, if they would conquer the kingdom, and hold it as a fief or possession, and to be retained under the authority, of the Roman church. These princes all saw through the design of the pope, and declined his offer; they had no idea of incurring the expense of a war against Sicily, that he might reap the profits of it. If they had always acted as wisely, and left the popes to fight their own battles, the Roman pontiffs would never have been able to have caused half the misery and mischief they did to the whole of Europe.

Though disappointed, Innocent still persevered; and, turning his eyes to England, offered the crown of Sicily to Henry's brother, Richard, the Earl of Cornwall; who, by his prudence, had become immensely rich. Richard had too much sense to fall into the snare; and he remarked, the pope might as well say, "I make you a present of the moon; you have only to step up to the sky and take it down." As a last resort, Innocent [A.D. 1255] offered the Sicilian crown to Henry, for his second son, Edmund; and the king was imprudent enough to accept the dangerous and delusive gift. This transaction led to a great deal of papal trickery and oppression in England. The pope, who longed for vengeance upon Conrad, the King of Sicily, had no intention that Henry should act in this passive manner; and he drew a number of bills upon all the bishops and abbots of England, without their consent, or even knowledge. These bills amounted to an enormous sum, and some Italian usurers advanced the money upon them. It was exacted on pretence of carrying on a war against Conrad; and, after his death, against Manfred, a natural son of the Emperor Frederic, who put himself in Conrad's place, and claimed the crown; but it seems to have found its way into the pockets of the pope. When the English clergy were made acquainted with this strange proceeding, they were very indignant; many of them resolutely refused to pay the bills; and the Bishop of London went so far as to say, that the pope and the king were certainly more powerful than he was; but that, if they took the mitre from his head, he would put on a warrior's helmet. The Roman legate lowered his demands, and afterwards left the country; very likely feeling that the pope had gone beyond the ordinary boundary of human patience. Thus Henry's expedition against Sicily ended in confusion before even a sword was drawn.

His brother Richard, the Earl of Cornwall, did not always show the wisdom which induced him to reject the offer of the Sicilian diadem; and he suffered his ambition to lead him to become a candidate for the imperial royalty of Germany. His wealth, he thought, would procure his election, and he could not resist the brilliant temptation. It was necessary that he should first be elected King of the Romans, as a stepping-stone to the rank of Emperor of Germany. He left England, and, by spending immense sums, obtained the former title; but he could not reach the latter He was crowned in the year 1256, at Aix-la-Chapelle. He then found that he had dissipated an enormous fortune in exchange for a dazzling but comparatively worthless position; and that, by leaving England, he had weakened the influence of its king, and left his incapable brother in the power of his discontented barons.

For several years one of these barons had been gradually making his way in public life, and in winning the confidence of his brother peers. About the time at which we have now arrived, this remarkable nobleman had risen to great importance; and he was at length suspected of an intention of dethroning the weak-minded Henry, and seizing the crown himself. This was Simon de Montfort, the great Earl of Leicester. His character has been so differently described by writers of history, that it is difficult to form a very decided opinion about it. Many authors believe him to have been a good man and a pure-minded patriot, who was at last led into arbitrary conduct and ambitious views; but there are some who have called him "the English Cataline." Cataline was a depraved and wicked Roman noble; who, having ruined himself by the practice of every vice, entered into a conspiracy to ruin his country. It is said that he would have burnt Rome, and massacred all its venerable, grey-headed senators, that he might get rid of his enormous debts; and that, when he and his fellow-traitors took an oath together to accomplish this horrid purpose, they, to add solemnity to the occasion, drank wine mixed with the warm blood of a slave, whom Cataline had just murdered for the purpose. To compare such a wretch as this with the Earl of Leicester is almost as absurd as it is unjust: whatever the faults of Simon de Montfort, most certainly he never deserved to be compared to the Roman conspirator.

Simon de Montfort was the youngest son of the general of that name, who conducted the war against the Albigenses. It was through the right of his mother that he succeeded to the earldom of Leicester. He was a man of remarkable talents, and of a religious turn of mind. Some have accused him of being a hypocrite; but there seems no just ground for such a charge. He was an excellent scholar, a good statesman, and a brave soldier—qualities which, in those times, were seldom found united in one man. But, above all, he devotedly loved the land of his adoption; and, though a foreigner, won the affections of its people. Soon after he came to England he married Eleanor, one of King Henry's sisters. At first, Henry was much attached to the earl; but afterwards, influenced by that strange fickleness which was so prominent in his character, he banished him from the court.

Probably the king felt the frivolity of his anger, for he soon after recalled the earl, and entrusted him with the government of Guienne. In this position Leicester showed great ability; but some barons, who disliked his stern justice, having complained to Henry, that sovereign recalled him, and treated him with great rudeness. The bold earl would not submit to insult calmly, even from a king. Henry, in the course of the dispute, called him a traitor. "Traitor!" returned the high-spirited noble; "if you were not a king you should repent of that insult!" Henry answered—"I shall never repent of anything so much as that I allowed you to grow and fatten within my dominions." At this point the surrounding barons interfered, and Leicester withdrew, and went for a time to France. Henry, however, was too feeble-minded a man ever to bear any very bitter resentment, and the earl again returned to England. From that time he was opposed to the king, and spoke constantly of the insulted liberties of the country.

In the year 1258, the discontent of the nation was aggravated by a scarcity of provisions; the distress of the people was great; and the Earl of Leicester chose this time to insist on a redress of the grievances of the country. He called a secret meeting of many of the barons, and talked to them of the necessity of reforming the state, and of putting the great offices of government into the hands of better and worthier men than those who then filled them. He spoke of the violations of the Great Charter, the infringements of the privileges of the nobles, the extortions practised on the clergy, and the shameful oppression of the great mass of the people. He reminded them of the resolute conduct of their ancestors in obtaining the charter; how they had risked their lives and fortunes in wresting that glorious document from the hands of a tyrant; and he then lamented their own degeneracy, in allowing its regulations to be trampled upon by a weak king, and a horde of insolent foreigners. He added, that Henry had so often broken his word, and seemed so little to regard either promises or oaths, that the kingdom could be neither safe nor prosperous unless they took from him the power of doing mischief.

The barons were convinced by these arguments, and determined on taking the government into their own hands. During the month of May, in the year just mentioned, the king summoned them to meet him in parliament, and they all attended clad in complete armour, and wearing ponderous swords at their sides. When Henry entered, there was a general movement; and the glittering mail of the stern array of nobles clanked an ominous welcome to him. Turning pale, he trembled: and, after a moment's pause, exclaimed—"What is the meaning of this? am I a prisoner?" Roger Bigod, the earl-marshal of England, stood forward and answered boldly—"Not so; you are not our prisoner, but our king; but your foreign favourites and your own extravagance have involved this realm in great wretchedness; wherefore we demand that the powers of government be entrusted and made over to a committee of bishops and barons, that they may root up abuses and enact good laws."

Other nobles now joined in, and promised Henry, that if he would yield to this arrangement they would grant him large supplies of money wherewith to pay his debts, and also establish his son upon the throne of Sicily. Partly from the hope of a supply of money, and partly from fear of violence towards himself, the miserable king submitted; and a day was appointed for a meeting to take place at Oxford, where a committee of government should be appointed, and the royal power be taken from the incompetent monarch.

This important meeting took place on the 11th of June in the same year, and the friends of the king, in a spirit of anger and pretended contempt, gave it the name of "The Mad Parliament." To protect themselves against the foreign favourites of Henry, the barons all came armed, and attended by the great bodies of their military vassals. This was a necessary precaution; for unless compelled, by fear or force, to keep his word, the prevaricating king would certainly have broken it. A committee was then appointed, and the whole authority of government confided to it. It consisted of twenty-four barons or prelates, with the Earl of Leicester as their leader, or as chairman of the supreme council. Twelve members of this committee were chosen by the king, and twelve by the barons. This bold and startling proceeding was, in reality, nothing less than changing the government of the country from a monarchy to an oligarchy.

The committee of government did some very good and useful things. It decreed that three sessions of parliament should be held regularly every year, in the months of February, June, and October; that a new sheriff should be annually elected in every county; and what was far more important still, that four knights should be chosen by the freeholders of each county to state their wants in parliament, and complain of any infringement of the law. This excellent arrangement was the foundation-stone of our present House of Commons: before it was enacted, the people of England were not represented in its government; and, indeed, very little cared for by it. All power was divided between the king, prelates, and barons; and they too often exercised it in a grasping and tyrannical manner.

Louis IX. used his influence with the Earl of Leicester, to induce him to evince a more loyal submission to his sovereign, but in vain. During the distractions of this country, that monarch evinced great liberality. He signed a treaty with Henry, on the 20th of May, 1259, by which, in return for the cession, by the English sovereign, of Normandy, he gave up the territories he had conquered in Poitou and Guienne; secured the possession of the latter province to Henry, and agreed to pay him a large sum of money besides.

Some months after the great meeting at Oxford, Henry's brother, Richard, now King of the Romans, came over to England. He was possessed of far more intelligence than Henry, and immediately began to secretly encourage quarrels among the allied barons. The success of his schemes was soon evident; and the Earl of Gloucester, jealous of the power of De Montfort, started as his rival. Soon two factions were formed among the barons; the people also complained that the nobles did not do enough in the way of reform; and the bold Leicester experienced so much opposition and ill-will that he abandoned the cause, and, in 1260, retired to France. Henry took advantage of this opportunity. Having obtained, in 1261, a dispensation from the pope to absolve him of the oaths he had taken to the barons at Oxford, he summoned courage to tell the committee of government, they had abused their authority so much, that in future he would govern without them. Much confusion followed; but the barons appear to have acted in a rather arbitrary and selfish manner; and the king even declared that he had reigned for five-and-forty years without committing so much violence as they had during the time power was in their hands. The result was, that, after a number of trivial disputes, which would be tedious and useless to relate, Henry triumphed over his barons, and again sat upon his throne an independent king.

Though for a time successful, he could not retain the affections of his subjects; popular opinion again changed; the king learnt no wisdom from experience; things went on as badly as ever, and the people regretted the absence of the patriotic Simon de Montfort. His rival, the Earl of Gloucester, was dead; and the son of that peer entertained a feeling of admiration for the exiled chieftain. He called many other barons around him, who collected an army, and invited Leicester back to England to take the command of it. That active noble readily responded to the call; and, in the month of April, 1263, the banner of liberty once again floated in the air, and the sounds of martial music roused the people to engage in a civil war. Many towns and royal castles surrendered to Leicester and the allied barons; and they then marched to London, where they were joyfully received by the people. As usual on such occasions of public excitement, a great deal of riot and tumult prevailed, and many outrages were committed by the followers of the army—thieves and vagabonds—who cared nothing either for king or people, but took advantage of the general confusion to plunder every one they could. The queen, who was in the royal apartments at the Tower, was so alarmed, that she tried to escape by water to Windsor Castle. She was bitterly hated by the people on account of the insolence and rapacity of her foreign relations; and this feeling against her nearly led to a disgraceful and wicked result. As her barge approached London Bridge, a cry arose of, "Drown the witch—drown the witch!" Dirt and rotten eggs were thrown at her; and the more violent part of the mob collected large stones to drop down into her barge, and sink it as it passed under the bridge. From this dangerous situation she was rescued by the lord mayor.

The power of the Earl of Leicester's party was so great that the king was glad to enter into a treaty of peace; he confirmed the provisions of the "Mad Parliament" at Oxford; again surrendered his power to a committee of barons, and consented to the banishment of his retinue of foreign favourites. With these submissions the barons ought to have been contented; but they soon after demanded that the committee of government should continue even after the life of the king. Prince Edward objected to this injustice, which would have taken the royal power from him also—an unnecessary step, as he had always shown himself a brave and strong-minded man. The committee was needed during Henry's life, because he had proved himself totally incapable of governing properly; but this objection did not apply to his son, who afterwards became a great and distinguished king. Up to this time he had sided with the barons; but now he called them traitors and usurpers, and declared he would oppose them by force of arms.

A civil war seemed certain; but some of the bishops interfered, and persuaded both parties to refer their differences to the decision of Louis IX., the King of France. This monarch was a man of remarkable virtues; religious, brave, just, merciful, wise, and accomplished. Perhaps a better umpire could not have been chosen, for his decisions on disputed points were frequently sought, and generally respected; but he was a king, and it is difficult for a king to decide against a fellow sovereign. He was also slightly related to Henry; and, therefore, when he gave his judgment chiefly in favour of that monarch, it is no wonder that the nobles refused to be bound by it.

Both royalists and barons now took up arms; but even in this time of excitement and danger each party found leisure to persecute the unhappy Jews. In London, about 600 of them—men, women, and even little children—were cruelly murdered by the mob, because it was said they were enemies to liberty, and had Greek fire hid in their houses to destroy the patriots. On the other hand, the friends of the king robbed and murdered these wretched people on the pretence that they favoured the barons. Thus, nothing could satisfy the ignorant bigots of those days, and neither guilt nor innocence escaped their superstitious fury. Whilst these oppressions of the Jews were taking place, several unimportant sieges and skirmishes occurred between the troops of the king and those of the barons, and terminated rather in favour of the royal cause. Under these circumstances the Earl of Leicester resolved to risk everything on one decisive battle. He divided his troops into four bodies, and marched out of London to meet the king, who was encamped at Lewes, in Sussex. The earl halted on the downs, about two miles from that town, and addressed his army in an eloquent and impressive manner, saying, that the king had offended the Deity by his numerous prejudices, and that his cause could not prosper. The Bishop of Chichester, also, gave a general absolution for their sins to the soldiers, and assured them that all who perished in that righteous battle would be received into Paradise as holy martyrs.

The next morning, the 13th of May, 1264, the battle began: the royal army was led by Henry, his brother Richard, the King of the Romans, and their sons Henry and Edward. The Londoners were in the advanced part of the army of the barons; and Prince Edward, angry at the insult they had so lately offered to his mother, attacked them with great fury. The citizens could not resist the charge of his disciplined cavalry, but fell into confusion, and took to their heels. The prince, carried away by his military enthusiasm, pursued them for four miles, slaughtering all he overtook. In the meantime, the Earl of Leicester attacked the army under the command of the king, and with such skill and energy, that he utterly defeated it; and when Prince Edward returned to the field, he found his father and uncle prisoners, and the earth thickly covered with the dead bodies of their followers. Still he would have continued the battle; but before he could form his troops into proper order, a body of horse soldiers swept furiously down upon them, throwing them into utter confusion, and the prince also found himself a captive. Thus the earl and his companion nobles were victorious beyond their hopes; but the mangled bodies of 5,000 Englishmen lay upon the field; slain by no foreign foes, but by each other's hands. These heaps of ghastly objects were a sad memorial of the dark consequences of a weak and tyrannical government.

The battle was followed by a treaty called the "Mise of Lewes;" by which it was agreed, that Prince Edward, and his cousin Henry, the son of the King of the Romans, should remain in captivity as hostages for the conduct of the king; that all other prisoners, on both sides, should be released; and that the quarrel should be referred to a council of nine prelates and barons, and, if possible, amicably settled. Perhaps the Earl of Leicester was intoxicated by his success and personal greatness, or else he repented of his arrangement, and thought that if the king were again at liberty he would soon return to his former mismanagement, and the whole struggle would have to be gone through again. He broke his word, and still kept Henry and his brother Richard prisoners. This was not honourable conduct; but it must be confessed that the affairs of the country were much better conducted than when the king was at liberty. The earl was the idol of the people, and he soon compelled all the barons who still held out for the royal cause to surrender their castles, and submit to the judgment of their peers. He has been charged with avarice; and it is said that he seized the estates of eighteen royalist barons as his share of the spoil, after the battle of Lewes; but it is certain that he was not cruel. If some of the barons forfeited their estates, none of them lost their lives.

The government was still carried on in the name of the king, who was treated kindly and with respect in his captivity. Of course the pope interfered in these proceedings, and took the side of the incapable and imprisoned monarch. He excommunicated Leicester and his associates; but the English clergy had been so ill-treated by the pope, and such large sums of money had been wrung from them, that they paid no heed to the papal edict; and many of them declared, in their sermons, that the earl was the father of the poor, the avenger of the church, and the saviour of his country. Leicester himself threatened the papal legate with death, if he dared to bring the bull of excommunication into England; and the vessel bringing it being boarded by English cruisers, the precious document was torn in pieces by the sailors, and thrown into the sea in contempt.

Before the battle of Lewes, the queen had fled for safety into France, and there she collected an army and a fleet for the purpose of invading England, crushing the allied barons, and restoring her husband to authority. The active Leicester also summoned an army, encamped it on Barham Downs for the protection of the country, and then, taking command of a fleet, sailed defiantly forth to meet the invading vessels of the queen. But the foreigners had no particular relish for the conflict; they never ventured out to sea; the army dispersed, and the whole project ended in nothing.

The committee of government at Oxford, or the "Mad Parliament," as it was called, laid the foundation of the system by which at present the people of England are represented in the House of Commons. In the height of his prosperity, the Earl of Leicester carried this reform much further. He summoned a parliament of a more popular character than had ever met in England, to assemble on the 20th of January, 1265. Two knights were to be returned from every shire, and all cities and boroughs were to elect their representatives, and send them to assist in its counsels. This was the first House of Commons ever held in England. Events of this kind are not so striking or, perhaps, so interesting as accounts of battles and murders, but they are infinitely more valuable and instructive. The people's house of parliament in this country is the bulwark of liberty, the safeguard of the nation against oppression, and the fountain of justice. It has its errors of constitution, but still it is a noble assembly, and one of which every English subject may justly feel proud.

During the same year in which the new parliament met, on the 28th of May, Prince Edward escaped from Hereford, where he had been kept under surveillance since the treaty of Lewes was concluded. He was enabled to do so by the young Earl of Gloucester, and some other barons, who were jealous of the great authority of Leicester. That nobleman was not careful to conceal the conviction that his great and brilliant talents had delivered the nation from an effeminate but still harassing tyranny. He might have behaved haughtily to his brother peers; but whether he did so or not, it is certain that little minds will not forgive great ones for success. Edward's escape revived the hopes of the royalists; and in a short time the prince was at the head of a considerable army. His first movements were successful, Worcester and Gloucester being captured in the course of the month of June. Unfortunately for Leicester, he was at this time far from the metropolis, and divided from the great body of his friends by the river Severn; all the bridges of which were broken down by order of the prince. He had the person of the king with him, and a small army; but a great part of his forces were in Sussex, under the command of his eldest son, Simon, to whom the earl sent a message to join him. Simon was not a very skilful soldier; and while on his march, he suffered the prince to surprise him on the 1st of August, in his camp near Kenilworth, seize his treasures and standards, and carry off many nobles and knights as prisoners: he himself escaped in his night-dress, and was compelled to fly for refuge to a castle belonging to his family.

The Earl of Leicester managed to cross the Severn in boats, and, ignorant of his son's fate, advanced as far as Evesham, on the beautiful river Avon, to meet him. It was a lovely morning in August, when he saw his son's banners advancing in the direction from Kenilworth. This sight filled him with joy; for he thought he should soon defeat the prince, and recover his trembling power. The banners approached nearer; but when the troops that bore them were to be seen, he discovered they were those of the enemy, who had made this display to deceive him, so as to be able to fall upon his forces while unprepared. The stratagem was successful; the earl was surrounded by an immensely superior force; retreat was impossible; and defeat almost a certainty. In a melancholy tone, he said—"They have learned from me the art of war." Shortly after he added, with resignation—"The Lord have mercy upon our souls; for I see our bodies are Prince Edward's." Though thus face to face with death, the earl betrayed no unmanly fear, but arranged his troops in the most advantageous manner, and spent some time in prayer, and in taking the sacrament. The battle then began, and the brave earl fought desperately to force a road for his army through the fierce living barrier which surrounded it. In this he failed, for his soldiers had been living upon the Welsh mountains without bread, and numbers of them were feeble and ill for want of proper food. Still they many times repulsed the sweeping charges of their foes, who were momentarily closing nearer and nearer around them. But the unequal combat could not last long; the earl's horse was killed, and he then fought on foot. In this extremity he called for quarter; but his fierce assailants answered that no quarter was given to traitors. One of his sons was killed before his face; his friends fell slaughtered in heaps around him; and at length this brave man himself fell at the feet of his foes, with his blood-stained sword still firmly clenched in his resolute hand. His enemies shamefully mangled the body in their fury, and insulted him dead whom they had feared while living.

This battle at Evesham was attended with great slaughter, and the victory of the prince was complete. During the conflict the old king nearly met his death. The earl had him mounted on a war-horse, but clad in complete armour, which concealed his face. A stout soldier struck him from his charger, and would have despatched him, had he not called out—"Hold, knave! I am Henry of Winchester, your king." Prince Edward heard his father's voice, and running to his rescue, carried him to a place of safety. By this victory the king regained not only his liberty, but his crown. Still the people of England loved the memory of the brave Earl of Leicester; and, although he died under sentence of excommunication from the pope, they declared he was a saint, and that miracles were worked at his grave. Indeed, for long, long after, in many a roadside cot, or quaint-looking, old-fashioned London dwelling, the people spoke with affectionate reverence of the heroic deeds of "Sir Simon the Righteous." The battle of Evesham, at which he was slain, took place on the 4th of August, 1265.

Although victorious, Henry found it necessary to be moderate in his conduct; and, much as he disliked the Great Charter, he did not dare to annul it. Indeed, it was soon shown that the nation was not in a temper to endure oppression or severity; for when the Londoners were deprived of their charter, and the family and followers of the great earl punished by banishment or fines, several new insurrections broke out in various parts of the kingdom. The principal of these was conducted by Simon de Montfort, Leicester's eldest son, who kept up an armed force in the isles of Ely and Axholme, and a warlike baron, named Adam de Gourdon, who maintained himself and his followers in the forests of Hampshire. For nearly two years they opposed the king and the prince; but at length Simon was driven out of the kingdom; and Adam de Gourdon being defeated in a personal combat with Edward, the prince generously raised him from the ground, pardoned his offences, and that very evening introduced him to the queen. This magnanimity had its natural effect; and from that time the conquered baron fought as resolutely for Edward as he had before fought against him.

Still the nation generally was not satisfied with the restored government, and the king found it necessary to grant certain concessions to win the favour of his barons and people. A committee of twelve bishops and barons was appointed to modify all oppressive measures, and grant easier terms to those who had been punished by fines or forfeiture of privileges. Their decision was called the Dictum of Kenilworth. The Earl of Gloucester, whose quarrel with the unfortunate Leicester had led to the ruin of that ambitious patriot, was dissatisfied with this arrangement, which he thought not lenient enough, and he immediately quarrelled with the king. The citizens of London, who had been severely treated, instantly took his part, and opened their gates to him. But this changeable noble soon repented of his rashness; and when Prince Edward appeared before London with an army of 30,000 men, he begged and obtained his pardon, and left the citizens to their fate. Edward was not an ungenerous enemy, and he pardoned them also, on condition of their paying an enormous fine.

Though the brave Earl of Leicester was dead, his wise measures and laws still survived; to use a metaphor of speech, his footprints were left on the soil of his country. Men now felt the value of his regulations; and late in the year 1267, the king, in a parliament at Marlborough, adopted many of the best of them. Thus, a milder and better government was restored in England; and, as a natural consequence, peace and order soon followed it.

Three years rolled on in tranquillity, and, peace restored at home, the crusading spirit was again revived. At a parliament held at Northampton, in 1268, Prince Edward, and several of the most powerful barons, assumed the cross; the former being animated alike by military ardour, and by the example of the French king. The love of fame will frequently urge princes to take unwise and injudicious steps; and thus Edward, who had long been the main support of his father's throne, sailed away for the Holy Land in the summer of 1270 (the intermediate time having been spent in the requisite preparations), with his wife Eleanor, and some thousands of bold English knights and yeomen. This force was to be united with that of Louis IX. of France, which had departed not long before, with the king at its head. The French landed in Africa, and set down before Tunis, where many died from the effects of the climate, and the fatigue of the enterprise; and when Edward arrived, he found that Louis had breathed his last. He was succeeded by his son, Philip III.

The absence of the prince was soon felt at home; the laws were violated with impunity; and although the old king was too feeble and ill to oppress the people himself, he was unable to prevent any turbulent and dishonest baron from doing so. Many outrages were committed, and Henry longed for the return of his strong-minded, strong-handed son. That son he was never to behold again; a lingering illness slowly wasted him, and on the 16th of November, 1272, at Bury St. Edmund's, death put an end to his long and troubled reign; during the latter part of which his mind took a decidedly religious turn. He was buried at Westminster, in the tomb of Edward the Confessor, whose body he had formerly removed to a golden shrine. Henry was sixty-six years of age, and had worn the crown fifty-six years. He left two sons; Edward, who succeeded him, and Edmond, Earl of Lancaster; and two daughters, Margaret and Beatrix. His brother Richard, the King of the Romans, who has been so often mentioned during this reign, died a few months before him. He pined away on account of the assassination of his son Henry, who was savagely murdered in Italy by his two cousins, Simon and Guy de Montfort, in revenge for the death of their father, the Earl of Leicester.

The character of Henry is so apparent, that very little need be said about it. He was a weak-minded, prevaricating, obstinate man, who would have been a tyrant if he had possessed sufficient decision and courage. Insincerity was the leading point of his nature; that, and his want of resolution, led him frequently to commit the crime of perjury. He has been called a religious king: but piety and perjury can never be united; and although a sincerely religious man might be a weak king, it is impossible that he should be a bad one. Henry was incapable of governing, and the affairs of the nation were carried on by others.

The Jews were shamefully treated during this reign. Henry feared to oppress the strong; but the poor Jews were weak; and as they possessed the protection or pity of none, he plundered them as much as he pleased. At one time he extorted from them the sum of 20,000 marks; and a Jew, named Aaron, who was accused of forgery, he condemned to pay the enormous penalty of 30,000 marks. It is more than probable that the ill-used Hebrew was quite innocent of the charge laid against him, and that it was got up as a means of robbing him. A few years afterwards, Henry demanded 8,000 marks from his Jewish subjects; and declared that he would hang them all unless they gave it him. Terrified by a fear of ruin, the Jews represented the large sums they had paid, and begged the king to permit them to retire with their goods out of the country. This would not have answered his purpose, so he replied —"How can I remedy the oppressions you complain of? I, who am myself a beggar; I am stripped of all my revenues, and am deeply in debt; I am obliged to pay my son, Prince Edward, 15,000 marks a year; I have not a farthing, and I must have money, from any hand, from any quarter, or by any means." Then, without any further ceremony, he delivered them over to his brother, that he might draw from them every shilling it was possible to extract. Such was the conduct of the king, whom a parasitical historian has called good-tempered and religious.

It should also be mentioned, that, if the king fleeced the Jews, the Jews in their turn fleeced the people; and it is said they sometimes charged as much as fifty per cent. interest on the money they lent. Still they were partly driven to such over-charges by the exorbitant fines and taxes imposed upon them. The peculiar religion of the Jews also drew upon them much malicious hatred. They were frequently accused of crimes they had not committed; and it was even asserted that they had put a child to death by crucifixion, in contempt of the sufferings of the Saviour. So revolting a charge does not seem probable; still no less than eighteen of them were hanged at once on account of it. —Thank God, we live in a better age, when such injustice cannot be perpetrated.

Before closing this sketch of Henry's long reign—the longest of any English sovereign, except that of George III.—we may remark, that from its commencement to its close, peace was maintained with Scotland. During that period, two matrimonial alliances between the royal families of the two kingdoms took place. Alexander II., who came to the throne of Scotland eight years after Henry ascended that of the southern kingdom, married Joan, the eldest daughter of King John; and his son and successor, Alexander III., was united to Margaret, the eldest daughter of Henry.

CHAPTER XXI.

THE REIGN OF EDWARD THE FIRST, CALLED LONGSHANKS.—A.D. 1272—1289.

PRINCE EDWARD left England for the Holy Land during the month of July, 1270, two years before the death of his father, and he did not return to England until the 2nd of August, 1274, nearly two years after that event. He was, however, proclaimed king immediately after the death of Henry III., and no opposition whatever was offered to his advancement to the royal power. He was respected by the nation for his talent and decision of character, and great hopes were expected from his government. The Archbishop of York and the Earl of Gloucester were appointed guardians of the kingdom during his absence, and the nation remained in tranquillity.

The prince had proceeded from Tunis to Palestine. While in Africa, he was deserted by many of his soldiers, and many others perished from the effects of the climate; so that when he did arrive at the city of Acre, on the shores of Syria, or the Holy Land, his army was too small to permit of his accomplishing any great result. Still his arrival gave hope and courage to the Christians he found there; for they remembered the heroic deeds of Richard Cœur de Lion; and the English name was yet a terror to the Saracens. Edward, by his valiant heroism, proved himself to well deserve the honour of being Richard's countryman; he several times beat the enemy in the field; and took [A.D. 1271] the city of Nazareth by storm. In this affair the Christian soldiers displayed their heroism in the assault; but, the city in their hands, the inhabitants were ruthlessly slaughtered.

The crusaders then returned to Acre, and, for many months, gave themselves up to idleness: indeed, they seem to have been too much weakened by illness and the effects of the climate, to support the exhausting fatigues of battle. But Edward's presence was unwelcome to the Turks, and a design was formed by them to assassinate him. The Emir of Jaffa pretended that he desired to become a Christian; and sent so many letters to the prince upon the subject, and made him so many rich presents, that at last his messengers were permitted to pass and repass without suspicion or examination. One hot day the prince was lying idly upon a couch, with nothing on him but a sort of loose dressing gown, when one of the Emir's people appeared at the door of the apartment. He made a respectful salaam, or salute, and was permitted to enter. Then, kneeling at the feet of Edward, he presented a letter; and as the prince began to read it, suddenly drew a dagger, and aimed a blow at his heart. Edward had not time to rise from the couch; but he kicked the assassin, who fell, and only wounded the prince in his arm. Both rose together, and the assassin aimed another blow at Edward, who, according to one account, snatched the dagger from him, and killed him with his own weapon. Some say (according to Matthew Paris), "that having nothing at hand to defend himself with, he seized the tripod which supported the table, and brained the ruffian." It was soon discovered that the dagger was poisoned, and the prince looked upon his death as certain. There was, however, an English surgeon at Acre, who was not afraid to perform the operation required to save his life, if the prince himself could endure it. All doubt on that point was soon dispelled. "If suffering will restore my health," he said, "I commit myself to you; work on me at your will, and spare not." The necessary operation was then performed, and Edward recovered. During the process of the cure, the Princess Eleanor attended upon her husband with great affection; and this devotion on her part, no doubt gave rise to the tradition that she saved his life by applying her lips to the wound, and sucking the poison from it. It is a pleasing narrative of womanly heroism and noble love; but, unfortunately, there is no contemporary evidence to sustain it; no chronicler of the time mentions the circumstance, and most modern writers have condemned it as a fiction.

Prince Edward, soon after this event, received letters from his father, begging him to return to England; and as his little army was still further thinned by sickness, and his soldiers longed to return to their native land, he entered into a truce with the sultan, and, at the close of 1272, left Acre for Sicily. On his arrival, he was met by messengers, who informed him of his father's death. He expressed great sorrow at the intelligence; and having lately lost an infant son, Charles of Anjou, the King of Sicily, expressed his surprise that he should grieve more for the death of his old father than for that of his young child. His answer deserves to be recorded —"The loss of my child is a loss which I may hope to repair, but the death of a father is a loss irreparable." The pope solicited Edward's presence at Rome before he left Italy; and while travelling leisurely through that country, he was everywhere received with honours and admiration, and universally regarded as the most illustrious living champion of the Holy Cross.—He was the last king who embarked in the cause of the crusades; and twenty years after he left Syria, the Christian soldiers were driven out from every part of the Holy Land.

Before Edward returned to England he met with another adventure, in which he nearly lost his life. As he found that everything was going on well and quietly in England, he resolved to settle the affairs of Guienne before he returned to his native land. For that purpose he spent nearly a year in France. While he was at Guienne, in the month of May, 1274, he received a challenge from the Count of Chalons to a trial of skill in feats of arms at a tournament. This he readily accepted, and it was arranged that both parties should arrive at the lists attended by 1,000 men. There was some suspicion that the count had a treacherous motive in giving this invitation, and it was strengthened by his appearing with 2,000 armed followers instead of 1,000. This provoked angry feeling, and the sham battle was soon turned into a real one—both French and English fighting with extreme fury. The count, like Edward, was famous for his great strength; and, during the contest, after charging the prince with his lance, he rode in, and grasping him by the throat, endeavoured to hurl him from his horse. Had the count succeeded in this, Edward would no doubt have been trampled to death, or slain in the confusion; and this appears to have been the object of his adversary. But the count had mistaken his man; and, instead of unhorsing Edward, he himself was violently thrown to the ground. The prince beat upon the stout armour of his fallen foe until he was nearly senseless, and then, turning haughtily away, left him to save his life by surrendering to a common soldier. So many people were killed in this strange quarrel, that it received the name of the Little War of Chalons.

Thus ended the adventures and dangers of Edward's crusade to Palestine; and, on the 2nd of August, 1274, he landed at Dover, after an absence of four years. The people received him with enthusiasm, and conducted him in triumph to London, where, on the 19th of the same month, he and Eleanor were crowned King and Queen of England. There was great feasting and rejoicing, and the conduits which supplied the city with water were made to run with wine, so that the poorest persons might share in the general festivity. The King of Scotland, accompanied by 100 knights, on noble-looking and richly-caparisoned horses, came to London to attend the coronation: as soon as they had alighted, the knights set their steeds at liberty, to be scrambled for by the delighted multitude. King Edward was then in the full strength and flower of life, having just entered his six-and-thirtieth year.

Though the country was comparatively tranquil, yet, in consequence of long civil wars and a bad government, the evils and abuses were numerous. Gangs of robbers and murderers set the laws at defiance, and many of the powerful barons protected them. Judges also were corrupt, and sold their decisions; and thus the wealthy robber was enabled to mock at the cry of the suffering poor. King Edward was a lover of law and justice, and he resolved to suppress these practices, and punish the offenders. For this purpose he authorised a number of commissioners to travel through the country, enquire into all cases of crime and oppression, and take the necessary measures, not only to bring criminals to justice, but to inflict penalties on those who had protected them, and to remove those unjust judges who had brought the law into disrepute by their mal-administration. This commission had a great effect in restoring order, but it was mixed with evil. The king was poor, and this induced him to punish criminals by heavy fines; and such was the zeal of the commissioners in the service of their sovereign, that numbers of persons were accused and fined for offences of which they were entirely innocent. When Edward's treasury was well supplied by these strange proceedings, he had the wisdom to abolish the commission, and never to use it again.

One class of his subjects, however, was oppressed in a heartless manner. This was the Jews, whom Edward and his people appear to have hated with a most unchristian bitterness. As a crusader the king naturally detested all unbelievers; thought that he did heaven service by robbing and murdering them; and the English people of that day imputed to the Jews every heinous crime, the perpetrator of which escaped detection. In the early part of Edward's reign, the coin had been very much clipped and debased, and the Jews were accused of this offence. It is very likely that many of them were guilty of it; but this could not excuse the remorseless cruelty with which they were treated. In 1278, 280 Jews, men and women, were hanged in London alone for this crime; and it is supposed that numbers of the victims were entirely innocent. Such was the bad feeling against these wretched people, that to accuse a Jew, and to condemn him, was almost the same thing. Once suspected, he had no chance; his protestations of innocence were useless; and if he escaped with his life, much of his property was confiscated: he was prohibited from receiving interest for money lent, and compelled to wear a badge upon his dress, as a mark of disgrace, and an invitation to the insults of enemies.

Some years afterwards, Edward caused all the Jews in the kingdom to be suddenly arrested and thrown into prison, for some crime imputed to them—whether justly or unjustly is unknown; and they were not liberated till they paid a fine of £12,000. At length, on the 27th of July, 1290, the king, at the instance, it is believed, of his mother, the dowager queen, Eleanor, issued a command, that all Jews should, within two months, leave the kingdom for ever, under the penalty of death. The number thus banished was 16,711. They were permitted to take all their money and movable property: their lands and houses of course remained, and were seized by the king. Many of the banished men were robbed by the sailors; and the old chroniclers relate one act of villany which was most atrocious. Some wealthy Jews having hired a ship to themselves, the captain thought of a wicked scheme by which he could murder them all, and get possession of their wealth. When they arrived at the mouth of the river Thames, he anchored the vessel at a place which, during low tide, was a fine sheet of dry sand. After some time the sea ebbed away, and the ship was aground. The treacherous captain then invited the Jews to walk out with him on the broad, pleasant plain of sand, which lay all around them, dotted here and there with great clumps of sea-weed, or bits of projecting, shell-covered rock. Pleased with any show of kindness, they accepted the offer, and he cunningly led them to some distance from the ship. At length he saw the tide coming in, and went back to the vessel: the unsuspecting Jews, not aware of the danger, made no haste, and soon found themselves surrounded by the rising water. They instantly called to the captain for assistance; but the ruffian mockingly told them to call to Moses, by whose guidance their fathers had passed through the Red Sea. Then hoisting his sails he departed, and left them to perish. Edward caused the captain and sailors to be arrested, and several of them were hanged for their infamous deed; as were all against whom the crime of robbing the persecuted Jews was proved. Many inconveniences arose from the banishment of the Jews, and commerce suffered considerably; thus, it was not long before both king and people found that they could not do injustice to others, without suffering some of the ill effects of it themselves.

The king adopted other means of relieving the poverty of the crown, far less objectionable than his proceedings against the Hebrews, but still very arbitrary. Under the provisions of the law called the Statute of Gloucester, passed in the first year of Edward's reign, he issued, in 1278, a commission to inquire into all encroachments upon the royal demesnes, and to examine into the titles by which many of his barons held their estates. Some, who could not strictly prove their right, were deprived of their lands, which went to enrich the sovereign. Edward found this so pleasant and profitable, that he urged the commissioners on to fresh exertions; and they began to question the right of some barons who had held their estates since the time of William the Conqueror. Amongst others they required the powerful Earl of Warrenne to show his title-deeds. The grim baron was not a man to be trifled with; drawing his bright and ponderous sword, he answered, "By this instrument do I hold my lands; and by the same I intend to defend them! Our ancestors, coming into this realm with William the Bastard, acquired their possessions by their good swords. William did not make a conquest alone, or for himself alone; our ancestors were helpers and participants with him!" Proceedings like this would have been the ruin of a less capable king than Edward; but he had the wisdom to see that he was going too far; he said no more about the estates of the Earl of Warrenne, and soon after he abandoned his inquiries.

Edward had formed the idea of reducing the whole of the island to his rule, and combining it into one kingdom. This, he justly thought, would be far more advantageous than fighting, as his ancestors had so often done, for land and towns in France; and he resolved to commence with Wales.

The Welsh were a brave pastoral people, simple and hospitable in their habits, and very proud of their national independence. They lived roughly, and most of the poor people among them dressed in nothing better than sheep or goat skins; yet they were not uninstructed in the learning of the day, and were very fond of music, and listened with rapture to the melodious recitations of their bards and harpers. Unfortunately for the Welsh, it so happened, that when Edward cast his eyes upon their land, they were distracted by quarrels amongst themselves. Rees-ap-Meredith, the Prince of South Wales, hated Llewellyn, the Prince of North Wales, so bitterly, that he joined their common enemy, the English king. In this bad example he was followed by Llewellyn's own brother, David. Llewellyn very well knew that he was disliked by Edward, because he had assisted Simon de Montfort, the brave Earl of Leicester, in his struggle against the crown, during the reign of Henry III.; and he was now engaged to be married to Elinor de Montfort, a daughter of that patriotic nobleman. As this young lady was on her voyage from France [A.D. 1275], to join her bridegroom, she was taken prisoner by some English ships, and sent captive to Edward. Llewellyn angrily demanded his bride; the English sovereign refused to surrender her, and then the wronged Welsh prince prepared for war. This was exactly what Edward wanted, as it gave him an excuse for the invasion of Wales; and, in the Easter of 1276, he entered the country with an immense army.

The Welsh prince retired from the unequal contest, and took refuge among the wild romantic mountains of Snowdon. In this position Edward contrived to surround him with his large force; and caused every outlet to be so strictly guarded, that Llewellyn's troops were soon suffering from the pangs of famine. They would now willingly have staked everything on a great battle; but the crafty Edward had them in his toils, and would not run the risk of an encounter with desperate men; he knew that extremity of hunger would do the work even better than the sword. At length the winter began to close in, and the sufferings of the brave Welsh were so dreadful, that they were, in 1277, compelled to submit. Edward's terms were, that Llewellyn should surrender to him nearly the whole of his principality, do homage to England for the remainder, and pay a fine of £50,000. Llewellyn accompanied the king to Westminster, where he performed the act of homage. Then the youthful Elinor was released from surveillance, and married to the Welsh prince, in the presence of Edward and his court. Soon after the fine was remitted, as Edward found that Llewellyn was too poor to pay it.

The Welsh people could not reconcile themselves to the loss of their national independence; they felt unhappy and degraded; and when David, the brother of Llewellyn, repented that he had forsaken the cause of his country, and again joined its standard, they flew to arms, and prepared for another war with the English. To this course they were also partially excited by the insolence of their victors, who treated them in a haughty and oppressive manner, and scoffed at their national customs. Edward was rather pleased than otherwise with this rising, for it gave him a chance of rendering his conquest more certain. A strange prophecy gave additional courage to the Welsh; for it said that the ancient race—that is, the original Britons, from whom they were descended—should rule again throughout England, and that the Prince of Wales should be crowned king in London. They fought with such spirit, that at first Edward experienced some reverses; indeed, several skirmishes, if not battles, took place, in which the English king had the worst of the contest; but at length, in 1282, Llewellyn was surprised by the Earl of Mortimer, and killed, with about 2,000 of his followers. His exulting victors cut off his head and sent it to London, where it was placed on the walls of the Tower, and crowned with willow, in mockery.

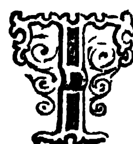
His brother David succeeded him in the principality, and still carried on the struggle for national independence; but he had not followers enough to face the English troops, and was compelled to flee before them from mountain to mountain, and frequently assume disguises to save his life. After some months he was betrayed, and sent in chains to Shrewsbury. When he fought on the side of the English king, against his own brother Llewellyn, Edward had made him an English baron. He therefore treated him as a revolted subject, and condemned him to be executed as a traitor. He was hung, drawn, and quartered; and the quarters were displayed in different parts of the country. Thus was a brave prince put to a cruel and ignominious death, merely because he had fought to preserve the freedom of his native land.

This execution took place in 1283. The spirit of the Welsh was, at that period, completely broken, and they submitted to the rule of Edward. He exercised his newly-acquired power with moderation, and divided the land into shires and hundreds; granted the people a confirmation of their ancient liberties; extended to them the laws of England; encouraged them in trade and industry; and endeavoured to win them to a less wild and more social mode of life. He stayed more than a year amongst them; and during that time his queen, Eleanor, on the 25th of April, 1284, was delivered of a son (afterwards Edward II.), at the castle of Caernarvon. Edward soon after assembled the Welsh chiefs, and promised to give them a prince to govern them, who should be of unexceptional manners, born in their own country, and unable to speak any other language. The Welsh were delighted: and Edward then presented to them his infant son, who he declared should be their future ruler.



Some years afterwards, when a fresh revolt broke out in Wales, Edward, after having subdued it, is reported to have hanged all the Welsh bards, because the songs they sang about national independence, and the deeds of their native heroes, kept alive the spirit of the people and their love of freedom. Gray's spirited poem of "The Bard" has preserved this rumour, which, there is reason to believe, was utterly unfounded.

Having thus subjugated Wales (a feat which his ancestors had never been able to accomplish), Edward went abroad, and remained on the continent for nearly three years (from 1286 to 1289). His reason for going was, to act as umpire in a dispute between the kings of France and Aragon, and the House of Anjou, about the island of Sicily. He displayed a great deal of good sense and justice upon this occasion, and won the admiration of many foreign princes.

While Edward was abroad, the affairs of England fell into confusion; and the people complained that he neglected their interests, and gave his attention to things that did not concern him. This speedily brought him home again; and he set vigorously to work to put down violence, restore general tranquillity, and to procure from a parliament he had summoned, the enactment of several important and judicious statutes. He soon awed the open robbers into good conduct; but he found that the fountains of justice were polluted; or, in other words, that the judges were corrupt, and sold their decisions for money. To correct this gross conduct, Edward, in 1289, called a parliament, and brought all the judges to trial before it. Monstrous as it may seem, the whole body, except two, were guilty. They were heavily fined, and, in most cases, removed from the position they had so meanly disgraced. The chief justice of the Court of King's Bench was even convicted of inducing his servants to commit a murder, and then protecting them from the consequences; while the chief baron of the Exchequer, and the grand justiciary, were found to be so corrupt in the discharge of their lofty duties, that they were thrown into prison.

CHAPTER XXII.

CONTINUATION OF THE REIGN OF EDWARD THE FIRST.—A.D. 1289—1297.

HE affairs of Scotland were, at this period, in great confusion. Its king, Alexander III., a sovereign much respected by his people, in travelling at night near the sea-coast, rode over the edge of a lofty cliff, and was killed on the spot.* The grief of his subjects at this melancholy event, was much increased by the fact, that the sole survivor of the royal family was Alexander's grand-daughter, an infant only three years old. She was called Margaret of Norway, because her mother, who was dead, had been married to Eric, the King of Norway. Little Margaret then was the heir to the Scottish throne; but, in the eyes of the people of those times, there were three great things against her—she was a child, a female, and a foreigner.

A regency was appointed to govern the kingdom during her minority; but in most countries, at this period, men objected to have a woman for their sovereign ruler; and, perhaps, in those rude brawling times, ladies were not so fitted to wield a sceptre as were the sterner sex. Such being the case, it is not surprising that other claimants for the crown sprung up; and amongst these were Robert Bruce and John Baliol. They were both of royal blood, but descended from younger branches of the regal family of Scotland. Edward's attention was now drawn to that country, and he wished to unite it with England under his own government. He kept his design a secret; and his first step was a wise and unobjectionable one. He proposed that the infant Margaret should be married to his eldest son, Edward, the Prince of Wales. Thus the whole island would eventually have been united under one monarchy; and each country would help to strengthen and defend the other. The offer was, in July, 1290, gladly accepted by the Scotch; but, unfortunately, the young princess died (she was in her eighth year), on her passage from Norway; and thus that project fell to the ground. A much greater misfortune befel Edward about the same time. He had gone to the north, in order the better to attend to the affairs of Scotland; and the queen followed him. She was attacked with fever on her journey, in the neighbourhood of Grantham; the king was summoned to her bedside, and he arrived time enough to see his affectionate and beloved wife breathe her last, on the 20th of December, 1290. The corpse was conveyed to London, to be interred in Westminster Abbey; the king accompanying it, and ordering a magnificent cross to be erected at each place where the mournful cortége rested; the last being placed at Charing Cross, near the abbey. Only two of these crosses now remain—those at Northampton and Waltham.

The funeral obsequies performed, the king returned to the north, where, after the death of Margaret, the claims of Bruce and Baliol to the Scotch throne were urged; also those of several other competitors; and as a civil war was imminent, the parliament of Scotland, with a view to prevent that calamity, resolved to submit the rival claims to Edward's decision, and he accepted the office of referee. He desired the nobility, prelates, and the candidates—nine in number—to meet him at Norham, to hear his decision. Before he gave it, he claimed the right to do so, as the suzerain, or lord paramount, of the kingdom; exhibiting, at the general assembly of the parliament and the candidates, on the 10th of May, 1291, a number of documents to prove his right of feudal superiority. His audience were taken by surprise; and they told King Edward that no answer could be made to his demand while the Scottish throne remained vacant. Nothing was determined at this meeting; and several others were held between that date and the 13th of June. On the latter day, the rival candidates, hoping to win Edward's favour, acknowledged him as lord paramount of Scotland. One hundred and four commissioners were then appointed—forty by Bruce, forty by Baliol, and twenty-four Englishmen by Edward—to inquire into the respective claims of the candidates for the throne. It was now urged, that when Edward gave judgment in favour of one of the candidates, he ought to give him the kingdom also; and that he could not give the kingdom unless he first possessed it. Accordingly a deed was drawn up, by virtue of which the kingdom of Scotland, and all its castles and fortresses, were delivered into the hands of the English king, on condition that he should render them back to the future sovereign within two months after his decision.

The proceedings were protracted to a great length, for Edward wished to accustom the Scottish people to regard him as their superior chief, or lord paramount; but at last, in October, 1292, he adjudged the crown to John Baliol, who, as the descendant of the eldest of the three daughters of David, Earl of Huntingdon, the brother to William the Lion, and the next heir to the crown after that monarch and his posterity, was undoubtedly entitled to it. The great seal of Scotland was then broken into four pieces, and placed in the treasury of the English monarch, as evidence of his sovereignty over that country; and Baliol did homage to Edward for his kingdom, receiving possession of it from the hands of that monarch.

During the progress of these events in Scotland, a quarrel arose between England and France, from the following circumstances. A Norman and an English ship had both stopped at Bayonne for water, and the sailors of each met at the same spring. A quarrel ensued between them as to which should draw water first, in the course of which, an Englishman struck a Norman with his fist: the latter drew his knife, and rushed upon his opponent; they struggled together, and the Norman was accidentally killed by his own weapon. The Norman sailors were very indignant; and, soon after, meeting with a small English ship, they seized one of its crew, and hanged him at the yard-arm with a dog tied to his feet. They then let the rest go, and desired them to tell their countrymen, that vengeance was now taken for the blood of the Norman killed at Bayonne.

The English sailors retaliated by hanging every Norman sailor they could find; and, at last, whenever the ships of either nation met, a savage conflict always took place between them. A fleet of 200 Norman ships sailed through the English Channel, plundering every vessel they met with, and murdering many of their crews. The inhabitants of the Cinque Ports then [A.D. 1293] fitted out eighty ships of a large size, manned with experienced sailors, and went proudly forth to meet the Normans. A desperate sea-fight occurred, in which, after great slaughter, all the Norman ships were destroyed or taken. No quarter whatever was given; and it is said that as many as 15,000 Normans perished in this conflict.

During all these outrages, England and France had been nominally at peace; but the sovereigns of each country, when the quarrel rose to this pitch, were compelled to interfere. Philip IV., the French king, demanded reparation, and summoned Edward, as Duke of Guienne, to appear in his court at Paris, and answer the charges against him. Of course Edward did not attend, and then Philip declared him a contumacious vassal, and that all his lands in France were forfeited.

The active English king got ready a powerful army; and, to increase its numbers, he liberated all the thieves and ruffians confined in the English prisons. This army he sent into France; but he himself was detained in England by an insurrection in Wales, which took him several months to subdue. The English force was commanded by Edmund, the king's brother; and at first it achieved some success; but Edmund died suddenly; victory seemed to lean to the French, and the English were compelled to abandon the contest. Philip then threatened to invade England, and did make a descent upon Dover, which his soldiers plundered and partially burnt; but the men of that town rallied, and drove the invaders back to their ships. In this petty warfare great numbers of people were slain, and thousands more ruined; but neither France nor England derived any great advantage.

Returning to the affairs of Scotland, we find that Edward soon rendered Baliol's position a very uneasy one. Though the latter had taken the oath of fealty to the English king, he refused, when summoned, to attend the court of his suzerain, in London. He found it better, however, to submit to subsequent summonses; but their constant repetition caused him to show signs of resistance. Edward, in consequence, declared him a disobedient vassal, and threatened to take away three of the principal towns and castles of Scotland. This was at the time when the war broke out between France and England; and the Scottish nobles, aroused to a sense of their humiliated position, determined to make an effort to shake off Edward's encroaching interference. Baliol, himself, seems to have been a feeble-minded, spiritless man, quite unequal to the trying circumstances in which he was placed; and his people, in derision, gave him a name which signified empty. Empty, indeed, he was in comparison with his clear-seeing and powerful foe; and at this period his nobles took the affairs of the country into their own hands. Their first act was [A.D. 1294] to call a parliament at Scone, and pass an edict that all Englishmen should be dismissed from the Scottish court; this was necessary, for these persons were no doubt spies of Edward's. They further confiscated all the estates in Scotland belonging to English barons, and to the Scotch nobles, who adhered to their feudal allegiance to Edward; amongst whom was Robert Bruce. Baliol also concluded a treaty with Philip of France; by one article of which, is was stipulated that the Scotch king was to marry Philip's niece: and, by another, that a body of French troops was to be sent to aid Baliol against Edward.

In the progress of these events, the suspicions of the English king were roused; and he sent an imperious message, commanding that the castles of Berwick, Roxburgh, and Jedburgh should be surrendered to him as a security for the quiet behaviour of the Scots, and summoning Baliol, as his vassal, to appear before an English parliament at Newcastle. As these demands were not complied with, he instantly prepared for war; but the Scotch were the first in the field. They raised an army, which ravaged the county of Cumberland, and then set down before Carlisle. The gallant citizens of that place repelled all the assaults of the enemy; and finding that Edward was in the north, the Scotch retired into their own country, leaving Carlisle on the 28th of March, 1296. The same day, the English army crossed the Tweed; and, on the 30th —Good Friday, a day that ought to have been devoted to very different pursuits—stormed and took the town of Berwick, one of the richest in Scotland. The usual consequences took place—a dreadful slaughter. In return for the Cumberland raid, Berwick was given up to the victors. For two days the work of plunder and massacre proceeded; and the town never recovered its former wealth and importance.

On the 5th of April, the abbot of Arbroath presented himself before Edward with a message from the Scottish king. That message was a formal renunciation of his homage, and a declaration of an intention of resisting the aggression of the English invader by every means in his power. Edward regarded the bold priest with a stern scowl, and exclaimed—"What a piece of madness in the foolish traitor! Since he will not come to us we will go to him." The defiance of Edward by the Scotch was followed up by several of their nobles crossing the borders, and laying waste the country; whilst others seized the strong castle of Dunbar. The former let their followers loose upon the country; and shocking deeds of cruelty were committed; neither sex nor age being regarded by the rude and almost savage northmen. Such are the horrors of war.

The triumph of the Scotch was a very brief one; Edward sent a great force to Dunbar, under the Earl of Warrenne; which, on the 29th of April, after a short but desperate battle, in which 10,000 Scots perished, retook the castle. This was followed by the surrender of the castles of Roxburgh, Dumbarton, Jedburgh, Edinburgh, and Stirling: thus all the defences of the kingdom were in the hands of Edward; and its independence lay prostrate at his feet. Baliol, dismayed and helpless, implored for peace, which his conqueror only consented to grant on the most humiliating terms. He was compelled to stand in presence of the English monarch and a number of his barons, divested of his robes of royalty, and, after abjectly confessing his offences against his liege lord, to resign his crown into the hands of his victor. This took place at the castle of Brechin, on the 7th of July, 1296. Three days after, Baliol delivered up his kingdom to King Edward. On the 29th of August, a parliament was held at Berwick; and the Scotch of all ranks and classes repaired there, to swear fealty and allegiance to Edward. Having received their submission; appointed the Earl of Warrenne guardian of the realm, and other Englishmen to the offices of chancellor, justiciary, and treasurer; whilst the castles of Berwick, Roxburgh, Jedburgh, and Edinburgh were garrisoned with English troops, Edward returned to the south. He took with him Baliol and his son as prisoners, and carried away from Scone, in Perthshire—at the market-cross of which town the kings of Scotland were formerly crowned—the famous Stone of Destiny, on which they used to sit while the ceremony was performed. On his arrival in the British metropolis, the king sent that stone to Westminster Abbey. It was regarded by the Scots with the greatest veneration; for an ancient tradition declared, that, wherever it was placed, their nation would always govern. It was, in consequence, looked upon with a superstitious reverence, as if it had been the abode of the guardian spirit of their country. It remains at Westminster still; and to this day our English sovereigns sit upon it at the time of their coronation.

War is an expensive thing; and during his wars against Wales, France, and Scotland, King Edward was often hard pressed for money. He had, in 1295, summoned a parliament to raise supplies; but he also frequently levied them in a very arbitrary manner, the clergy suffering most by his extortions. At one time he seized all the money and plate in the churches and monasteries, only promising that he would pay it back when he was able; at another he actually demanded half the incomes of all the priests in the land. A loud complaint was raised by the bishops and abbots against this tyrannous proceeding; but the king declared, that if any of them dared to oppose him, he would proceed against them as rebels. Besides these direct taxes, Edward's purveyors constantly carried away the contents of the granaries, store-houses, farm-yards, and larders, for the use of his army; and the monks were left in absolute want. They then applied to the pope for protection, and he issued a bull, prohibiting all princes from levying taxes upon the clergy without his consent. But things were altered since the time of Henry II., when Thomas à Becket so long defied the king; the power of Rome was not so great, and the influence of the priests over the minds of the people very much diminished: so Edward treated the bull with contempt; and when the clergy refused some of his demands, he outlawed the whole of them, and seized their property. He declared, that if they would not support the government, they should not be protected by it; and gave orders to his judges to do every one justice against them, but to do them justice against no one. The clergy were robbed and abused by every ruffian who pleased to raise his hand against them; even the Archbishop of Canterbury was stopped on the highway, plundered of everything, and compelled at last to take an humble lodging in the house of a country priest. The people remained perfectly indifferent during these shamefully arbitrary measures; and the stern king merely smiled at the sufferings of the clergy. At last their spirits were quite broken by this harsh treatment, and they submitted to the demands of their extortionate sovereign. Such violent behaviour as this would have caused the dethronement of a weak king—indeed of almost any king but the resolute, fierce, and strong-minded Edward. His iron will disregarded difficulties, and he generally succeeded in trampling all opposition beneath his feet.

He was not, however, always successful in intimidating his subjects, as we shall shortly see. The people had looked on very calmly while the clergy were plundered; but it was very different when the greedy hand of the king was thrust into their own purses. Urged on by his necessities, the rapacity of Edward knew no bounds; and after laying many exceedingly heavy taxes on the nation, he suddenly seized all the wool and hides that were ready for exportation, and sold them for his own profit. The citizens were struck with wonder; it is true that he promised to pay them for the goods he had robbed them of; but they had no faith in his promise; they knew it was only an evasion, and that he had no intention of fulfilling it. In addition to this outrage, he seized an enormous quantity of corn and oxen for the use of his army without the consent of the lawful owners. All classes of people murmured, and many secret meetings were held to decide in what manner the extortionate tyranny of the king should be checked.

These meetings were encouraged by many of the barons, who began to feel that even they were not safe beneath the overbearing sway of such a man as Edward; and it was resolved that an opposition should be formed against the imperious king. This was in the year 1297, when Edward had raised two armies, one of which he intended to send to Guienne, and the other to Flanders. He gave the command of one of them to Humphrey Bohun, the Earl of Hereford, the constable; and of the other to Roger Bigod, the Earl of Norfolk, the marshal of England. To the astonishment of the king, both these powerful noblemen refused to quit the country. "Sir Earl," shouted Edward to Bohun, with a tremendous oath, "you shall either go or hang." The earl was as resolute and stout-hearted as the monarch, and with a repetition of the oath he replied, "Sir King, I will neither go nor hang." Then the two earls abruptly left the presence of the amazed king, followed by about thirty barons, and many hundred knights.

This was a moment of danger for Edward; he found he had gone too far. Had he continued his tyrannical oppression, a civil war would have followed, which might have ended in his death or deposition. But he was as wise as he was arbitrary—as prudent as he was stern; and he adopted some singular measures to win back the submission and affection of his people. He knew that this opposition had the sanction of the clergy, whom he had so ill-treated, therefore he set to work to win them to his side by restoring them to favour. Then he caused a platform to be erected in front of Westminster Hall, from which he addressed an oration to a vast crowd of people. He told them he grieved very much for the heavy taxes laid upon his dear subjects; but that they were necessary to preserve, not only his crown, but their lives, from the attacks of the Welsh, Scots, and French. He added, that he was going to expose himself to all the dangers of war for their sakes; and that if he perished, he trusted they would place his dear son upon the throne, whose gratitude he felt certain would reward their fidelity. He also promised, that, if he returned in safety, he would redress all their grievances; begged them to suspend their animosities, and judge of him not by the past, but by his future conduct, which he would regulate in such a manner as would satisfy them all. This speech was followed by enthusiastic shouts of applause; and Edward felt confident that he had won over the people; but he found the nobles more difficult to manage.

The king resolved to head the force going to Flanders himself; and he departed in August, 1297. On his way to the coast to embark, a remonstrance was presented to him by the barons, complaining of his violations of the Great Charter, his unjust seizures of his subjects' corn, leather, cattle, and wool; and stating that they were not bound to follow him in his present expedition. Edward replied, that as his council was at a distance, he could not answer these things just then; and, to the surprise of his nobles, started at once for Flanders. But the barons acted in so resolute a manner, that even Edward was alarmed, and compelled to bend before the threatening storm. While in Flanders, he put the royal seal to the two charters (the Great Charter and the Charter of Forests), and thus again confirmed them; and also consented to a statute, which declared that no taxes should be laid upon the nation without the consent of the barons, clergy, knights, and commoners. But he did it with a very bad grace, and after a great deal of shuffling and evasion; and it is said that he laughed in private with his friends, and said he would not observe the restrictions placed upon him. However, on this point the nation was as obstinate as he was, and it compelled him to keep his word. The time had arrived when English kings could not altogether trample on the convictions of their people.

Edward went to Flanders, because he had entered into an alliance with the Flemings against the King of France. The French were in possession of many towns in Flanders, and from some of these Edward drove them out; but the English and Flemish soldiers quarrelled and fought with each other, instead of fighting only against the enemy. There were also great dissensions among the English sailors at home; those of Yarmouth constantly fighting with the mariners of other ports. The result was, that many conflicts took place, and more than five-and-twenty ships were burned or sunk. Edward was also disappointed of some foreign troops he had engaged, so that he was glad to enter into a truce with King Philip of France [A.D. 1298], and consent to refer their dispute to the pope for decision.

The pope suggested that Edward should abandon his league with Flanders, and leave that country to the French, and that Philip should do the same with regard to Scotland, and leave the Scotch to the fury of the English king. Thus the Roman pontiff encouraged each sovereign to commit a shameful act of perfidy. He also advised that the union of England and France should be confirmed by two royal marriages: that Edward should marry Philip's sister, Margaret; and that the Prince of Wales should marry Philip's daughter, the Princess Isabella. Edward had previously engaged his son to the daughter of the Count of Flanders; and had taken a solemn oath never to make peace with France unless in conjunction with the count; but he seldom, it would seem, permitted either promises or oaths to stand in the way of his interest. On the 8th of September, 1299, he married the French princess, Margaret; and his son, who was thirteen years of age, was contracted to Isabella, who was only six.

Edward fully believed that the submission of the Scots, in 1296, had crushed their independence; and that his conquest was a decisive and lasting one: in this he was greatly deceived. Scotland was paralysed for a time, but it was not crushed; bold hearts beat within the bosoms of its hardy people; and they resolved not to give up their independence so lightly. A spirit of gloomy discontent soon broke out into active resistance; and a few months after Edward's departure from the north, the standard of liberty was raised by that brave patriot, William Wallace.

Some account of this heroic and unfortunate man is a debt due to his memory, for his actions are the best monument of his fame. He was the son of a Scottish knight, Sir Malcolm Wallace, of Ellerslie, in Renfrewshire, and was born in 1276. In his youth he was remarkable for his great stature, strength, and courage. He also possessed a quick and powerful intellect, a commanding manner, great decision of character, and a kind of rough eloquence of speech, which had a great effect upon his uncultivated countrymen. He was a devoted lover of his native land, and viewed its wild glens, its rocks, mountains, floods, and forests, with an ardent affection; and even while a child, a love of freedom and hatred of oppression had been instilled into his mind by a good priest, who was his uncle. The conquest of his country by King Edward was a thing he would not acknowledge, and could scarcely believe. One day he was insulted by some English officers in the town of Lanark; he instantly resented the insult; but was overpowered and compelled to fly. The English sheriff put to death an unhappy woman who had concealed him; and, shortly afterwards, Wallace, in return, attacked and killed the sheriff. He was immediately proclaimed a felon and a traitor; and to avoid the consequences, he fled to the woods and mountains. There he was joined by many other ruined men, and became a sort of outlaw, constantly attacking and plundering the English. Wallace was so successful in these expeditions, that multitudes of people flocked to join him. At length, in the spring of 1297, he found himself at the head of a little army, and was then bold enough to defy the conquerors of his country. At this time he was joined by Sir William Douglas, and they resolved together on a very bold exploit.

Earl Warrenne, the governor of Scotland, was in England, and he left his duties to be performed by William Ormesby and Hugh de Cressingham. These persons were insulting and tyrannical in their conduct, and, consequently, very much disliked; and Wallace resolved upon attacking them at Scone, where the English court was held, and punishing them for their violence and injustice. Daring as the scheme was, it was successful; the English rulers only saved themselves by rapid flight, and left many prisoners and a rich booty in the hands of the patriots, who were immediately joined by recruits from all quarters. Many of these were men of high rank; and among them were the Steward of Scotland, the Bishop of Glasgow, Alexander de Lindesay, Sir Andrew Moray, of Bothwell, and Robert Bruce, the grandson of that Bruce who had disputed the Scottish crown with John Baliol.

As soon as King Edward heard of this insurrection, he sent the Earl of Warrenne into Scotland with an army of 40,000 men. This force came upon the patriots suddenly, near the town of Irvine, in Ayrshire. Petty jealousies existed in the Scottish camp; the nobles who had joined Wallace were too proud to submit to his command; and the army was, in reality, without a leader. Under these circumstances, Bruce and the rest of the nobles rather disgracefully made their submission to the English, and renewed their allegiance. Only one baron honourably stood by Wallace —the brave Sir Andrew Moray, of Bothwell. But though the high-born left the side of the champion of their country's liberty, the low-born flocked to it more than ever, and Wallace was still at the head of a numerous army, and, what was more, ruled in their hearts.

Wallace had soon driven the English from many of the Scottish castles; when, about the beginning of September, 1217, he heard that an English army was advancing rapidly upon Stirling. He instantly led his followers to its defence, and reached the banks of the river Forth, opposite the town, before the arrival of the English. He had about 40,000 foot, and a small body of horsemen; the English army, which made its appearance on the 11th September, consisted of more than 50,000 men. It was led by Henry Percy, nephew of the Earl of Warrenne. Seeing that Wallace had posted his army in an admirable position, and perhaps anxious to save the shedding of blood, Percy sent to know if the Scotch would enter into terms of submission. Wallace answered the messengers proudly—"Return, and tell your masters that we come not here to treat, but to assert our rights, and to set Scotland free; let them advance; they will find us prepared." This defiance made the English anxious for the battle; and Cressingham, King Edward's treasurer, said, "What is the use of wasting the king's money in keeping up an army if it is not to fight!"—On the 12th of September, the battle of Stirling took place.

Over the river which ran between the armies, a narrow, old wooden bridge was extended—so narrow that only two men could walk abreast upon it. Across this the English general was so imprudent as to lead his army. Wallace waited until about half of them had passed over, and then, sending a part of his troops to take possession of the end of the old bridge, he, with the rest, rushed upon the unformed English army with such fury that they were instantly thrown into confusion. What followed was rather a slaughter than a battle; the English soldiers seemed paralysed, and were slain in heaps, while numbers of the heavy-armed horsemen threw themselves into the river, and were drowned in their attempt to escape. Nearly all the English who crossed the bridge perished, and then the lumbering old structure was broken down, and fell in pieces into the stream. The English on the other side of the Forth, astonished at the sudden destruction of their comrades, also fell into disorder, and fled towards Berwick. The Scotch lost but very few men; but among them was the brave Sir Andrew Moray, of Bothwell, the only baron who had not deserted Wallace at the town of Irvine. Amongst the English, Hugh de Cressingham, the treasurer, was killed. This man's rapacity and insolence had made him so hateful to the Scottish people, that they stripped the skin from his dead body, and then hacked the corpse to pieces.

The victory of Stirling put fresh courage into the bosoms of the Scots: everywhere the banner of Wallace floated triumphantly; the castles of Edinburgh, Dundee, Roxburgh, and Berwick all surrendered to him; the English were driven from the country; and the ambitious Edward lost Scotland even more rapidly than he had gained it. Wallace then proceeded to punish the invader of his native land: he led his troops into the English counties of Northumberland and Cumberland, which they laid waste with a frightful ferocity. Their progress was marked by mangled bodies and burning ruins; for no cruelty was considered too great to be practised on the people of their oppressors. Unhappily, in these wild retaliations, the punishment seldom falls on those who have done the wrong. When Wallace returned in triumph to Scotland, a great meeting of its nobles was held at the Forest Kirk, in Selkirkshire, and by it he was invested with the title of guardian or governor of the kingdom, and commander-in-chief of its armies. The patriot had now reached the highest point of his prosperity; and he was rapidly approaching the end of his brilliant career.

CHAPTER XXIII.

CONCLUSION OF THE REIGN OF EDWARD THE FIRST.—A.D. 1298—1307.

KING EDWARD was in Flanders when news reached him that Scotland had thrown off his yoke and regained its independence. He immediately sent letters to all his barons in England, commanding them to assemble the whole military power of the kingdom, and meet him on the 10th of February, 1298, at York. In consequence of this order, 100,000 foot-soldiers and 4,000 horsemen were collected at that ancient city; but the king was unable to join them until about the middle of March. He led this enormous force immediately into Scotland, but was, at first, unable to discover the enemy. When he had arrived at a small town called Kirkliston, a mutiny broke out in his camp. Some quarrels arose between the English and the Welsh soldiers, and the latter, to the number of 40,000, threatened to abandon Edward and join the Scots. "I care not," said the high-spirited monarch; "let my enemies go and join my enemies; I trust that in one day I shall chastise them all."

The discontent in Edward's army was pacified; and soon after he received information, from two traitorous nobles, that the Scottish army was encamped not far off, near the forest of Falkirk. He resolved that the next day he would go in pursuit of it. That night, while sleeping on the ground, his horse suddenly rolled over, and broke two of the king's ribs by a kick. Edward gave a cry of pain; the sleeping ranks were aroused, and a rumour ran through the host that there was treason in the camp, and that the king was either wounded or killed. The day was dawning, and the resolute monarch, injured as he was, mounted his horse, and rode about among the soldiers to reassure them.

Edward and his army soon came in sight of the Scots. Wallace's force was a considerable one; some say it amounted to 60,000 men: but even then it was not half so numerous as that of the English. The latter commenced the battle. The Scotch infantry sustained the shock of the enemy's cavalry very bravely; but the king's horsemen fled without striking a blow. It is not known whether this infamous conduct proceeded from treachery or cowardice. For some time the Scottish infantry stood firm, but at last their columns were broken by the ceaseless charges of their enemies, and the flights of stones and arrows from the English cross-bows. A frightful slaughter took place, and it is said that no less than 15,000 Scots perished on the field of Falkirk. This fatal battle was fought on the 22nd of July, 1298. Wallace fled with the remains of his army; and having, in consequence of the disgraceful jealousy of the nobles, resigned his rank as guardian of Scotland, retired for a time into obscurity. Edward thus regained possession of the south of Scotland, which his victorious army overran; but the north still remained free.

Edward was still engaged in his quarrel with the French king; and England and Scotland remained in a state of hostility. In the spring of 1299, the pope, Boniface VIII., induced Edward to give up Baliol and his son—who had been prisoners in the Tower since the autumn of 1296—to his legate, and they were sent to the castle of Bailleul, in France. There the ex-king lived in retirement, till his death in 1304. The war continued in 1299 and 1300, with few events of importance, and no further results. In the latter year the Scotch applied to the pope for protection; and his holiness sent an extraordinary letter to Edward, in which he claimed Scotland as belonging to the see of Rome, and ordered the English king to abandon it. This letter was presented by the Archbishop of Canterbury to the king, who was then with the army, which was encamped near the castle of Caerlaverock. The prelate, on delivering the missive into Edward's hands, gave the king some admonitions concerning the necessity of his obedience to the will of the Roman pontiff; and added, "That Jerusalem would not fail to protect her citizens, and to cherish, like Mount Sion, those who trusted in the Lord." When the fiery Edward read the document, he fell into a passion, and exclaimed with an oath, "I will not be silent or at rest either for Mount Sion or Jerusalem; but, as long as there is breath in my nostrils, I will defend what all the world knows to be my right." Growing calmer, he added, that he could not answer the holy father without first consulting his parliament. The king was constantly in motion, being sometimes in England, and again suddenly recrossing the border. He was at Dumfries in October, 1300. There he received ambassadors from Philip of France; and yielding, he declared, to their intercession, on the 30th of that month he granted the Scots a truce, which was to end on Whit-Sunday, 1301. He then returned to England; and on the 31st of January, met his parliament at Lincoln. The first business brought before the legislature was the letter of the pope referring to Scotland; to which, after some discussion, a very spirited reply was drawn up, and ordered to be sent to Boniface. In this document the king's claims were set forth, and a resolute determination expressed that they were not to be submitted to the jurisdiction of the court of Rome. The Peers and Commons, however, concluded their letter by "reverently and humbly" entreating "his holiness to permit the king to possess his rights in peace, without domination or disturbance." With this missive, the king transmitted a private letter to Boniface; in which, while he set forth his claims forcibly, and evinced no intent to forego them, he expressed great reverence for the holy see. The determined tone of Edward and his barons had its effect upon the pope, and that potentate very wisely abandoned his claim. Adopting the party which he thought to be the strongest, he gave up the Scottish cause, and severely reproved their clergy for opposing the King of England; whom he hypocritically termed his "dearly-beloved son in Christ."

The truce expired, the king summoned his barons to meet him at Berwick on the 24th of June, 1301; and he again entered Scotland on the 3rd of July, at the head of an army. Wherever he went he found the country desolate, for the Scots destroyed everything, and then retired before the invader, hoping, by this means, to starve him into a return to England. This expedition ended in a truce, entered into at Dunipace, in Stirlingshire, on the 11th of October, and to continue till the 30th of November, 1302. Then he again renewed the war. He had made one Sir John de Segrave governor of Scotland, and that officer led an army of 20,000 men against the patriots, who were still in arms. Several small engagements took place, generally unfavourable to the English; and in the battle of Roslin, fought on the 24th of February, 1303, the English were defeated with great slaughter. De Segrave himself was taken prisoner, and once again Scotland had asserted its independence.

On hearing of this reverse Edward collected an enormous army; and, though he was now getting an old man, again took the field himself. Exasperated by the long resistance of the Scots, he declared that he would reduce them to obedience, or convert their country into a desert. In this spirit he destroyed with fire all the towns, villages, and corn-fields that he passed; before him fled the wretched people, behind him remained their burnt and blackened dwellings. Castle after castle yielded to him; and at length that of Stirling only held out Edward arrived before that fortress in April, 1304, and besieged it with great fury. Two immense machines hurled great masses of stone and lead against it. One of them threw stones of between two and three hundredweight each. Still the besieged patriots held out bravely; and one day, a javelin, which was thrown from the walls, struck Edward on the breast, and entangled itself in his armour without wounding him. Plucking it out himself, he brandished it in the air, and swore he would hang the man that threw it. Another time an immense stone fell at the feet of his horse, and so frightened the animal that it reared and fell backwards upon its rider. Such an accident might have put an end to Edward's conquests, but he was rescued from his perilous position, and found to be not much hurt.

For nearly three months did the garrison of Stirling defy their assailants: the walls of the castle were little better than a ruin, when the defenders submitted. The whole of them amounted to but 140, and a magnanimous man would certainly have pardoned them. Edward enjoyed the mean triumph of compelling Sir William Oliphant, their commander, and twenty-five knights and gentlemen, to kneel before him, stript to their shirts and drawers, and, in that degrading condition, beg for their lives. He then sent them to be confined in English prisons. The king himself returned to England soon after, and celebrated the Christmas of 1304 at Lincoln.

A little before the submission of Stirling Castle the brave William Wallace again made his appearance. The other nobles and distinguished men of Scotland had previously made their peace with Edward by submission. Wallace himself seemed weary of the struggle, and also promised to submit if Edward would give him a written assurance that his life should be safe, and his property secured to him. This offer was refused, and a large reward offered for his head. Once again the hero betook himself to the life of an outlaw, and lived hidden in the wilds of the north. Edward ordered his captains to hunt for him incessantly; and at length the unhappy man was captured by one of his personal enemies, Sir John Menteith, the high sheriff of Dumbartonshire. He was carried triumphantly to London, and his victor caused him to be tried at Westminster Hall for treason. This was the height of injustice, for Edward was not his king, nor had Wallace ever acknowledged him. To add bitterness to the numbered hours of the hero, a laurel crown was placed in mockery upon his head. His servile judges found him guilty, and, on the 23rd of August, 1305, he was hanged at the Elms in Smithfield. His body, after the breath had expired, was beheaded and quartered. The head was set up on a pole on London Bridge, and the four quarters were sent to Newcastle, Berwick, Perth, and Aberdeen. This cruel and tyrannical act was intended to strike terror into the Scots, and awe them into an abject submission to the will of their conqueror; but it served rather to increase their hatred to the English yoke: the memory of Wallace was cherished with enthusiastic affection; both barons and people regarded him as the champion of Scotland, and the martyr of freedom; and his unhappy fate casts one of the greatest blots on the character of his conqueror.

Robert Bruce had given his services to King Edward during the time that John Baliol ruled Scotland. He would not fight for the man who he thought had robbed him of his inheritance; for the family of Bruce was of royal blood, and his grandfather had been the rival of Baliol for the crown. His heart, however, yearned towards his country; and the captivity of Baliol and his son Edward, seemed to open for Bruce a path to the throne. There was also another powerful Scottish noble who had some claim to the diadem of his country; this was John Comyn, the lord of Badenoch. Many jealousies existed between him and Bruce; but at length the latter sought the confidence of his rival, begged his aid in ridding their country from the oppression of the English, and proposed, if he eventually obtained the crown, Comyn should have all his estates; but that if Comyn became king, then Bruce should succeed to all his possessions. To this just arrangement Comyn pretended to agree, and even consented to give the crown up to Bruce; but he was acting a false part, for he went secretly to Edward and perfidiously revealed Bruce's plan. This he did to get rid of his rival, whom he, no doubt, expected would soon share the horrid fate of Wallace.

Bruce was at that time (January, 1306) stopping at the court of King Edward, who resolved to arrest him on a charge of treason; but wishing to obtain all the information he could respecting the conspiracy, that monarch did not change his manner to the Scottish noble, or reveal his purpose except to his own council. But Bruce received a hint of his danger from his friend the Earl of Gloucester, who was Edward's son-in-law. Fearing to tell him openly, lest their conversation might excite suspicion, he hit upon the plan of sending a messenger to him with a purse of money and a pair of golden spurs, which he pretended he had borrowed. The hint was understood; the spurs suggested flight, and the next morning, at early dawn, Bruce mounted his horse, and set out for Scotland. It was the depth of winter, and the ground was thickly covered with snow; this would of course show the footprints of his steed, so the fugitive noble had the cunning to have the beast shod backwards. During his journey he met a messenger hurrying with letters to the English king: they were from his treacherous rival, John Comyn. Bruce killed the man, and then, opening the letters, he found they urged Edward to punish him with death or imprisonment. Rejoicing in his escape, he hurried on to his castle of Lochmaben, and arrived there on the fifth day after he had left the English court.

Shortly afterwards Bruce met Comyn at Dumfries, and demanded a private interview with him in the church attached to the convent of the Grey Friars. Comyn, not aware that his treachery was known, immediately consented. Bruce then taxed him with his villany, which the other denied; high words arose between them, and Bruce, in a fit of passion, plunged a dagger into the breast of his rival. The latter fell bleeding upon the steps of the high altar; and Bruce, horrified at having committed such an act in such a place, rushed out of the church in an agitated manner, and called to his companions to mount their horses. Sir Thomas Kirkpatrick inquired what had happened, and Bruce replied, "I doubt I have slain Comyn." "Do you doubt!" exclaimed the fiery Kirkpatrick, "then I will make sure;" and, rushing into the church, he at once put an end to the dying traitor, and also killed a kinsman who tried to defend him. Violent as this conduct was, Comyn deserved his death; and Kirkpatrick was regarded with admiration by his countrymen for the part he had taken in it. To this day his descendants bear upon their crest, in remembrance of the deed, a hand grasping a bloody dagger, beneath which are the words, "I make sure."

The vengeance of King Edward was now implacably aroused against Robert Bruce; and there was but one plan for the latter to adopt. He assembled a meeting of the prelates and nobles of Scotland, and addressed them in an eloquent speech, in which he implored them to advocate his rights, and join with him in breaking the bondage under which the country groaned. Excited by his address, and disgusted with the English rule, they carried Bruce to Scone, and, on the 27th of March, 1306, he was solemnly crowned King of Scotland with a circlet of gold, placed on his head by his sister, the Countess of Buchan; the Scotch crown having fallen into the hands of Edward. The new sovereign made a progress through the country, receiving the homage of the Scots, seizing the towns and castles, and driving out or imprisoning the English sheriffs and officers. He succeeded, at last, in restoring the independence of Scotland; but at the commencement of his reign he met with several checks, which appeared to augur a different result.

King Edward was in his sixty-eighth year; but although he was in feeble health, his energy was not diminished by age. As soon as he heard of the revolution in Scotland, he sent an army into that country, under the command of the Earl of Pembroke, and then prepared to follow it himself with another. Bruce, on hearing that the Earl of Pembroke was at Perth, proceeded at once to that place, and challenged the English to the contest. The earl replied, that it was too late that day, but that he would willingly fight on the morrow. Satisfied with this answer, Bruce retired to the wood of Methven, about a mile from Perth, and there encamped for the night. It was a pleasant summer's evening, and his army abandoned themselves to careless enjoyment; some went out on little foraging excursions, and others sat round their fires, cooking their suppers, and talking about the coming struggle. They were hopeful of success; for they had a confidence in their new king, and in the strength of their own brawny arms; and the gallant Edward was not in the army that was opposed to them. The sun had sunk in the west, and twilight was spreading a dull grey tint over the moss-grown trees and thick foliage of the old forest. Suddenly an alarm was heard—a regular, heavy tramp announced the approach of the enemy—the English were upon them. Taken while so unprepared, the Scottish army fell instantly into confusion, and were slain on all sides. Bruce fought with desperation, encountered the Earl of Pembroke hand to hand, and killed his horse. He himself was three times unhorsed, and even prevented, with great difficulty, from being taken prisoner. But all was useless—the rout was complete; and Bruce and his army were compelled to fly to save their lives.

The new-made king was now a fugitive and an outlaw, with a price set upon his head. For some months he and his friends wandered among the wild mountains of their native land, supporting themselves as well as they could by hunting, and suffering both from hunger and from exposure to the weather. Their position was miserable enough; but it was rendered still worse on their being joined by the queen and other ladies, who wished to share the misfortunes of their husbands, and console them in their adversity. Those brave men felt their privations the more bitterly when they were shared by those whom they best loved. Winter was approaching, and then it would be impossible for them to live any longer in the wild, desolate region where they had sought refuge and concealment. On one occasion they were attacked by the Lord of Lorn, a relation of Comyn, whom Bruce and Kirkpatrick had slain. His lordship surrounded the little party with 1,000 Highlanders, armed with terribly destructive weapons called Lochaber axes. But the fugitives fought their way through the ranks of their enemies; Bruce, who was a man of extraordinary strength, performing wonderful acts of valour. They were pursued for some distance, but at length reached the banks of Loch Lomond, where they found a leaky boat which would only carry three persons at a time: in this, after great labour, they managed to escape to the opposite shore.

At last the Scottish queen and the other ladies were conveyed for safety to Kildrummie Castle, which was in the custody of the king's brother, the brave young Nigel. Bruce himself, and a few companions, managed to escape to Ireland. All this time Edward was lying ill at Lanercost, near Carlisle, for he had not been able to proceed further on his march towards Scotland. But neither his activity of mind nor ferocity of temper was at all subdued, and he vowed vengeance on all the leaders of the revolt. At his command, Kildrummie Castle was taken, and Nigel Bruce executed as a traitor. Many other Scottish nobles and gentlemen shared the same fate: among them was the Earl of Athol, whom Edward caused to be hanged on a gibbet fifty feet high, and the brave Sir Simon Fraser, who was crowned in mockery with a garland made of periwinkle shells. Bruce's queen and daughter had taken refuge in the sanctuary of St. Duthac, at Tain, in Ross-shire; but they were seized and shut up in an English prison. The Countess of Buchan, who had distinguished herself by her loyalty to the Scottish sovereign, and two of Bruce's sisters, were also taken, and imprisoned: tradition says that one of them, and the Countess of Buchan, were confined in wooden cages. We hope that Edward never ordered such a cruel punishment to be inflicted.

Still the spirit of the bold Scottish king was not yet broken; and in the spring of 1307 he ventured from his concealment in Ireland. He brought with him about 300 men, and landed on the shore of Carrick during the night, expecting a rising in his favour; for in that district lay his ancestral estates. He had no sooner touched the land than he was met by one of his own emissaries, who informed him that there was no hope of a rising, as the neighbouring castle of Turnberry was in the hands of Lord Percy, and a powerful English garrison. Bruce attacked the castle, slaughtered numbers of the surprised English, and carried off a rich booty. He was soon joined by many of the patriots; and a series of petty wars or skirmishes instantly commenced. One of these was long remembered for its boldness and ferocity. Sir James Douglas had been deprived of his castle and estates, which were given by Edward to an English baron, Lord Clifford. Having collected a party of friends and followers, Sir James made a sudden attack upon the castle on Sunday, while the garrison were all at church. This building also was surrounded, a great number of the English killed, and the rest made prisoners. After taking from the castle all the arms and movables of value that were found in it, he piled up the corn, malt, wine-casks, and furniture together, and then, setting fire to the whole, murdered all his prisoners, and threw their dead bodies into the flames. In a little while the entire building was a blackened and smoking ruin; and this savage exploit is yet remembered in tradition as "The Douglas Larder."

Bruce was in great danger, and did not dare to show himself openly. His two brothers, Thomas and Alexander, in bringing him assistance from Ireland, were defeated and sent prisoners to King Edward, at Carlisle; who had them instantly executed as traitors. Bruce himself was hunted by the English with bloodhounds, and his escapes were so wonderful and numerous, that it seemed as if his life were miraculously preserved. At length his little army was strengthened by the arrival of some new partisans, and he accepted a challenge from the Earl of Pembroke to fight a battle at Loudon Hill. In this conflict, which occurred on the 10th of May, 1307, the English were defeated and compelled to fly, although their army was far more numerous than that of the Scots. Now that victory smiled upon Bruce, his countrymen joined him in great numbers; and a few days after the battle of Loudon Hill, he attacked another English army under the command of the Earl of Gloucester, and defeated it with great slaughter.

The wrath of Edward was great at seeing that the project he had cherished for so many years was being defeated, now that he had no longer the strength to take the field himself. Illness had confined him to his bed, and his conquests in Scotland were rapidly vanishing. After sixteen years' conflict, in which he had defeated all Scotland's great men, that country still defied his authority, and acknowledged an independent sovereign. He summoned his army to meet him at Carlisle. On its arrival, the unabated vigour of his mind giving him too great confidence in his physical strength, he left the litter in which he had for some time been carried about, and mounted his horse, to proceed to the head of his army. This was on the 2nd of July, 1307. He found the exertion too much for him; and on the 6th he stopped at the little village of Burgh-upon-Sands, where he expired the next day, in the sixty-ninth year of his age, and the thirty-fifth of his reign. His last breath was spent in enjoining his nobles never to sheathe the sword until they had completely subdued Scotland. The corpse was conveyed to the south, and interred at Westminster Abbey.

Edward was a resolute and powerful king, and his reign was productive of great good to the country; few sovereigns having won for themselves a more distinguished and honourable place in its history. Hume says of him, that the enterprises in which he engaged, "and the projects which he formed, and brought near to a conclusion, were more prudent, more regularly conducted, and more advantageous to the solid interests of the kingdom, than those which were undertaken in any reign, either by his ancestors or successors." He was renowned for his personal prowess, which placed him at the head of the chivalry of Europe; but as a modern historian (C. D. Yonge) observes, "the invincible knight was lost in the consummate general, the wise law-giver, the far-sighted statesman." No doubt he was ambitious; but his scheme for combining Wales, Scotland, and England into one kingdom, was a wise one; and if he could have carried it out, it would, as experience has proved, have been beneficial to the people of all three countries. In the conduct of his wars, there was much that we must unhesitatingly condemn; but it should not be forgotten that those acts of spoliation and barbarity, which cause us to shudder as we read of them, were more in accordance with the spirit of the age than the personal character of the king, who, on many occasions, exhibited striking traits of magnanimity and generosity. He endeavoured to curb the power of the barons, and availed himself of those resources which the clergy had appropriated to themselves from the nation at large: for this reason, the historians who wrote their chronicles within the walls of a monastery, are disposed rather to display his evil, than to bring into light his good, qualities. But the people found him a father, protector, friend; and even the present generation owes much to the English Justinian; as his love of justice, and the excellent laws he passed, occasioned the first Edward to be called. And (we again quote C. D. Yonge), "so long as the equitable rule prevails of balancing men's virtues against their faults, and of looking at the general results of their conduct, so long will the splendid and universal abilities of Edward I., and the great and lasting benefits which his country had derived from them, secure him a leading, if not the very first, place among those monarchs who have left an example to be revered by their countrymen, and imitated by their successors."

Edward's personal appearance was majestic, although the length and thinness of his legs gained him the absurd and vulgar title of Longshanks. But, in spite of this defect, he possessed great activity and immense strength. He stood nearly a head taller than ordinary men; his eyes were black and sparkling; and his hair, which curled naturally, was of the same colour. His first wife, Eleanor, brought him four sons and eleven daughters; many of the latter died in their infancy; and of the former, only one, Edward, his successor, survived him. His second wife, Margaret, the sister of the French king, presented him with two sons and a daughter.

There are some men, though not connected with the wars or government of their country, whose lives are yet an important part of its history. Two of these men lived in the reign of Edward I., and a brief sketch of their career will not be uninteresting. One of them was "Friar Bacon," the learned monk and supposed magician, who is reported to have made a brazen head which answered questions; and but for the carelessness of his servant, through which it was destroyed, would have enabled him to build an impregnable wall of brass round England. There is much that is legendary in his biography; and it may be imagined that the whole history is an idle tale: but it is not so. Roger Bacon was not only a real character, but a perfect miracle of learning and knowledge in the rude age in which he lived; and his name will be cherished by the lovers of enlightenment and progress, until the records of England shall be regarded as things of the past. The story about the brazen head and Bacon's magical powers, are, of course, mere legends: in those days the wonders of science were so mysterious, that those who practised them were looked upon by the common people as enchanters, who were able to control the elements, and suspend the operation of the laws of nature; no wonder, therefore, that Bacon was supposed to be one of the class.

Roger Bacon was born near Ilchester, in Somersetshire, about 1214. He received his education at Oxford, and made such rapid progress, that he soon became famous for the extent and variety of his learning. On leaving the university he visited Paris; and, after spending some time in that city, and eagerly mastering all that he could learn there, he returned to England, and became a monk of the Franciscan order. He was then in his twenty-sixth year; and such was the extent and variety of his attainments, that he was considered the wisest and most industrious scholar in the world. He was a great mathematician, and frequently occupied in experiments in natural philosophy. These pursuits made the ignorant believe him to be a magician; and the belief was not confined to the common people only; those who should have been wiser shared in it; and, on account of his supposed devotion to the art of magic, Bacon, who had been accustomed to deliver lectures to the young students in the universities, was prohibited from doing so. Nor did his persecutors stop here; they threw him into prison, and gave him so little food that he was nearly starved. Such is the return which the wise and good too often meet with from an ignorant and thoughtless world. For ten long weary years did the learned monk remain in prison—years of pain and trial, only rendered endurable by his own radiant thoughts, which, like comforting angels, made him sometimes forget his cell, and feel happy in his visions of invention and philosophy. At length, some friendly nobleman, somewhat better informed than the rest of the world, induced the pope to order Bacon to be released. His last days were spent in retirement, in the college of his order, where he was better understood and greatly respected. Indeed, his fellow-monks, out of admiration for his great abilities and learning, gave him the name of "Doctor Miribalis," or the admirable doctor. He died in the year 1292 or 1294.

Bacon has since been regarded as the greatest scholar in the mathematical and natural sciences that the thirteeenth century produced. Of mathematics he was a master; and he understood many matters connected with optics, that were then known to none but himself. He described, if he did not construct, a telescope; and discovered the cause of that beautiful phenomenon, the rainbow. His skill in chemistry and astronomy was considerable, although he was not so much beyond his age but that he mingled with them the studies of astrology and alchemy. He even compounded a tincture of gold, which he supposed had the power of prolonging life. This subject seems to have been a favourite one with him, for he wrote a treatise On the Means of Avoiding the Infirmities of Old Age. The invention of gunpowder has also been attributed to him; but it is now ascertained that, although he has described it in his treatise De Nullitate Magiæ, and although, probably, he made some experiments with it, he neither first invented it, nor was made acquainted with its terribly destructive properties. Bacon was familiar with Latin, Greek, and Hebrew. He entertained a devout admiration for the Bible, always reading it in the original languages, which, he said, was necessary to enable him to understand it. No doubt this is true in a very critical sense; but for all ordinary purposes our admirable translation of that divine book is sufficient. But neither that nor any other translation of it in the English language existed in his time; it was then a book read by the priests alone, and carefully withheld from the people. Bacon said, that in it were contained the principles of true science and of all useful knowledge. He wrote many books, and some of them are still preserved, of course in manuscript; for there was then no printing-press to multiply thoughts with its wondrous machinery, and spread them to willing readers throughout the land. Bacon's studies included theology, grammar, the ancient languages, geometry, astronomy, chronology, geography, music, optics, mechanics, chemistry, and, indeed, the whole circle of the sciences. In all of them he was acquainted with whatever was then known. Honour the memory of this giant of learning, and respect the wisdom of the past!

The other great scholar who lived during this period was Sir Michael Scott, or Scotus, who was born at Balwirie, in Fifeshire, in the early part of the thirteenth century. He was a man of extraordinary learning, and devoted to mathematics and astrology. Having studied at the university of Oxford or Paris, he went to the court of Frederick II., Emperor of Germany, and obtained the patronage of that monarch, who appointed him his astrologer. The study of that science, as it was called, was not then irrational, because it had not been proved to be an error and an impossibility. We must not smile at the credulity of wise men who lived in the thirteenth century, when even in the nineteenth, with all its vast accumulated information, there are some people who still believe that their lives and actions are influenced by the situations of the stars.

Scott understood many things besides astrology. He wrote several books; amongst which were a Treatise on Astronomy, and a History of Animals; he was also famous as possessing a great knowledge of medicine and theology. The ignorant people of his time, regarded him, like Roger Bacon, as a great magician, and told many stories about him. They said that he frequently invited company to dinner without providing anything for them to eat; and that when his guests had sat down to table, he compelled the spirits, over whom he had power, to bring him every delicacy he required, even from the most distant parts of the world. Presenting these viands to his visitors, he would say to them, "Gentlemen, this comes from the kitchen of the King of France; this from the kitchen of the King of Spain; and that from the kitchen of the King of England!" The astonished guests, it seems, were not prevented from eating these delicacies on account of the mephistophelian character of the attendants who brought them. It was also reported, that he foretold he should perish by violence; and that his prediction was accomplished by a stone falling from a building and killing him upon the spot. He was knighted by Alexander III., and died in 1293. His famous namesake of modern times, Sir Walter Scott, the celebrated novelist and poet of the legends of chivalry, has given some account of him in the notes to The Lay of the Last Minstrel; to which those readers who have any further curiosity upon the subject are referred.

CHAPTER XXIV.

THE REIGN OF EDWARD THE SECOND, CALLED EDWARD OF CAERNARVON.—A.D. 1307—1319.

DWARD THE SECOND was acknowledged King of England by a great assembly of prelates and nobles the day after his father's death; but his coronation did not take place until February in the following year. He was twenty-three years of age, graceful and handsome in his person, and of a cheerful temper. These qualities, together with the respect entertained for the memory of his stern and talented father, were calculated to win for him the esteem both of his barons and people. But the young king soon showed that he bore no resemblance to his father; and that he was indeed as weak-minded and incapable of governing, as the other was wise and well fitted for it. Among Edward's attendants, when he was Prince of Wales, was a young man named Piers Gaveston. He was the son of a knight of Gascony; was very handsome, active, sprightly and fascinating in his manners, and soon won the complete attachment of the young prince, who treated him as his friend and equal. He was an ardent lover of pleasure, and he led the youthful Edward into many follies and ridiculous excesses. This caused a decree of banishment to be issued against him by a parliament held at Lanercost, in 1307. Edward I. is said, on his dying bed, to have charged his successor not to admit him again to favour.

Edward's first act, however, was to recall his favourite, upon whom he bestowed the earldom of Cornwall, and the vast estates belonging to that important title. Nor did this magnificent present comprise the whole of his liberality: he constantly loaded him with honours and offices, married him to his own niece, Margaret de Clare, the sister of the proud Earl of Gloucester; and it was reported that he went so far as to say he would leave him his kingdom if he could. The nation could not understand this extreme affection, and said that the king was bewitched; indeed, a more singular friendship was never known; for Edward even gloried in being the slave of his subject. Whatever were Gaveston's accomplishments, he seems to have been both insolent and unprincipled; and his bounded influence over the mind of the young king was used for evil purposes. At his instigation, all the chief officers of the state, who had ably and honourably served the late king, were suddenly stripped of their places, and some of them deprived of their estates and thrown into prison. If charged with having misconducted themselves, no attempt was made to bring them to justice; no legal steps were taken against them; and we must take it for granted that no wrong could be proved. The fault of the Lord Treasurer, who was one of those most severely treated, was said to be, that, during the life of the late king, he had reproved the prince for extravagance, and refused him money. Under these circumstances, it was no wonder that the barons soon felt a jealous hatred of the upstart favourite.

A few months after Edward's accession, he went to France to be married to the Princess Isabella, the daughter of Philip le Bel, to whom he had been long engaged. During his absence he appointed Gaveston guardian of the kingdom, and gave him more authority than was usually attached even to that elevated office. The favourite was intoxicated by his good fortune; and, instead of trying to disarm envy by modesty and gentleness of manners, he incurred universal hatred by his haughtiness, wanton profusion, and rapacity.

Edward was married at Boulogne, on the 28th of January, 1308: the ceremony was conducted with great magnificence, and the lady was exceedingly beautiful. A gallant writer of the time calls her one of the most lovely women in the world; but, unfortunately, her goodness of heart afterwards turned out to be by no means equal to her gracefulness of person. The marriage ultimately proved a most unhappy one; but Edward himself was much to blame; for, although his queen was so beautiful, he was a cold, indifferent husband, and neglected her even from the first.

As soon as the young king returned to England he kissed and embraced Gaveston, and called him his brother, in the presence of the queen and the whole court. The barons were surprised and angry, and the queen was, naturally enough, offended. On the 24th of February she was crowned, with her husband, at Westminster Abbey; and the favourite carried the diadem before the royal couple in the procession, an honour that properly belonged only to princes of the royal family. At the festivals and tournaments which followed, he outshone all the nobles by the magnificence of his attire and attendants; and, being exceedingly powerful and expert in martial feats, vanquished several of them in those mock battles. His vanity also rose to such a height, that he frequently appeared in public arrayed in the king's jewels; and sometimes even wore the crown itself, a liberty which Edward freely permitted. This added to the dislike already borne to him; and the barons being encouraged by the queen, who felt that her husband's affection was drawn from her by this unworthy companion, they insisted that Sir Piers Gaveston should be banished. Edward was much grieved, but he was intimidated by the stern manner of his nobles, who all attended armed, and he felt it prudent to comply. The favourite left the kingdom; and the bishops extorted from him an oath that he would never return. But the young king was crafty enough to deceive his court: for he only sent his friend to Ireland; and, as a compensation for this exclusion from his presence, made him governor of the whole of that island.

Edward then employed himself in subduing the animosity borne to his minion by the barons; and by many presents and promises of improved conduct, he at length won their consent that Gaveston should be recalled. This done, he wrote to Rome, to get the favourite absolved from his oath. The pope consented; and, after an absence of thirteen months, Gaveston returned to England, and was once more embraced by his weak and whimsical sovereign. Experience had not taught the favourite wisdom; he was as haughty and ostentatious as ever; and he and the foolish king passed their time in vulgar amusements and feasting. He was famous for his ready wit, and imprudent enough to indulge it at the expense of the proudest and greatest barons in England. To many of them he gave ridiculous nicknames: the Earl of Lancaster he called the Old Hog; to the Earl of Pembroke, because that nobleman was pale and tall, he gave the name of Joseph the Jew; while the stern Earl of Warwick he called the Black Dog of Ardenne. With these indications of Gaveston's humour, the king and his parasites were delighted; but when they came to the ears of the nobles they were greatly incensed; and the Earl of Warwick swore that the royal minion should feel the black dog's teeth.

Edward's extravagance soon reduced him to a want of money; and he summoned a parliament of his barons at York for the purpose of granting him some. The young king's errors were the result rather of folly and natural weakness of character, than of any positive vice; and, perhaps, frequent good counsel from the oldest and most dignified of his barons might have reclaimed him. But they showed no disposition to act this kindly part, and seemed more ready to condemn than to reprove; to rebel rather than to reason. In this spirit they absolutely refused to attend his parliament; and even when he repeated his summons they still held aloof, on account of their great dislike to Gaveston. The king was alarmed; the favourite retired; and then, in the month of March, 1310, the barons assembled at Westminster Hall. But they came arrayed in armour, and attended by numerous bands of retainers; and Edward, who had not expected any such display, was completely in their hands. They presented a petition, requiring him to give the whole power of the crown to a committee of bishops and barons. A petition, presented by a number of armed and powerful men, is very like a command; and the king was compelled to consent. Only fancy such a request being made to his stern, resolute father! The barons would no more have ventured on such a thing, than an unarmed man would have presumed to pull the mane of a sleeping lion.

The committee were called ordainers, and their power was to last for a year. They were to reform the government of the kingdom, and even the household of the king; and their ordinances were to be regarded as laws. Having wrung this great concession from Edward, the barons declared that they owed it merely to his favour; and promised that it should never be used as an example, in future times, to curb and reduce the royal authority. Most of the decisions of the ordainers were just and reasonable; but there was one exceedingly hateful to Edward: it provided for the removal of all evil counsellors, and banished Sir Piers Gaveston, for ever, from the English soil. Another ordinance appointed that, in future, all places of honour in the kingdom should no longer be given away at the pleasure of the sovereign, but by the baronage in parliament. Edward had consented to convey his authority into the hands of the ordainers, apparently without much regret; but, as most weak people do when placed in situations of difficulty, he acted with great equivocation, and, making a secret protest against the acts of the committee, determined to revoke them as soon as he had the power to do so.

Proceeding to York [A.D. 1312], Edward recalled Gaveston, who, when exiled, had gone to Flanders; and the king hoped that he should be able to collect such an army as would protect his authority against the barons. This act sealed the fate of the favourite; for the nobles, provoked and alarmed at his return, entered into a conspiracy to ruin him utterly. It was headed by the king's cousin, the powerful Earl of Lancaster; and included many of the greatest barons of the country, together with the Archbishop of Canterbury. The royal party left York for Newcastle, when the barons suddenly made an attempt to surprise them. Edward and Gaveston escaped on board a ship, and hurried to Scarborough, where the king left his favourite in the fortress there, and himself proceeded to York, still in the hope of raising an army. Scarborough Castle had been a powerful place, and was supposed to be impregnable; but it was in a very bad condition, and not supplied with provisions; so that on the arrival of the Earl of Pembroke and his forces, Gaveston was compelled, on the 19th of May, to yield. At the same time, the earl pledged his honour that Piers should receive no injury, and that endeavours should be used to bring about a general accommodation.

Gaveston was carried prisoner to Dedington Castle, near Banbury, where he seems to have been kindly treated. One night the earl left the castle on a visit; and he had not been long gone before the Earl of Warwick, who bitterly hated the favourite, arrived. His motive was a treacherous one. Pembroke had pledged his honour not to injure the fallen courtier; but he (Warwick) had given no such promise, and resolved to put the unhappy man to death. Seizing Gaveston, he carried him the next morning to Warwick Castle, where a number of barons, who were opposed to him, were assembled. Forming themselves into a kind of tribunal, they tried him for the offence of returning from banishment without their consent. They soon found him guilty; for they had resolved upon that beforehand. The Black Dog of Ardenne, as Gaveston had called the grim Earl of Warwick, kept his promise of making the jester feel his teeth, for he pronounced sentence of death upon him. Throwing himself upon his knees, Gaveston implored for mercy; but the dislike of the barons was far too bitter to admit of that. He was dragged away to a place called Blacklow Hill, a little distance from the castle, and there beheaded on the 19th of June. Such, too frequently, has been the tragic fate of the unworthy favourites of kings. His execution, or rather murder, was a shamefully unjust action. A French historian very properly asks—"What would these same lords have said if the king or Gaveston had done the like?"

When the news of this event reached Edward, he was plunged in grief and passion. Shedding many tears, he vowed vengeance against all who were concerned in it. Roused from his usual apathy, he raised an army, and prepared for a civil war: the barons did the same. For some months the nation was kept in a state of excitement; but, fortunately, no battle took place. The barons apologised to the king with great humility, and Edward promised to pardon the past—resolving, however, to break this promise as soon as he had an opportunity.

Now that Gaveston was dead, old jealousies died away; things seemed to augur fairly for the future; and the king turned his attention more seriously towards Scotland, with which he had been at strife from the commencement of his reign. His father and predecessor was regarded as the inflexible enemy of Scottish independence; and the English boasted that, while he lived, Scotland could never throw off their rule. An old ballad of that time thus vauntingly expresses this feeling:—

> "Tut! Scot for thy strife!
> Hang up thy hatchet and thy knife,
> While to him lasts the life,
> With the long shanks."

But when Edward I. was succeeded by his feeble-minded son, the Scots plucked up courage; and Bruce was more resolved than ever on driving the usurpers from his native land. Instead of carrying on the war as his father had done, and attempting to conquer Robert Bruce, young Edward merely appointed a regent of Scotland, and then returned to his court, to seek for those pastimes which were far more to his inclination than the stern rough life of a camp. A series of successes attended Bruce; and at Inverary, in Aberdeenshire, he gained a great victory. Although he was so ill at the time that he was obliged to be held on his horse by two attendants, such was the energy of this heroic man, that he took the field with his army. Shortly afterwards, his brother, Edward Bruce, obtained a brilliant victory over an army composed both of Scots and English, and led by Sir John de St. John: this was followed by great slaughter, and more successes; so that, at the close of 1309, only a few of the stronger fortresses remained in the hands of the English. On the 24th of February, 1310, the States of Scotland met at Dundee, reversed the judgment of Edward I. in favour of John Baliol, and declared, that Robert Bruce, as the grandson of Bruce, the competitor of Baliol, was the rightful and lawful heir to the crown. The irresolute King Edward had appointed no less than six different governors of Scotland; but one was not more successful than another: indeed, this frequent changing only made matters worse.

At length [in September, 1310], Edward himself led a formidable army into Scotland: but he was unable to do any more than his representatives had done. The Scots devastated their own country, and retired before the invader, who was compelled to abandon the war because he could obtain nothing for the support of his troops. An army, under the command of Gaveston, was equally unsuccessful; and when that had retired, Bruce, in return, crossed the English borders, and ravaged the country with great ferocity. On another occasion the Scots invaded the domains of the Bishop of Durham, burning every house they came to, and carrying away an immense amount of plunder, besides whole troops of captives, whom they drove before them like flocks of sheep. The English people living near the borders were so terrified by these incursions, that they bought the forbearance of the Scots with a large sum of money.

Many were the successes of Bruce in 1311 and 1312. Castle after castle fell before him, and, in 1313, he subdued the Isle of Man. He was then gradually, but surely, reducing the whole of Scotland to his rule. It is strange that his own countrymen should, in many cases, have resisted him: but, for some jealous or mistaken motives, they did. All opposition was, however, disappearing before his energy and wisdom; and the sovereignty of Bruce was being firmly established. Edward seems to have been roused to activity by the prospect of losing Scotland; and he determined, by one desperate effort, to recover his authority over that country. He collected an enormous army, consisting, it is said, of 100,000 men, of whom 40,000 were horsemen; numbers of them, both horses and riders, being arrayed in complete armour. This army met at Berwick on the 11th of June, 1314; and a brilliant and imposing appearance it presented when the bright arms of the immense host were gilded by the sunbeams, and its gay banners floated proudly in the summer air. Away it marched to the sound of martial music, and with Edward at its head, towards the town of Stirling, the castle of which was the only one in Scotland, except Berwick, which remained in his hands. Bruce expected that this would be the scene of the coming contest, and he had posted his troops to the south of Stirling, in a field, along one side of which ran the rivulet of Bannockburn. His army was very inferior to that of the English; for it consisted of scarcely 40,000 soldiers, a very small number of whom were cavalry. But he was a skilful general, and had chosen an admirable position; a hill protected his army on the right side, and a morass on the left; while in front of it ran the stream just mentioned. Knowing that his soldiers dreaded the attacks of the English cavalry, he prepared a stratagem to lead the latter to destruction. He ordered a lot of pits to be dug along the banks of the Bannockburn, in the bottom of which sharp stakes were fixed, and the pits then carefully covered with turf and brushwood.

All this was done before the arrival of the English, who made their appearance on Sunday morning, the 23rd of June. Bruce then issued a proclamation to his army, declaring that all who felt faint-hearted, and were not resolved either to conquer or die with him, might retire in safety to their homes. Not a man, however, moved from his ranks; and these brave Scots raised a shout which seemed to shake the sky. King Edward had sent on 800 horsemen, under the command of Robert Clifford, with instructions to reach Stirling Castle, and reinforce the garrison. Bruce suspected something of this sort, and sent his nephew, Randolph, who commanded a division of the army, to watch for, and cut off, any force that might arrive. Clifford and his followers had approached so stealthily behind a rising ground, that they had not been observed by Randolph, and were first discovered by the eagle glance of Bruce himself. Riding up to his nephew, he exclaimed—"Oh, Randolph! you have neglected the charge committed to you; a rose has fallen from your chaplet; you have suffered the enemy to pass."

Clifford and his horsemen had not reached the castle: it was not yet too late; and away went Randolph with 500 spearmen on foot, resolved, if possible, on redeeming his error. Clifford seeing him approach, ordered his cavalry to wheel round and charge at full speed. Randolph formed his men into a circle, with the points of their long spears outwards; and in this position they received the shock of their enemies. A desperate conflict now took place, which Bruce and Sir James Douglas, together with a portion of the Scottish army, viewed from a little distance. The English horsemen seemed getting the best of the encounter, when Douglas begged permission to hasten to the relief of his friend. "No," answered Bruce; "you shall not stir from your ground; let Randolph extricate himself; I will not alter my line of battle for him." "Noble king," replied the bold Douglas, "I cannot stand still and see Randolph perish when I can help him; with your leave I must go to his assistance." Bruce yielded a reluctant assent, and Douglas hurried away with a body of troops. Before, however, he reached the combatants, he saw that Randolph and his followers were gaining the victory. Immediately he ordered his men to halt, saying—"We are come too late to aid them, and we will not lessen the victory they have won by claiming a share in it." This jealous regard for the honour of his friend was the more noble, because Randolph and Douglas were rivals for military glory. Clifford and his horsemen being unable to reach the castle, returned in confusion to King Edward's army, leaving many of their companions behind them lying lifeless among the long and now blood-bedewed grass.

Another remarkable incident took place upon that memorable Sunday evening. Bruce was riding in the front of his army, mounted on a spirited little pony; in his hand he held his broad battle-axe; while a golden coronet which encircled his bright steel helmet, pointed him out, both to friend and foe, as the Scottish king. An advanced portion of the English army came near at that moment; and its leader, Sir Henry de Bohun, recognising Bruce, determined on an attempt to gain himself an honourable name, and end the war at once by the destruction of the Scottish leader. Bohun was mounted on a powerful war-horse, and cased in complete armour. Couching his lance, he rode against Bruce at full speed. The Scottish sovereign sat like a rock upon his little palfrey, as if he intended to meet his opponent's charge; but suddenly he moved upon one side, and as De Bohun passed him in full career, he raised his heavy battle-axe, and, with one fearful blow, dashed both the helmet and head of the knight to pieces. The Scottish leaders rushed to see if their king was hurt; but he, coolly glancing upon his weapon, the shaft of which had been broken by the blow, merely exclaimed, "I am sorry for the loss of my good battle-axe."

The day on which these events took place was exceedingly beautiful; an old Scotch chronicler says, that the vast English force looked perfectly radiant as the sunbeams fell upon their bright armour and gay attire; but night came on, the cold stars shone out, and there was no thought of the battle until the morrow.

When the day dawned, King Edward beheld a venerable priest with a crucifix in his hand, walking slowly along the Scottish lines, to bless the soldiers and the cause for which they were about to expose their lives. "See!" he cried to Sir Ingram de Umfraville, a Scotch gentleman in his service—"See! they kneel; they are asking for mercy!" "They are, my lord," answered Umfraville, "but it is from heaven, and not from us. Trust me, yon men will win the day or die in the battle." "Be it so, then," exclaimed Edward, and gave orders to sound to the charge. The clang of martial music rose into the air, and the conflict began. The Earl of Gloucester, with a great body of cavalry, rushed upon the Scottish army, and fell among the covered pits; many of the riders were thrown from their horses, and the poor animals, being frightfully wounded by the sharp stakes, became furious and unmanageable. More careful repetitions of the charge failed to break the Scottish lines, which presented a firm and bristling bank of spears to their assailants. Bruce's nephew, Randolph, and the divisions under his command, then moved forward and attacked the main body of the English army, into which for a time they seemed to disappear, such were its vast numbers. The battle now raged with the utmost fury, and the mixed sounds of shouts and groans, the trampling of horses, and the clang of steel, made an uproar that was exceedingly terrible.

The Scots suffered most from immense flights of arrows, which a great body of English archers shot constantly amongst them. Bruce beholding this, sent Sir Robert Keith with 500 horsemen to ride round a morass, and attack the bowmen from behind. The scheme was perfectly successful; and the archers, who had no weapons suited to close fighting, were thrown into instant confusion. Bruce then brought forward a part of his troops which he had hitherto kept as a reserve; and the English, who had already lost a great number of men, began to waver. Even the Scottish soldiers saw this, and called out in encouragement to each other, "On them! on them! they fall!" Still the day was doubtful, and this hard-fought battle continued in all its fury, when suddenly what seemed to be a large body of fresh troops made its appearance upon a neighbouring hill. It consisted of 20,000 half-clad and unarmed Highland gillies, camp followers, whom Bruce had kept till this moment concealed; but whom he now brought forward with drums beating and banners flying, as if they had been a regular army of disciplined and useful troops. The stratagem was successful: a panic seized the English host; and Bruce himself, at the head of a body of troops, rushed upon them with tremendous fury. Immense numbers of the English were slain, and soon a general confusion and flight took place. King Edward himself, who seemed stupefied at this unexpected result, escaped with difficulty, and was pursued as far as the castle of Dunbar, sixty miles from the field of battle. Twenty-two barons and sixty knights were taken prisoners, besides a great quantity of military stores and valuables. Thus ended the famous battle of Bannockburn, which was fought on the 24th of June, 1314, and which established Bruce on the throne, restoring to the Scottish nation that independence for which they had so bravely, but unsuccessfully, contested against the first Edward. It was the greatest defeat which the English had suffered since the country was invaded by William the Conqueror.

After this great victory, Edward Bruce and the terrible Douglas entered England with an army, and proceeded as far as the town of Richmond in Yorkshire, mercilessly ravaging the country with fire and sword; the population fleeing to Newcastle, Berwick, and Carlisle for shelter. This invasion was repeated in the autumn, and again in each of the four following years. The narrative is painful to read: it contains merely repetitions of the same merciless raids. At the close of 1317, Berwick was the only place left to the English, and that Bruce captured by assault in March of the following year. In July, 1319, Edward made an unsuccessful attempt to retake that important post; and repeated disasters compelled him, on the 21st of December, to agree to a truce for two years.

Not contented with ravaging England, Edward Bruce, in 1315, led a Scotch army to Ireland, landing on the 25th of May, at Antrim. His aim was to wrest that country from the English rule, and create himself its king. He had been invited by the Irish people, who detested England, and now, animated by the example of their Scottish neighbours, hoped to throw off its yoke. Edward Bruce caused himself to be crowned king of Ireland in 1316; but his invasion brought great misery upon the country; he remained in it nearly three years and a-half, during which time he fought nineteen battles, and was himself killed in the last. He had always triumphed over the Irish who had opposed him; but when King Edward sent over an English army, he was defeated and slain, on the 5th of October, 1318. The Irish rejoiced at his death, for during the time he had ruled among them they had been afflicted with a famine so terrible, that they were sometimes reduced to the horrible extremity of eating each other. This famine also prevailed in England, and to such an extent, that it is related that criminals confined in prisons, being left almost without food, exhibited the same horrible appetites as the Irish did, and devoured each other in a shocking manner. People also kept their children at home for fear they should be stolen, and murdered for food. About this time a tanner's son of Exeter, named John Deydras, propagated an absurd story, that he was the true heir to the throne, that he had been changed when an infant while at nurse, and that Edward was an impostor. He, no doubt, thought that the king was so disliked, that he should succeed in his insolent deception; but in this he was fatally mistaken, for being arrested and tried for treason, he was found guilty and hanged.

CHAPTER XXV.

CONCLUSION OF THE REIGN OF EDWARD THE SECOND.—A.D. 1319—1327.

IT is time to return to the affairs of England. Soon after the death of Sir Piers Gaveston, the weak King Edward attached himself to another favourite; this was a young man of English birth and noble family, whose name was Hugh Despenser. The Earl of Lancaster had procured him a position about Edward's person, with instructions that he was to act as a spy, and inform the barons of all that passed at court. But he saw that it would be more easy and pleasant to make his fortune by working for himself than for the barons; and at length, by flattery and obsequiousness he became the confidant of his weak sovereign. On him the king bestowed all the affection which he had previously borne to Gaveston; and after giving him immense estates, married him to the daughter of the Earl of Gloucester. The father of Despenser was an aged and venerable nobleman, who had been much respected; but, through the influence of his son, he, in a short time, obtained so many offices that both of them became thoroughly detested by the barons. It is an old saying, that prosperity tries men's characters more than adversity; and very likely the two Despensers became haughty and avaricious; still, the barons seem to have evinced a determination to hate them, and to have been on the watch for a cause of complaint.

That cause soon arrived; the young Despenser was guilty of a mean and oppressive act towards a noble, named John de Mowbray. The Earl of Lancaster and other barons immediately took the part of the latter, and flying to arms, they sent a message to the king, desiring him to dismiss or imprison Despenser. Before receiving an answer they attacked and burnt the houses both of the son and father, killed many of their servants, and ravaged their lands. The king was too weak to punish this outrage; but he very properly answered, that he could not punish Despenser unless he had been legally tried and condemned for some offence. The barons then marched to London with their forces, and presented to a parliament at Westminster various charges against both Despensers, the chief of which were, that they had usurped the royal power, and estranged the king from his nobles. The accused were both absent, the father being abroad, and the son at sea; still, in July, 1321, a sentence of perpetual banishment was pronounced against them. This was shamefully unjust, and the bishops refused to sanction it, so the barons proceeded on their own authority. As to the king himself, he was so despised, and had become so timid, that he did not dare to refuse his assent. So incapable was he of sustaining the authority of royalty, and so little regarded at this time, that when the queen, while on a journey, desired a night's lodging at the castle of Lord Badlesmere, in Kent, she was rudely refused; even her attendants were attacked, and one of them killed. This insult roused Edward, or the queen's resentment did, and as she was generally popular with the barons, he assembled an army, in October, 1321, and punished the inhospitable and insolent noble. For the present Badlesmere escaped with his life, but he afterwards perished on the scaffold.

As he had now an armed force at his command, the king resolved to make a struggle to regain his lost authority, and to strike terror into his enemies. Seizing twelve knights, who belonged to the rebellious party, he ordered them to be instantly hanged; and then [1322], reversing the sentence against the Despensers, recalled his favourites to England. The Earl of Lancaster was the chief of the barons who defied Edward's authority; and this noble now retired to the north, and entered into a traitorous alliance with the Scots, by which the latter were to assist him against the king. Edward pursued the earl with a superior force, and, in March, overtook him at Boroughbridge. Lancaster was no soldier; his Scottish allies had not arrived; and he attempted to escape. The Earl of Hereford, who was of his party, charged on foot to clear the bridge; but a Welsh soldier, hidden beneath it, suddenly thrust his spear through the flooring into the stomach of the earl, who fell dead on the spot. A sharp conflict ensued, which was interrupted by the darkness of night; and the next morning Lancaster was taken prisoner. He was conveyed to his own castle of Pontefract, and tried for high treason before the king and a number of barons of the royal party. His guilty connection with the Scots was clear enough, and he was, therefore, condemned to death, and beheaded. Many other knights and nobles who had been taken at Boroughbridge shared his fate. Lancaster was Edward's cousin, and the king afterwards repented putting him to death. Some nobles having entreated him to pardon a condemned criminal of obscure condition, he exclaimed in reply, "Is it possible that such a wretch as this should find so many friends to intercede for him, when not one would speak in behalf of my cousin Lancaster, who if he had lived, might have been useful both to me and the whole kingdom; therefore, as for this fellow, he shall die as he deserves." There has been much discussion about the character of the Earl of Lancaster; some writers regarding him as a patriot; and it is certain that many of the ignorant people of his own time, venerated his memory as that of a saint. It appears the king had done him an injury, and his motives seemed rather personal than patriotic, while Lancaster's conduct in inviting the Scots to invade and ravage England, was certainly that of a traitor. The truth no doubt is, that the king's unpopularity was so great, that for any one to oppose him, was enough to win them the favour of the people.

Edward had now an opportunity of recovering the respect of his subjects: the party of barons who had leagued themselves against him were ruined and dispersed; some of them having fallen by the hands of the executioner, and the rest fled as exiles to the French court. But the excitement of conquest over, he fell again into his habitual indolence, and giving himself up entirely to the society of Despenser, bestowed upon him and his father, most of the forfeited estates which had belonged to the nobles who had perished for treason. The barons who remained faithful to the king were disgusted at this shameful favouritism, which was the more unjust, because Edward's success had been obtained through their assistance. Thus, though tranquillity seemed to be restored, a spirit of discontent was everywhere at work.

The truce with Scotland having expired, Edward again prepared for war; but before he was ready, Bruce led an army into England, wasted all the northern counties with fire and sword, and returned home with an enormous amount of plunder. In August, 1323, Edward, with an army of 100,000 men, marched into Scotland, before which force Bruce thought it wisest to retire, having himself first laid waste the country. Edward proceeded as far as Edinburgh, where his army was reduced almost to starvation, and he was compelled to give orders for a retreat. During its progress, he was harassed by the Scots, who hung upon his rear; and, to add to his troubles, it is said that as many as 16,000 of the English soldiers died from famine and sickness. When Edward had reached Biland Abbey, in Yorkshire, he was attacked by the Scottish army, who had followed him to that place; a fierce battle ensued, which terminated in the defeat of the starving and dispirited English. Even the royal treasure and the privy seal of England were seized by the victorious Scots. Sick at heart, the incapable Edward entered into a truce, which it was agreed should last for thirteen years, and by which he bound himself to recognise the sovereignty of Bruce and the independence of Scotland.

Other troubles were in store for Edward—troubles far more serious than the reverses of fortune which had befallen him in Scotland. Charles le Bel, the French king, and Edward's brother-in-law, had, or pretended to have, some cause of complaint against him. The French monarch was as crafty and powerful as the English one was weak and simple; and his object in the quarrel seems to have been, to take possession of Edward's continental dominions. The latter, who felt himself unequal to any warlike struggle, was very desirous of preserving peace; and, at the request of the queen, he permitted her to go over to France [A.D. 1324], and arrange a treaty with her brother. She said that he would be sure to yield to her, as a sister, concessions which he would refuse to any other ambassador. But Queen Isabella cared nothing for the interests of her husband; he had never behaved kindly to her; and she had come to dislike him extremely. Her object was to leave him, and join the large party of discontented English nobles, who had already taken refuge in the French court.

During the progress of the negotiation between the English queen and her brother, the French king, that monarch declared that Edward himself must appear at his court, and do homage for the lands he held in France. According to the customs of those times he was bound to do so; but still the act of homage was one which powerful princes were generally glad to evade. Despenser, also, was exceedingly anxious that the king should not go to France; he feared to go with him, because, in the French court, the dislike borne to him by Queen Isabella, might expose him to insults, and even danger; and he was equally afraid to stay behind, because he was so generally hated, that he relied on the presence of the king for protection. He was delighted, therefore, when a proposal was made by the queen, that Edward should resign the provinces of Guienne and Ponthieu to his son; and that the prince should repair to France, and do homage for them instead of his father. Edward consented to this arrangement, and thus fell into a cruel snare which was laid for him.

The prince, who was but thirteen years of age, joined his mother, rendered his homage at the French court, and then remained there. Edward was desirous that his wife and son should return to him, but they refused to do so, the queen declaring that Despenser had robbed her of her husband's love, that he had a design upon the lives both of herself and the prince, and that she would never again set her foot upon English ground until he was removed from the councils and presence of its king. The queen had been ill-treated, and there was some ground for her complaints; but she was a heartless and designing woman, and had another object in view, besides those which she avowed, in the course she was taking. The chief of the party of the English nobles who resided at the French court was Roger Mortimer; he was brave and handsome, graceful in manners, and attractive in his conversation. Queen Isabella was still young and beautiful; from her adviser he became her admirer [A.D. 1325]: in a short time a guilty love sprang up between them, and in his society she cared no longer for that of her indifferent husband.

Charles le Bel pretended to be offended at his sister's conduct, and told her she must not remain any longer at his court; but it is supposed that his anger was not very sincere, and that it was only assumed for the sake of appearances. Queen Isabella, therefore, proceeded to Holland, to the court of the Count of Hainault, where she was very hospitably entertained. While there, she affianced her son, the Prince of Wales, to the count's young daughter, Philippa. She also collected around her as many followers as possible, and very shortly 3,000 men, mostly knights and nobles, were ready to obey her bidding. In the meantime, Edward's affairs in England were in a deplorable condition; conspiracies were forming against him in every direction; popular sympathy was entirely with the queen, and he could scarcely depend upon the faithful service of a single knight or noble, except the two Despensers. Every little folly and extravagance of Edward was bitterly condemned, and he was soon hated by the people more than the worst tyrant that ever sat upon the throne had been.

Encouraged by this state of things, the queen, accompanied by the prince and her little army, sailed over to England. She landed without opposition at Orwell, in Suffolk, on the 24th of September, 1326. Many of the nobles and prelates immediately joined her party; while an army that had been sent by Edward to arrest her progress, deserted him, and embraced her cause. The wretched king was utterly abandoned, and his chief enemies were his wife and son. The queen declared that her only object was to rid both king and kingdom of the tyranny of the Despensers. When Edward appealed for assistance to the citizens of London, they would not arm in his favour; and even told him, that they owed an equal duty to their king, their queen, and their prince. Edward was then convinced that the Londoners shared in the general dislike of him; and, feeling no longer safe amongst them, he appointed the Bishop of Exeter governor; and, attended only by Despenser, the chancellor, Baldock, and a few attendants, fled hurriedly from the city. Scarcely knowing where to obtain shelter and protection, they embarked on board a ship, with the intention of proceeding to Ireland. A storm, however, threw them upon the coast of South Wales, and they concealed themselves among the woods and mountains of Glamorganshire.

No sooner did the Londoners discover that the king had fled, than the common people broke out into a great tumult; and, seizing the Bishop of Exeter, they beheaded him, and threw the bleeding corpse into the river Thames. The unfortunate prelate was bitterly hated; but he seems to have incurred this rancour only by his loyalty and attachment to the king. Then, breaking into the Tower, the mob set all the state captives at liberty, and entered into an engagement to put every one to death who dared to oppose Queen Isabella and the prince. The elder Despenser did not accompany the king and his son in their flight, but took refuge from the popular fury in Bristol Castle. On the approach of the queen and her party, the garrison delivered him into their hands, and the grey-haired old man was condemned by them to an immediate and ignominious death. His chief offence was, his avaricious grasping after the confiscated estates of those nobles who had fallen under the displeasure of the king. He had almost reached his ninetieth year; but his great age and venerable appearance procured him no pity. He was hanged, and left swinging upon the gibbet for four days; after which, the corpse was cut to pieces, and thrown to the dogs. He had been created Earl of Winchester; so his enemies set his head upon a pole, and sent it, in derision, to that city.

During the month of September, 1326, the prelates and barons met in parliament, and declared that the king, by his flight, had left the throne vacant; and that, in consequence, they created his son, the Prince of Wales, guardian of the kingdom. Soon afterwards, the wretched king, together with Despenser the younger, and Baldock the chancellor, were hunted out, and seized by the Earl of Leicester, in the woods of Lantressan. Edward was sent a prisoner to Kenilworth Castle; and Baldock, after being severely beaten by the mob, was committed to Newgate, where he soon after died from the rough treatment he had received. Despenser was taken to Hereford, where the queen was staying, and tried for treason. He was found guilty; ordered to be executed; and was hung upon a gallows fifty feet high. The sentence and execution were alike unjust. Despenser possessed the vices of a courtier and a parasite; but no serious crime can be laid to his charge; his being so great a favourite of the king was the misfortune that led him to his fate.

Edward passed two months as a prisoner in Kenilworth Castle; during which time, no hand was lifted in his favour, no voice raised in his behalf. Then, on the 7th of January, 1327, the parliament was again assembled, and a charge, consisting of six articles, was drawn up against him. He was accused of being incapable of governing the country, of wasting his time in frivolous amusements, of neglecting public business, of being influenced by evil counsellors, and of having, by his misconduct, lost the kingdom of Scotland and part of Guienne. The last article declared, that he "abandoned his realm, and did as much as he could to destroy it and his people; and what is worse, by his cruelty, and the default of his person, he is found incorrigible, without hopes of amendment; all which things are so notorious, that they cannot be gainsayed." Other real or supposed offences were added to the list; but it seems evident enough, that his greatest faults arose from the natural weakness of his character, and not from any vicious feeling. The six articles being all adopted, the Bishop of Hereford put this question to the grave and stern array of prelates and barons—whether Edward should be restored to the throne, or his son at once placed on it? The question was decided against the father; and the next day it was declared that he was no longer King of England. A sentence of dethronement was then solemnly recorded, and the young prince proclaimed king, amid the enthusiastic shouts of the people. The queen pretended to shed tears in public for the unhappy fate of her husband; but, as she had been the great cause of his misfortune, her hypocrisy deceived no one, except her young son Edward, who solemnly assured his mother that he would not accept the crown during the life of his father, unless with his consent. That consent was soon wrung from the fallen monarch; and all the nobility, and most of the bishops, then took an oath of fealty to the young king, whose crown was snatched from his father's brow, and whose throne was raised upon that father's disgrace and ruin.

On the 20th of the same month, a deputation of barons and prelates visited the captive king at Kenilworth, to renounce their allegiance, and extort from him a resignation of his royalty. He appeared before them humble and dejected, and his gay robes of silk and velvet changed for a plain black gown. When he beheld his inveterate enemy, the Bishop of Hereford, among the group, his emotions overpowered him, and he fell on the ground in a fainting fit. On recovering, he meekly surrendered the name of royalty; saying, that he submitted to whatever was required of him, with the greater resignation, as he acknowledged that his sins were the sole cause of his misfortunes. He added that he could not, without extreme grief, behold the aversion his people had for him; but if his sorrow could admit of any comfort, it was from the consideration of his subjects' goodness to his son, for which he returned them his thanks. After this speech he formally delivered up the crown, sceptre, and other emblems of royalty. He was then told, that, in future, he must consider himself merely a private man; and the steward of his household, breaking his staff of office, declared, that by that ceremony all persons engaged in Edward's service were discharged. The barons and prelates then departed in solemn procession, and the uncrowned king was left to his own mournful thoughts. Sad, indeed, must they have been: his luxury and gorgeousness had vanished, his royalty passed away like a dream; pomp, power, friends and parasites, jewelled diadem and glittering sceptre, all were gone—nothing was left him but resignation or despair. Sadder still must the reflection have been, that all his humiliation and misery proceeded from folly and frivolity, from neglected duties, ill-selected friends, and want of thought. This was the first instance, since the Conquest, of an English king being deposed; and, if only on that account, it must be regarded as a remarkable incident. The position of a king is a lofty one, but it has its duties and responsibilities; and no doubt, many an oppressed or ruined subject had lamented Edward's indifference to his people's happiness, and his carelessness to law and justice, with as much bitterness as he himself now thought of them.

Edward II. having resigned his dignity, the nobility, and most of the bishops, took an oath of fealty to Edward III., who was crowned at Westminster Abbey on the 29th of January, 1327. The young king was only in his fourteenth year; he was too young to understand and perform the duties of his elevated position; and the real authority of the crown was exercised by the queen and her lover, Mortimer. The popularity of this guilty pair did not last long: they soon incurred the dislike of the nation; the people began to think the fallen king had been treated with too much violence and severity; and a feeling of pity for him soon grew to hatred towards the woman, who, in spite of the dearest ties of nature, had been his bitterest enemy. This proceeded so far, that some priests even expressed their sympathy for the royal captive from the pulpit, and spoke in condemnation of the improper intimacy between the queen and Mortimer. That profligate and cruel man, stung by these reflections, longed for the death of the deposed monarch, and soon resolved on his murder.

Edward was confined at Kenilworth Castle, in the custody of the noble who had captured him, then the Earl of Leicester, but since made Earl of Lancaster. He had borne a bitter hatred to the late king, because Edward had condemned his brother to the scaffold; but he was not a hard-hearted or ungenerous man; and, his vengeance satisfied, he treated his captive with humanity and respect. It is said that Mortimer and the queen suspected that he had a design of restoring the fallen monarch to his throne; but that is not very probable. It is evident that they feared the helpless Edward; and Mortimer, hoping that cruelty and insult would kill him, took him away from the Earl of Lancaster, and committed him to the custody of Sir John Maltravers, a stern, fierce man, who had suffered some injustice at his hands in the time of his prosperity.

Maltravers evidently desired that the king should be altogether lost sight of and forgotten; so that if he were secretly murdered, the act would escape detection. For this purpose he carried him about by night from castle to castle; but after a few months he was shut up in a wretched little room, scarcely bigger than a large cupboard, at Berkeley Castle, in Gloucestershire. Lord Berkeley was then associated with Maltravers in his charge; and it was arranged that each should take care of him for a month alternately with the other. The former treated the king with some degree of gentleness; but the latter caused every possible indignity to be heaped upon his poor defenceless head. No insult was too mean or trifling for this ruffian and his dependents. On one occasion, when the king desired to be shaved, cold and dirty water was brought to him from the castle ditch, and he was refused any other. The broken-spirited man burst into tears, and said, that in spite of the insolence of his persecutors, he would still be properly attended to.

A proud spirit would most likely have sunk under this cruel treatment, and soon ceased to trouble its torturers; but it failed to kill the feeble-minded Edward. It is to be hoped he did not feel the indignities to which he was subjected so severely as a more noble and heroic mind would have done. But a lingering death, proceeding from a crushed spirit and broken heart, would have been mercy in comparison with the awful doom that awaited him. Lord Berkeley was taken ill while absent from the castle, and compelled to remain at his manor of Bradley. Taking advantage of this circumstance, the impatient Mortimer sent two ruffians, named Ogle and Gourney, to despatch the king. They had a warrant which gave them admission to his person; and, in the night of the 21st of September, they went to his chamber, where they murdered him in a manner almost too shocking for description. Holding him down on his bed by a table which they threw upon him, they ran a red-hot weapon into his body. By means of this atrocious cruelty they hoped that no visible marks of violence would appear upon the corpse; but their wicked design was betrayed by the shrieks of the wretched man, which were heard all through the castle, and even beyond its massive walls. The next day it was reported that Edward had died during the night, and the people were admitted to view the body: the face bore an expression of agony, but the vestiges of murder were not to be seen; and no one dared, or even thought it worth while, to make any inquiries into the matter. The corpse was carried to the city of Gloucester, and quietly buried there in the abbey church. The particulars of his fate soon became known, and his assassins fled: Gourney was arrested and beheaded at sea; Ogle's end is uncertain; but it is probable that retributive justice overtook him. Sir John Maltravers hid himself for some years in Germany; but having rendered a service to Edward III., he took courage, and throwing himself at the feet of that monarch, received a pardon.

Stained as the pages of history are with the records of blood and cruelty, perhaps nothing can be found more truly appalling than the murder of the foolish, feeble, persecuted, and unhappy King Edward II. He was forty-three at the time of his death, and had entered the twenty-first year of his reign. He left four children; two sons and two daughters. In his character, Edward bore a great resemblance to his grandfather, Henry III.; indeed, he seems to have been far more amiable, but he was much less fortunate. In all things he was rather weak than wicked; and he gave himself up so utterly to his favourites, that he even willingly sacrificed to them the esteem of his people. His great vice seems to have been insincerity. Some writers have charged him with a leaning to drunkenness: this has not been proved; but if he indulged in such a habit only in the latter part of his reign, it will be but just to suppose that it was in consequence of his misfortunes. In private life, there is reason to believe that Edward would have been an estimable character: but, in that age, when there were no responsible ministers, no man could have been more unfit to perform the duties of a king.

During this reign the order of Knights Templars was suppressed both in France and England. The Templars were an association of gentlemen, which had sprung into existence during the enthusiasm that prevailed in Europe for the crusades; the order being instituted A.D. 1118. Its principles were both of a devotional and military character, and the object of its members was to defend the Holy Land, and fight for the tomb of the Saviour. The association was very rich, especially in France; and probably that was the cause of the cruelty exercised against its members. Prosperity, also, had made them proud in their manners, and luxurious in their habits; they had become unpopular, and Philip IV., the French king, caused them to be arrested all over France. A number of horrible and absurd crimes was alleged against them; they were charged with secret murders and robberies; and it was said that the devil frequently attended their meetings in the form of a black cat. The more to excite the feelings of the people against them, it was pretended, that every one who was received into the association was compelled to renounce his Saviour, to spit upon the cross, and to worship a gilded head, which was preserved at one of their houses. The object of the French king seems to have been to seize their property, and this he did after having fifty-four of them burnt to death in one day, in October, 1307, as heretics. They protested their innocence to the last, and went to the stake singing a hymn of resignation. In 1312 the order was formally abolished. Clement V., who was then pope, approved of this shocking barbarity, and he and the French king induced the weak Edward to extirpate the Knights Templars from England. At first, Edward spoke in favour of those unhappy men, and declared that, as they had done no harm, they deserved no punishment; indeed, it seems they were in most respects a moral and religious body, who had, on many occasions, done good service to their country; but, notwithstanding this conviction, he permitted the outcry against them, and finally confiscated their lands and abolished their order. It is some consolation to remember that they were not tortured or burnt in England, although the pope wrote a letter to Edward, persuading him to put the Templars on the rack, that they might be made to confess crimes of which they had not been guilty. At that time it was nobly declared that there was no instrument of torture in England! Alas! in after ages no such proud boast could be made.

CHAPTER XXVI.

THE REIGN OF EDWARD THE THIRD.—A.D. 1327—1337.

HEN the son of the deposed king was placed upon the throne, he was too young to conduct the affairs of the kingdom. The parliament, therefore, appointed a council of regency, of five prelates and seven nobles, to carry on the government until Edward had attained a maturer age; and the Earl of Lancaster was appointed guardian of the king's person. Though he afterwards became a great soldier and brilliant conqueror, Edward was not of a cruel or even unamiable nature, and there is no cause to suppose that he was at all guilty of the barbarity which had been practised upon his father. He had been entirely under the influence of his mother; and it was that hard-hearted woman, and her abandoned lover, Mortimer, who behaved so inhumanly to the late unhappy king. Notwithstanding her shameful conduct, the parliament acted very liberally to the queen, bestowing upon her £20,000 a-year, which was equal to about three times that amount in the present day; and, in spite of the council of regency, she and Mortimer shared nearly the whole power of the government between them.

The Scots, seeing the true King of England deposed, and a boy placed upon the throne, broke the truce which had been entered into between England and Scotland, and which it was agreed should last thirty years. We are told, that, in committing this act of bad faith, the King of Scotland had a good object in view: he wished to convert the truce between the two countries into a lasting peace—a peace of such a character as should be more advantageous to his own country than the truce then existing. Whatever was his object, he raised a great army, and declared his intention of again commencing the war, unless his terms were complied with. His threat was answered in an angry and defiant manner; for the English people longed to wipe away the disgrace they had met at Bannockburn, and the whole military force of England was summoned to meet at Newcastle. Sixty-two thousand men obeyed this summons; and although they were really commanded by the Duke of Norfolk, who was grand-marshal of England, yet, in order to animate his soldiers, the boy-king rode at their head.

Scotland being a much smaller and less populous country than England, Bruce was unable to collect such a great army as that which followed the banners of young Edward. Indeed, he had only 14,000 men; but they were fierce, hardy soldiers, long used to fighting, and capable of enduring almost any amount of fatigue. They were commanded by two brave and skilful leaders —the chivalric Randolph and the fierce Douglas. Froissart, the pleasing French chronicler, who lived at that time, and wrote a romantic, but excellent, history of it, gives a curious account of the Scots, which will be read with interest, because it shows their simple manner of living at that period. He says—"The Scots are bold, hardy, and much inured to war. When they make their invasions into England, they march from twenty to twenty-four leagues without halting, as well by night as day; for they are all on horseback, except the camp-followers, who are on foot. The knights and esquires are well mounted on large bay horses; the common people on little galloways. They bring no carriages with them, on account of the mountains they have to pass in Northumberland; neither do they carry with them any provisions of bread or wine; for their habits of sobriety are such, in time of war, they will live a long time on flesh half-sodden, without bread, and drink the river water without wine. They have, therefore, no occasion for pots or pans; for they dress the food of their cattle in the skins after they have taken them off: and, being sure to find plenty of them in the country which they invade, they carry none with them. Under the flaps of his saddle, each man carries a broad plate of metal; behind the saddle a little bag of oatmeal. When they have eaten too much of the sodden flesh, and their stomach appears weak and empty, they place this plate over the fire, mix with water their oatmeal, and when the plate is heated, they put a little of the paste upon it, and make a thin cake, like a cracknel or biscuit, which they eat to warm their stomachs; it is, therefore, no wonder that they perform a longer day's march than other soldiers."

While the English army was assembling, the Scots crossed the river Tweed; and, bursting into the northern counties, ravaged Northumberland and Durham, and even marched into Yorkshire, razing every town and village they passed, and driving away all the cattle they met with. Burning with rage, the English army went in pursuit of the invaders; but the Scots had no desire to enter into conflict with an enemy of such superior power, and they retired to their wild glens and mountains. Edward's troops marched after the enemy for three days without discovering them; then they encamped on the north of the river Tyne, and waited eight days more, thinking that they should meet the Scots returning to their own country, and be able to punish them for their savage inroads into England. All this time it rained in torrents; and the soldiers, who had a small supply of not very wholesome food, began to be gloomy and discontented. They did not mind fighting, but starving was a very different matter; and the ceaseless, pelting rain, during the bitter month of February, made them feel very despondent. Edward, seeing the courage of his soldiers ebbing gradually away, offered a reward of £100 a year, and the honour of knighthood, to any one who could show him where his enemies were hidden. Many English knights and squires were bold enough to ride off on the dangerous task of finding where the Scottish army lay; and at length one of them, named Thomas de Rokeby, came riding breathless to the young king, and told him that the Scots were encamped not far off, behind a hill near the river Wear. He had been taken prisoner by the Scotch advanced guard, and carried before Randolph and Douglas. Those chiefs no sooner heard the objects of the prisoner than they set him at liberty, that he might carry to Edward the intelligence he was so anxious to receive.

Instantly all was in motion in the English camp; the army commenced its march, and soon came in sight of the enemy. But the Scots were in an admirable position, surrounded on all sides by natural defences, and with the river, swollen by long-continued rains, flowing rapidly in front of them. Finding it useless to attack them, Edward challenged his foes to come over and fight him; the Scots answered, that they should do no such thing—that they intended to remain encamped there just as long as they chose; and that if the King of England was displeased at their being there, he was quite at liberty to cross the river and drive them away, if he could. For three days did the two armies remain opposite each other, with the broad stream only between them; and then the Scots suddenly decamped during the night.

They did not, however, go far, only changing their position for a still better one higher up the banks, in a wood, called Stanhope Park. There the English followed them, and again the two armies encamped on the opposite sides of the river. Eighteen days were consumed in the uninteresting occupation of looking at each other over the water, and then the Scots once more stole away in the night, so silently, and in such good order, that they left no trace of where they were gone to. But before they fled, they performed one bold and startling deed, which might have ended young Edward's wars for ever. One dark night Douglas quietly crossed the river, followed by 500 Scottish horsemen, and made an unexpected and furious attack upon the English. Suddenly aroused from their sleep, the latter were incapable of making much resistance; 300 of them perished beneath the weapons of their enemies, who even reached the tent of the young king, and cut the ropes which sustained it. The object of Douglas was to capture or kill the English sovereign; and he might have succeeded, but for the bravery of Edward's chaplain and some other of his attendants, who sacrificed their lives to save his. Douglas then found himself in great danger, but he fought through the crowds of English who surrounded him, and, dashing his spurs into his steed, plunged into the river, followed by his companions, who, nearly all of them, succeeded in returning to their camp.

Immediately after his arrival, and before the night had passed away, the Scots fled. In the night, and when Edward found that, after all his toil, they had escaped him; he was so vexed that he burst into tears. His army was in a wretched condition from sickness and want of food, and a great number of the horses were dead. In this state of things it was agreed by the English leaders, that it would be folly to pursue their light-footed enemy any further; so Edward returned, humbled and melancholy enough, to York, and the army was disbanded. Commissioners soon arrived in the Scottish camp, sent by Isabella and Mortimer to treat for peace. A truce was entered into, to continue from November 23rd, 1327, to March 22nd, 1328; and a parliament was summoned, to meet on the 12th of the latter month. It assembled at York; and agreed to recognise Scotland as a free and independent kingdom. A deed was drawn up, in which Edward was made to say, that he gave up that kingdom "for ever to the magnificent prince and Lord Robert, by the grace of God, the illustrious King of Scots, our ally and dear friend, and to his heirs and successors, free, entire, and unmolested, separated from the kingdom of England by its respective marches, as in the time of Alexander, King of Scotland, of good memory, of late deceased, without any subjection, servitude, claim, or demand whatsoever." This point conceded, there was no difficulty with the Scots. The peace was concluded at Edinburgh, on the 17th of March, 1328; and confirmed on the part of the English government, by a parliament that met at Northampton on the 4th of May. To render this peace more secure, it was agreed that Edward's sister, Joanna, should be married to Bruce's son, David. The English princess was only seven years old, and the Scotch prince but five; but, notwithstanding this, they were married immediately, and the little bride was called, by the Scotch people, "Joan Makepeace."

On the 7th of June in the following year (1329), the brave Robert Bruce sank into his grave, at the age of fifty-five. He was one of the greatest kings that ever wore the crown of Scotland; and his life had been so crowded with adventures, that it reads more like a romance than a true and sober history. He was a tall and strongly made man, with curly hair, a low forehead, and high cheek-bones; but his face wore an expression of cheerfulness and pleasantry, and his manner to his friends and subjects was kind and generous. He died at Cadross; and, with his last breath, entreated his courtiers to send his heart to the Holy Land, and to seat his infant son David on the throne of Scotland. His body was buried in the abbey church of Dunfermline; and his old friend and companion-in-arms, Sir James Douglas, undertook to carry his heart to the Holy Land. That brave man being killed by the Moors at Grenada, the heart of Bruce, which had been enclosed in a magnificent casket, was brought back to Scotland, and placed, as a sacred relic of the hero, in the church of Melrose.

The treaty of peace with Scotland was not completed before the young King of England, though but in his seventeenth year, married Philippa, daughter of the Count of Flanders. The wedding took place at York, on the 24th of January, 1328. The young lady proved an affectionate and admirable wife, and retained her husband's affection until the time of her death, which happened about forty years afterwards.

All this time the Lord Mortimer had been conducting himself in an insolent and haughty manner, and increasing the dislike felt towards him both by the nobles and the people. Confident in the favour of the queen-mother, he grasped almost all the authority of the crown, and lived in a state of royal magnificence. At length the powerful Earl of Lancaster attempted to humble him; and in this he was aided by the uncles of the king, the Earls of Kent and Norfolk. Their efforts failed, and Lancaster was compelled to beg the pardon of the favourite. It was now Mortimer's turn; and he determined to intimidate his enemies by making an example of one of the most distinguished of them. The simplicity of the Earl of Kent, the king's uncle, pointed him out as the fittest and easiest victim. Some crafty agents of Mortimer spread a report that the late king, Edward II., was still alive, and confined in Corfe Castle. The earl believed this strange statement; and some monks, who were in the plot, persuaded him that it was his duty to attempt to restore his injured brother to the throne. They were so successful, that the earl was cajoled into writing a letter to the dead king, promising to undertake his cause. This letter was placed in the hands of Mortimer, who instantly caused the earl to be arrested as a traitor. The letter was undoubtedly a treasonable one, as it bound the writer to attempt to depose his nephew, the king; and the foolish nobleman was tried by parliament, and condemned to perish on the scaffold. It was supposed, that, on account of his high rank and relationship to the king, this sentence would not be executed; but Mortimer was resolute, and Edward did not interfere, so the earl was beheaded at Winchester, on the 19th of March, 1330. He was so pitied by the people, that for some time no one could be found to perform the office of headsman: for four hours the wretched man was kept in an awful suspense; but at last a convicted criminal struck off the head of the earl on condition of himself receiving a pardon for his crimes. Thus another son of the great Edward I. met a violent and ignominious death.

Soon after this event the young king became a father, his queen, Philippa, presenting him a son, who was also christened Edward, and became very famous in after-times, when he was known as the heroic Edward the Black Prince. Probably this circumstance roused the mind of the youthful sovereign. Though but eighteen, he was a husband and a father, and he resolved to trample down the usurped authority of Mortimer, and be a king in fact as well as in name. This was no easy task, for he was surrounded by the spies of that arrogant courtier, who lived in the strong castle of Nottingham, and never travelled without a numerous guard. But young Edward was wise and cautious, and he arranged his plan with great care. Having told it to Lord Montacute, that nobleman instantly undertook to assist him; and, by bribing the governor of the castle, obtained information that there was a secret subterraneous passage, which could be entered by a hole in the castle hill, and would lead them into the interior of the fortress. Mortimer suspected some design against him, and caused the castle gates to be locked every night, and an armed watch always kept. He could not refuse Edward admission, but he only permitted him to bring a few attendants with him.

It was dark midnight, in the month of November, 1330, when Lord Montacute, with several other nobles, and a large party of followers, tore aside the brambles and weeds which concealed the hole in the hill-side, and groped their way in silence, and almost in darkness, through the long vault, until they came to a flight of stone steps, which led up into the castle. There they beheld the king, who had been anxiously waiting for their approach: making a sign to them to be cautious, he led the way to a dark room, from which they could hear the voices of Mortimer and his friends, in an adjoining apartment, in debate. Suddenly the king and his associates rushed into the room; two knights who opposed them were killed on the spot; and Mortimer was made a prisoner. The queen-mother, hearing the struggle, rushed from her bed, and implored her son to spare her lover, whom she called her dearest friend, the gentle Mortimer. With a stern look, Edward turned from his unworthy mother, and her arrogant favourite was dragged away.

The very next day a parliament was summoned for his trial, and the fallen courtier was charged with several crimes, the chief of which were, his having caused the murder of the late king, procured the unjust condemnation of the Earl of Kent, and usurped the authority of the council of regency. His guilt could not be denied; and his peers condemned him to an ignominious death, as a traitor and murderer. He was hanged at the Elms, in Smithfield, on the 29th of November, much to the joy of the whole people. Edward's guilty mother was deprived of her great income, and confined in her own mansion at Risings. She lived there in obscurity until her death, which happened seven-and-twenty years afterwards; her son paid her a visit once a year, but never restored her to any favour or authority.—Edward was now, for the first time, really King of England, and he soon showed that he possessed the requisite abilities for governing. His first acts were to redress all the evils which had proceeded from so long an abuse of the royal authority, and to exterminate the gangs of thieves and murderers with which the country was overrun. These ruffians were so numerous that it frequently required a military force to subdue them; but by Edward's activity the land was soon in a state of comparative safety. The example of a king, whether for good or for evil, is sure to be followed; so the efforts of the monarch were soon rigidly seconded by his officers of justice.

Though Scotland had recovered its national independence, its troubles were far from being over. It might be fancied that both the Scotch and English had sufficient of war and slaughter; that they had learnt to respect each other's strength and bravery, and wished to live in peace, that they might rebuild their burnt towns and villages, and cultivate their blighted and ruined fields. But men in those times were like the surly mastiff in the well-known fable, who loved fighting better than his food: to their fierce minds, a battle-field, strewn with the mangled bodies of their enemies, was a more welcome sight than a rich corn-field nodding in the summer breeze, while awaiting the sickle of the husbandman, or a broad green tract of pasture cropped by flocks of fleecy sheep, or herds of cattle. But in the wars and distresses which followed, it was England, and not Scotland, which was the aggressor; and the third Edward became almost as great a scourge to the land of floods and mountains as the first had been.

By the treaty of peace entered into with Scotland in 1328, it was agreed that all English nobles who had possessed estates in that country before the successes of the great Robert Bruce, should be restored to them. That patriotic king was succeeded by his son David, now nine years old, who was either unwilling or unable to restore all the lands claimed by the English; and two powerful barons, Thomas Lord Wake and Henry de Beaumont, determined, in revenge, to attempt to dethrone David Bruce, and put the obscure and almost forgotten Edward Baliol, the son of John Baliol, in his place. Knowing how much he was disliked by his countrymen, Edward had long since resigned all pretensions to royalty, and lived as a private man. The Lords Wake and Beaumont aroused his ambition; and Baliol, raising his standard in Normandy, where he then lived, was joined by a number of greedy, disappointed English, and rebellious, discontented Scots. These conspirators against the happiness and prosperity of Scotland then applied to King Edward for assistance; but as he had sworn to a peace, and the little queen of that country was his own sister, he refused all open and avowed aid; but secretly encouraged Baliol and his English associates. This was unjust, and an act of bad faith; but Edward was not destitute of ambition, and was beginning to feel those great abilities for war and conquest for which he soon afterwards became so famous.

Landing in Scotland with an army of less than 3,000 men, Baliol and his friends attacked a royal army which was sent to oppose them, and obtained a victory which seemed almost miraculous. It took place at Duplin Moor; and Baliol, who fell upon his foes during the night, while they were sleeping in fancied security, killed as many as 13,000 of them, while he himself lost only a few men. Some writers of the time say, that in parts of the field the bodies of the dead lay so thick that they formed a mass as deep as the length of a spear. Baliol soon after obtained another great success: the friends of David Bruce, in alarm, sent him and his little betrothed queen to France for safety; and the usurper, marching to Scone, was there [A.D. 1322] crowned King of Scotland. This was a wonderfully rapid revolution, even for those days of violence and sudden change.

The triumph of Baliol was viewed with sorrow by the whole Scottish nation; and the mushroom king, knowing he could not maintain his position without the assistance of Edward, formally surrendered the independence of the country into the hands of the English monarch. Though defeated for a time, the Bruce party soon made head; and one night Baliol was attacked, and compelled to fly for his life: leaping from his bed, he galloped away in his night-dress, and escaped to England, where he was kindly received by its ambitious king. England then declared war against Scotland, urging, as an excuse, that the Scots had broken the treaty by their predatory excursions into England. Collecting a large army, he crossed the borders in the month of May, 1333, and encamped before the town of Berwick. He was still very young for a statesman and a warrior, being then scarcely one-and-twenty; but he was brave and wise for his years, for the chequered events of his life had given him a knowledge of the world which very few at his age possess.

Edward was opposed at Berwick by a Scottish army, under the command of Lord Archibald Douglas, and a battle between the two armies took place on the 19th of July, on a hill near the town, called Halidon Hill. The Scots, being eager for the contest, hurried forward, and got upon a plot of soft marshy ground, where their feet sank into the mire, and they soon fell into confusion. In this condition they were exposed to vast flights of arrows from the English bowmen. Those arrows, says an old chronicler, flew as thick as motes in the sunbeams, and many thousand Scotch soldiers fell dead in consequence. At last, the Scots got upon firm ground, and rushed passionately up the hill, to be revenged of their enemies. But passion is a bad substitute for judgment; they were received with a resolute coolness, repulsed with great loss, and soon defeated with terrible slaughter: 14,000 Scots, besides many of the nobility of that country, were left dead upon the field. On the other side the loss was incredibly trifling; it is very difficult to believe that only fifteen Englishmen were killed. It was long since Scotland experienced so sad a misfortune as the defeat at Halidon Hill.

Once more was Baliol forced as king upon an unwilling people, and he rewarded the services of Edward by again professing himself a vassal of the English crown, and surrendering to that monarch a large part of Scotland. The hardy, liberty-loving Scots would not submit to have their country divided in that manner, and themselves disposed of as if they had been so many herds of cattle; therefore, as soon as King Edward had returned into his own land, they rose in rebellion against Baliol, who was so alarmed that he fled to England to seek again the protection of his master.

Again did Edward place his creature upon the Scottish throne; and three times after that did he lead an army into that unhappy country to assist in keeping him there. The Scots were compelled to submit to a superior force; but Baliol was despised and hated, and lived amongst them rather like a fugitive than a king. At last Edward's attention was withdrawn from Scotland, and his mind filled with another scheme of conquest—a scheme so ambitious, vast, and romantic, that it resembles a feverish dream—a scheme which was to cost the lives of hundreds of thousands of men, and plant between two great nations an enmity so fierce and bitter, that to this day it can scarcely be said to be thoroughly extinguished. This subject had better be commenced in a new chapter; in which, leaving the picturesque mountains and glens of Scotland, attention will be directed to the more fertile and sunny plains of France.

CHAPTER XXVII.

CONTINUATION OF THE REIGN OF EDWARD THE THIRD.—A.D. 1337–1348.

KING EDWARD'S intention was to lay claim to the crown of France, upon the following grounds:—The King of France, called Philip le Bel, or the Fair, who reigned from A.D. 1285 to A.D. 1314, when he died, left three sons and one daughter. The daughter was the beautiful but cruel Isabella, who became the queen of our English king, Edward II., and mother of Edward III. The sons, Louis, Philip, and Charles, succeeded each other as Kings of France; but, what was remarkable, though each of them left daughters, neither of them had a son to succeed them. The daughters were all set aside on account of an old law, called the Salic Law, by which no female was permitted to wear the crown of France; under these circumstances it descended to Philip de Valois, the son of Charles de Valois, the brother of Philip the Fair, who was cousin-german to the last king. That prince ascended the throne with the united consent of the prelates, peers, and people of the kingdom; and every nation throughout Europe recognised him as possessing a just and indisputable title.

Edward had acknowledged Philip's title by the fact of doing homage to him, as King of France, for the dukedom of Guienne, because at that time he was not strong enough to declare and enforce the claim which he secretly entertained. Philip de Valois—or to speak of him according to his title as King of France, Philip VI.—had ruled that country for nine years, when, in 1337, Edward put forth his claim to the regal diadem. He contended that his mother Isabella's right superseded that of Philip; and although he was compelled to acknowledge that she, being a woman, could not legally wear the crown of France, he asserted, that he, to whom her right descended, being a man, could do so. Thus he insisted that he inherited, through his mother, a property which she herself had never possessed.

If the Salic law, whilst it excluded the female herself, had permitted her son to ascend the throne, still Edward was not the rightful heir; as Louis, the eldest son of Philip the Fair, left a daughter, who married the King of Navarre; and their son, Charles of Navarre, would, in that case, have been the next in succession. However, Edward put forward his claim, and was determined to maintain it. Irrespective of this claim to the throne, there were other causes of quarrel between Edward III. and Philip VI. The latter gave offence to the former on the question of Guienne; he had, also, received and protected young David Bruce, and was secretly giving assistance to the Scots, to enable them to continue the struggle against England. On the other hand, Edward had welcomed Robert d'Artois, a powerful but exiled French noble, who had attempted the life of his sovereign. This man, although Philip's brother-in-law, hated him very bitterly, on account of an injustice which he had experienced at his hands; and he now endeavoured to revive in Edward his claim to the French throne, and flattered him by saying that a prince of his great courage and abilities would very properly succeed in obtaining it. Philip sent a haughty message to Edward, desiring him instantly to dismiss Robert from his court, and declaring that if he did not, Guienne should be seized by the French arms. Edward replied by demanding the crown of France as his indisputable right, and collecting an army to obtain it. This demand was made for Edward on the 7th of October, 1337, by the Earl of Brabant, whom he had induced to support his cause.

The idea of a war with France was very popular with the English people, and they readily assisted their king with large contributions. Edward himself did his utmost; and after collecting money in every just way, and by many unjust ones, he even pawned the jewels of his crown. Sensible that he had a powerful enemy to contend against, he also entered into several foreign alliances against France, and particularly courted the governor and people of Flanders. The latter country was at that time governed by a famous brewer, named James von Artaveldt, who had, in 1336, expelled the earl, and ruled with much strictness and wisdom; it was by his advice that, at a later period, Edward assumed the title of King of France, and quartered the French lilies in his arms.

In July, 1338, Edward, and his army of 50,000 men, sailed from the Orwell. They landed at Antwerp. Proceeding to Flanders, he remained there for some months, and soon found that his allies were not so active as himself. Nothing was done until late in the next year, when Edward entered France, and having burnt some towns and villages, and ruined a number of unoffending people, was compelled to retire and return to England. During this rather disgraceful campaign, the French and English armies had faced each other; but although Philip had 100,000 men, while Edward had only 50,000, yet they seemed mutually afraid, and separated without a battle.

The English people looked a little serious; they had already been enormously taxed, without producing any result; but they submitted to new levies, and in the next year (1340) Edward was again ready for war. King Philip, expecting another invasion, had fitted out a fleet of no less than 400 vessels, and stationed them at Sluys, to intercept the English expedition upon the sea. Hearing of this, Edward sailed out with a fleet of 240 ships, and, on the 24th of June, came in sight of the French. When he beheld them, he exclaimed—"Ha! I have long desired to fight with the Frenchmen, and now I shall fight with some of them, by the grace of God and St. George." The English seamen contrived to get the wind of the enemy, and also to have the sun at their backs; and, with these great advantages in their favour, the battle began. For some time it raged with great fury; and the vessels were grappled so closely together, that the men fought hand to hand, as if they had been on shore. Edward himself acted with great courage and energy, and his example animated his soldiers and sailors in a remarkable degree. In the end the English gained a decided victory; 230 French ships were taken or burnt, and 15,000 (some say 30,000) Frenchmen killed or drowned. For some time no one dared to tell Philip of this heavy misfortune; at last his fool undertook to break the news. "The English are but cowards," said the jester. "How so?" inquired his sovereign. "Because they had not courage to leap into the sea, like the French and Normans at Sluys," was the reply. The countenance of Philip fell; he understood that his fleet was vanquished and destroyed.

Edward's foreign allies now crowded round his standard, and an enormous army followed him into France; but again nothing of any importance was done. Edward sent a herald to Philip, and challenged him to decide their respective claims to the crown of France by single combat. Philip replied, that the terms of the duel were unequal, but that if Edward would increase the stake, and put the kingdom of England also on the issue, he would accept it. It is most probable that neither of the kings intended to risk their own lives in a personal contest, and that they only sought, by idle bravado, to obtain popularity with their subjects. Before any hostile movement was made, Edward was again deserted by his foreign allies; and he began to see that their object was rather to assist themselves to his money than to assist him in his war. He also suspected that he had been imprudent enough to undertake a design which he was not able to accomplish; and therefore, when the aged Countess of Hainault, who was related to both Edward and Philip, endeavoured to bring about a truce between them, he was not sorry to consent to it. Again he returned to England in a very ill-temper, and was only saved from disgrace by the victory of Sluys.

Edward's want of success abroad was followed by some troubles in his own kingdom, and he incurred great unpopularity by a foolish attempt to wreak his disappointment on his own subjects at home. Soon after his arrival he visited the Tower of London, and finding it carelessly guarded, threw the governor, and all officers who had charge of it, into prison. The next day he removed the chancellor, treasurer, and Master of the Rolls; imprisoned some of the judges, arrested many of those servants of the crown who had been employed in collecting the revenue, and appointed commissioners to inquire into their conduct. Even the Archbishop of Canterbury fell under the displeasure of the king, who accused him of having used, for other purposes, money which had been voted by parliament for the use of the sovereign. But the archbishop was not the sort of man to be intimidated; he not only defended himself from the charge brought against him, but appealed to the Great Charter, and pronounced a sentence of excommunication against all who exercised violence on the persons or goods of any clergymen. This excommunication was, in reality, aimed at the king; for both the chancellor and the treasurer, whom he had so rudely displaced, were bishops. The bold head of the church even went so far as to send a letter to Edward, in which he told him that the clergy had even cited emperors before their tribunal, and sat in judgment on their life and behaviour.

This letter put Edward into a furious passion; and when, shortly afterwards, he summoned a parliament, he would not invite the archbishop to attend it. But that prelate, arrayed in his pontifical robes, and attended by a numerous procession of priests, presented himself, and demanded entrance as the first peer of the land. For two days Edward would not consent to his admission: but at length he had the sense to yield, and the archbishop took his seat.

Edward had yet another humiliation to encounter; for the parliament refused to vote him any supplies until he granted them very extensive reforms and concessions. His poverty compelled him to accede to their demands; but he is said to have had the dishonesty to make a secret protest, that, as soon as he was able, he would revoke all that been extorted from him. If he did make such a protest in secret, it is difficult to imagine how it became known.

A year had not passed since Edward had abandoned France, and entered into a truce with the king of that country, before he was again in arms against it. A dispute having arisen between two nobles—John de Montfort and Charles de Blois—as to which of them had the best right to the dukedom of Brittany, they both appealed to the French king for his judgment in the case. That monarch decided in favour of Charles de Blois, in consequence of which De Montfort fled to England, implored Edward's assistance, and did homage for his duchy to him, as the lawful King of France. On his return to Brittany, De Montfort was taken prisoner by Philip, who shut him up in the tower of the Louvre; but his wife, the Countess de Montfort, was a beautiful, spirited, and very courageous woman. Her husband had held possession of Brittany; and she, after riding from town to town, and imploring the inhabitants to support her cause, shut herself up in the strongly-fortified castle of Hennebon, and awaited the troops which King Edward had promised to send from England to her assistance.

At Hennebon she was besieged by a French army, under the command of her husband's rival, Charles de Blois. But this remarkable woman showed no fear; and although the attack was conducted with great spirit, she so encouraged the town and garrison, that the besiegers were driven back in every assault they made. The countess rode about encouraging the soldiers; showed herself upon the ramparts, despite of the arrows of the enemy; and sometimes sallied out against them at the head of a party of troops. So cheering an example could not be resisted; and every one fought their bravest, and tried to emulate the deeds of their bold and beautiful chieftainess. One day, while standing upon a lofty tower, to watch the progress of an attack, she observed that the enemy had brought up all their forces, and left their camp unguarded. Descending from her position, she sallied out at the head of 300 knights; fell, unperceived, upon her enemy's camp; set fire to the tents; threw her foes into confusion; and thus drew them away from the assault upon the town.* After this exploit she would have returned, but a large body of troops had thrown themselves between her and the gates. Clapping spurs to their horses, she and her friends rode for their lives, and took refuge in Aubrey Castle. After five days, the bold countess reappeared with 500 or 600 knights, instead of 300, and, dashing unexpectedly through the enemy's camp, re-entered Hennebon amidst the welcoming shouts of her people.

At length the besiegers had made several breaches in the walls of the stout old castle, and a want of provisions was also felt. The English succours did not arrive; and the people's hearts began to fail. Much against the wishes of the countess, a treaty was entered into with the enemy to settle the terms of a surrender. Mounting to her lofty tower, that unconquerable woman cast many longing glances towards the sea; and at last, to her great joy, she beheld some sails in the distance. Transported with delight, she called to her soldiers—"Behold the succours!—the English!—I see the English coming!—No capitulation." She was right, and in a few hours an English fleet sailed proudly into the port, under the command of Sir Walter Manny, a brave and skilful soldier. Thus assisted, the countess and her little army sallied out, encountered the besiegers, and compelled them to retire.

Still the war continued; and some months afterwards (in 1342), Hennebon was again attacked by Charles de Blois and a French army. The countess then went to England, and applied personally to Edward, who lent her the assistance of forty-five vessels, under the command of Robert d'Artois. This English force was met by a French fleet near Guernsey, and a battle ensued, in which our countrymen suffered some loss, and the contending parties were in the end separated by a storm. The English fleet arrived safely in Brittany, where Robert d'Artois and his soldiers captured the town of Vannes; but it was shortly after recaptured by the enemy, and Robert died in consequence of a wound he had received in the contest. Thus the countess was compelled to return to Hennebon, and affairs stood much as they did at first.

The truce having ended, Edward himself led an army to Brittany. At first he was successful, and accomplished several little triumphs over the French arms. But the winter set in; his army was in want of provisions, and opposed to a very superior force, so that when the pope interfered as a peace-maker, Edward was again glad to conclude a truce. By this truce, which was to last for three years, it was arranged that the Countess de Montfort and Charles de Blois should each keep what towns they possessed in Brittany, and that hostilities should cease between France and England.

It was, however, impossible to subdue the ill-feeling which had arisen between both the sovereigns and the people of the two nations: the truce was never fairly observed; and no sooner had it expired, than both parties prepared for war. Immense taxes were laid upon both the English and French people to enable their rulers to carry an this useless and wasteful struggle. Amongst other things Philip put a heavy tax on salt, upon which Edward sarcastically observed, that now his rival indeed reigned by salic law. The English king's revenues were chiefly derived from wool; so Philip retorted by calling him a wool-merchant. This attempted smartness was as poor and unsuccessful on both sides as their military exploits had hitherto been. Now, however, the war was to be carried on in a more vigorous and brilliant manner. Edward, in the year 1345, sent the Earl of Derby with an army to Guienne, where the French had seized many of his towns. This nobleman's efforts were attended with astonishing success; he defeated the French in a battle near Auberoche, took fortress after fortress, and finally drove his enemies from Guienne.

The following year, 1346, Edward himself again sailed over to France with an army of 30,000 men, and landed at La Hogue in Normandy. He had brought his eldest son, the Prince of Wales, with him, and the flower of the English nobility. After destroying all the ships he found in the ports of La Hogue, Barfleur, and Cherbourg, he ravaged the country, took and pillaged several towns, and among them the rich and populous city of Caen. Then he marched away to Rouen, hoping to serve that in the same manner; but when he came to the banks of the Seine he found that the bridge was broken down, and the French king, with an army much larger than his own, on the opposite side of the river. Unable to cross, Edward marched along the banks towards Paris, burning every town and village he met on his way. But the English king was by no means easy in his mind, or satisfied with his position, for the French were enclosing him round in all directions, in the hope of either starving him and his army, or cutting them to pieces. The French army amounted to 100,000 men, while the English had but 30,000, so that the chances were immensely in favour of the former.

By a clever scheme Edward managed to lead his troops across the river Seine at Poissy, and marched rapidly on, still plundering and burning, until he came to another river, the Somme. Again was his crossing opposed by Philip and the French army, and the danger of the English was immense. Collecting his prisoners, Edward offered liberty and a rich reward to any of them who would show him some shallow part of the river where he, his soldiers, and their baggage, could cross with safety. A countryman, whose name was Gobin Agace, betrayed the interests of his country, and told the English king that there was a place not far off called Blanche-Taque, or the White Spot, at which he could cross the river during the low tide. At midnight the army was on its march; and as the early rays began to tint the horizon, Edward and his soldiers stood on the river's bank at Blanche-Taque. But here they experienced a sad disappointment; not only was it high tide, but a numerous French army was encamped on the opposite bank. This was a trying moment for the English; Philip and a French army was behind them, the river and another French army was before. Had Philip overtaken them they would have been enclosed between two opposing and greatly superior armies, and, in such a condition, their destruction would have been almost certain.

Anxiously did Edward watch the slow receding tide, fearing that, in a few hours, its stream would be stained and swollen by torrents of English blood. At length the water had ebbed sufficiently to admit of a passage; the king gave the command, and, with a cry of "God and St. George!" his troops dashed into the river. The French cavalry on the opposite bank did the same; and a fierce conflict took place in the bed of the stream. Flights of arrows, also, from the opposite bank galled the English dreadfully; and many who had rushed so bravely into the water, full of strength and hope, dropped in its now turbid channel never to rise again. But Edward's troops were successful: they forced their passage across the river, dispersed their foes, and encamped in the meadows just as Philip and his army appeared on the side which they had so recently quitted. By this time the tide was rising; therefore, before Philip could get at the English, he was forced to make a circuit, and cross the river by the bridge of Abbeville.

Encouraged by the result of the little battle of Blanche-Taque, tired, and perhaps, also, ashamed of retreating even before an army many times more numerous than his own, Edward halted on a gentle ascent near the village of Crecy, or Cressy, and prepared for an engagement. His army he placed in three divisions: the first he entrusted to the command of his son, the Prince of Wales; the second to the Earls of Arundel and Northampton; while the third he headed in person. The night before the battle the king gave a supper to his nobles and chief officers, and was very affable and cheerful; after which he entered his oratory, and spent some time in prayer. The next morning he rode about among his soldiers, talking to them in an earnest and eloquent manner. He said that the honour of England was in their hands; that destruction awaited them if they relied upon anything but their own strength and courage; that they always, hitherto, maintained a superiority over the French troops; and that the greater number of the army then opposed to them was counterbalanced by the excellence of the position in which they were placed. He added, that he demanded nothing but that they would imitate his example and that of his son; that the lives, honour, and liberty of all were exposed to the same danger; and that he was confident they would unite in one great effort to extricate themselves from their present difficulties, and to obtain a glorious victory.

Philip and his army had marched hastily from Abbeville, and it was three o'clock in the afternoon of the 26th of August when they came in sight of the English. His soldiers, therefore, were too fatigued to fight well that day; and, on the advice of one of his captains, the French monarch determined to put off the battle until the following one. A command was given for the army to halt; but many of the French nobles were so impatient, that they still pressed forward until they faced the enemy. Then they halted suddenly; and those behind, still pressing onward, were thrown into confusion. Philip himself was carried along by the vast moving stream of soldiers; and when he saw the order and calm resolution in the ranks and faces of the English, he became so excited as to lose all judgment, and with a loud voice he called out, "Order the Genoese forward, and begin the battle in the name of God and St. Denis!" There were 15,000 of these Genoese, brave and skilful cross-bowmen; but they complained at being brought into action while they were so overcome by fatigue. Philip's brother, the Earl of Alençon, then exclaimed, "This is what one gets by employing such scoundrels, who fall off when there is any need of them."

Stung by this insulting remark, the Genoese advanced to the attack; but their hearts were no longer with their employers. Shortly before the battle there had been an eclipse of the sun, and a great flight of crows hovered in the air, cawing over both armies; then came a terrific thunderstorm and floods of rain, which relaxed the strings of the Genoese cross-bows, so that, when the weather cleared up and the battle began, their shafts fell short of their aim. Under these circumstances, it is no wonder that the Genoese staggered before the flights of arrows which the English archers shot in clouds among them. First they hesitated, and then, seized with panic, fell into disorder, upon which the French king, mad with passion, exclaimed, "Kill me those scoundrels; for they stop up our road without any reason." This savage order was partly obeyed; his horsemen fell upon the Genoese, put many of them to the sword, and nothing but terror and confusion reigned in the vast army of France.

The young Prince of Wales, taking advantage of this wild scene, led his division on to the charge; but the French cavalry, by desperate efforts, began to disentangle themselves from the crowd, and recovering their order, the prince was hemmed round by superior numbers. The battle now raged furiously, and young Edward was in great danger of perishing. His father, who commanded the reserve division, had not joined in the conflict, but calmly viewed it from a windmill on the summit of a neighbouring hill. The Earl of Warwick, who fought with the prince, sent a messenger to the king to beg assistance. The self-possessed monarch enquired if his son was killed or wounded? "No, sire, please God," was the reply, "but he is hard beset." "Then," said the king proudly, "return to those who sent you, and tell them that they shall have no help from me. Let the boy win his spurs; for I am resolved, if it please God, that this day be his, and that the honour of it be given all to him and to those to whose care I have entrusted him." This spirited answer gave such encouragement to the prince and his fellow-warriors, that they fought with renewed vigour, and at length repulsed and scattered the host by which they had been environed.

Still the battle raged on; but it was evident that, in spite of the immense numbers of the French, they were losing the day. Wrought up to desperation, Philip himself fought with great valour, and many times rushed with his troops of horse upon the English lines. It was in vain; nothing could penetrate that dense little forest of glittering spears; the French king had his horse killed beneath him; and at length he was led off the field by an ally. His troops were flying in every direction, and were pursued and slaughtered without mercy, until the darkness of the night put an end to the carnage. Descending from his station on the hill, King Edward embraced and kissed his valiant son, and said to him, "My brave son! Persevere in your honourable course. You are my true and dear son, and have this day shown yourself worthy of a crown."—This famous conflict, so long celebrated as the battle of Crecy, took place on Saturday, the 26th of August, 1346. It is scarcely right to boast of success, however brilliant, in an unjust cause; but the coolness and intrepidity of the English troops upon this occasion certainly achieved a triumph almost miraculous.

The English lit great fires on the now almost silent field, and watched by them till the morning. Though a summer night, it was dark and starless, and blazing faggots threw a strange light upon the pallid faces and battered armour of the vast heaps of dead. The next day was Sunday: what a sight was there for the Sabbath sun to shine upon! But that day witnessed a scene of slaughter far less excusable than that of the day before. A large body of French soldiers, who arrived too late for the battle, were deceived by the English erecting some French standards; and when they had approached, without finding out their error, too near to be able to retreat, they were all mercilessly massacred. A second party of French was allured in like manner, and, after a brief fight, nearly all slain. In the two days 30,000 French soldiers perished, besides 1,200 knights, eighty nobles, and eleven princes. Among the latter was John de Luxembourg, the blind old King of Bohemia. Hearing that his son, whom he greatly loved, was wounded and not likely to live, the sorrow-stricken old man also wished to die. But he resolved first to raise his withered arm and strike one blow in revenge. Mounting his horse, he placed himself between two knights, and fastened his bridle on each side to theirs. In this manner the sightless, white-haired man rushed upon the ranks of the enemy, and perished fighting. His crest was three ostrich feathers, and beneath them the following motto:—"ICH DIEN;" that is, I serve. Whether from admiration of the fallen monarch, or because he thought them peculiarly applicable to himself, as serving in arms beneath so brave a father, is not known; but Prince Edward adopted this motto, and it has ever since been worn by the eldest son of the English sovereign.

Though he had obtained so great a victory, King Edward was not dazzled by his success; he was too prudent to suppose that because he had vanquished a French army he had conquered so powerful and extensive a country as France. Still, he proposed to secure an easy entrance to that kingdom; and marching away to the strongly fortified town of Calais, he encamped his troops around its walls, and commenced a siege. Aware of the great strength of the place, Edward would not throw away the lives of his soldiers in useless attacks; but he built a number of wooden huts around it, and resolved, by cutting off all supplies of provisions, to make the inhabitants yield from the effects of famine. John de Vienne, the governor, seeing King Edward's intention, collected together all the poor and feeble inhabitants, who had not laid up any stock of provisions, and drove them all out of the town. There were 1,700 of these poor wretches, the greater number of them being women and children. As they tremblingly approached the English camp, the soldiers in astonishment asked why they had left the town? They answered, they were driven out because they were poor, and had nothing to eat. On hearing this, Edward was touched with pity for the suffering he had caused, and ordered a good dinner and a piece of money to be given to each of these victims of his ambitious views.

David Bruce, the young King of Scotland, who had fled to the French court for protection against Edward, was now again seated on the throne of his native land, having returned home in 1342. Encouraged by the King of France, by the absence of Edward, by a desire of revenging the disgrace they had incurred at the battle of Halidon Hill, and by the love of plunder, the Scots resolved on an invasion of England. Collecting an army of about 50,000 men, David proceeded as far as Durham, committed the most frightful atrocities, and leaving the country they overran a smoking and dismal desert. The Scotch fancied that the whole chivalry of England was absent with King Edward at Calais, and they said in contempt, "that there were none but mean merchants and mechanics to stand between them and a march to London." But they were greatly deceived in the estimate of the English courage and resources; and, to their surprise, they were soon opposed by an army of 30,000 men. One old writer tells us that this force was headed by Philippa, Edward's queen, and that the brave woman rode about among the troops, and exhorted them to sustain the honour of the English arms. A battle took place between the two armies on the 17th of October, 1346, at a place called Neville's Cross, in which the Scots were defeated with terrible slaughter: 15,000 of them are said to have perished, and nearly all the principal nobility of Scotland were killed or taken prisoners. Among the latter was David, the young king. He had fought that day with wonderful bravery, and even seemed desirous of emulating the deeds of his heroic father; but his personal courage was useless against the attacks of the host of English which bore down upon him. After having been twice wounded, he was seized by a gentleman, named John Copland, who carried him off a captive, though not without losing two of his teeth by a blow in the face from a dagger. David was sent for safety to the Tower of London; but Copland would not at first surrender his distinguished prisoner to the queen, saying he owed no obedience except to his sovereign lord, the King of England. David remained for eleven years in England, and was then only released upon engaging to pay an enormous ransom. Edward, having the King of Scotland in his power, treated its people as a conquered nation. To this they would not submit; and, in 1355, they were again in arms against him.

The siege of Calais continued through the winter of 1346-'47. Philip advanced with an army to the relief of the town; but finding his road beset with difficulties, and not relishing another battle with Edward, he retired, and left the garrison and inhabitants to their fate. At first a few Norman ships supplied the townspeople with food; but Edward blocked up the port with an English fleet; and gaunt looks and pallid faces proclaimed that famine reigned within the walls. After the citizens had eaten all the horses and dogs in the town, the governor appeared on the fortifications, and desired a parley. Sir Walter Manny was sent by King Edward to hear what he had to say; and John de Vienne thus appealed to his feelings of honour and generosity:—"Brave knight, I have been entrusted by my sovereign with the command of this town: it is almost a year since you besieged me; and I and those under me have endeavoured to do our duty. But you are acquainted with our present condition: we have no hopes of relief—we are perishing with hunger; I am willing to surrender; and desire, as the sole condition, to ensure the lives and liberties of these brave men, who have so long shared with me every danger and fatigue."

When this proposition was reported to Edward, he treated it with stern disdain, and declared he would accept nothing but an unconditional surrender. Had this been yielded, it is probable that the town would have been given up to plunder, and its people put to the sword; for the English king was greatly incensed against them. But Sir Walter Manny, and other of Edward's chief officers, persuaded him to be more merciful to men, who, in resisting him so obstinately, had only done their duty. "Well," answered the English monarch, "I will not stand alone against you all. Six of the most notable burgesses must be delivered up to me, stripped to their shirts, with halters round their necks, and the keys of the town and castle in their hands. On these I will show my severity, and the rest I will pardon."

On hearing this decision, the people of Calais were filled with sorrow, and lamented their fate with tears. At length a generous and bold-hearted man, the richest merchant of the town, whose name was Eustace de St. Pierre, offered to be one of the six who must fall a sacrifice to save the lives of the rest. His noble example was immediately followed by five others; and these heroic men left the town with halters round their necks, according to the conditions, and prostrated themselves at the feet of King Edward, who, with a stern look, ordered them to instant execution. Many of his nobles and officers begged the king to be more merciful, and said that so cruel an action would tarnish the great reputation he had won. Still he was inflexible, until the Queen Philippa (who herself had carried to him the news of the battle of Neville's Cross), kneeling before him, said, with tears in her eyes, "Ah! gentle sire, since I have crossed the sea with great danger, I have never asked you anything; now I humbly pray, for the sake of the Son of the Holy Mary, and your love of me, that you will have mercy on these six men." Edward yielded to this appeal; and the kind-hearted queen ordered the halters to be taken from around the necks of the citizens, and suitable clothes and a dinner to be provided for them; after which, she dismissed each of them with a little present in money.

Then, on the 4th of August, 1347, Edward and his troops entered Calais in triumph, and took possession of the vanquished city. Knowing that he was both feared and hated by the French, he drove away most of the inhabitants from the town, and put his own English subjects in their places; by this means Calais remained for a length of time subject to the kings of England. The following year Edward entered into a truce with France, which lasted for six years. Before, however, it was concluded, the French had attempted to recover Calais, which they entirely failed to do. The incident is a romantic one. King Edward trusted an Italian, named Aimery de Pavie, who had served him with great courage, with the command of the town. This man consented, in consideration of receiving a bribe of 20,000 crowns, to betray the English by secretly admitting a French army within the walls. The treachery was discovered by Edward, who promised Pavie his life if he would turn the contrivance to the destruction of the enemy. The Italian consented; and, as he had failed in his attempt to betray the English, resolved to redeem his own worthless head by betraying the French. The king, who had returned to London, arrived on the 31st of December, 1348, secretly at Calais, with 900 picked men. The next day the French were to be admitted. They advanced; found all silent within the town, and suspected nothing. After paying the traitor his reward, the great gates were thrown open, and the French prepared to enter. Judge what was their surprise when Edward and his troops suddenly rushed out and attacked them with great fury. Though taken by surprise the French fought bravely, and were not defeated until after a severe conflict. The English king was disguised as a private man, and fought by the side of the captain of the body of troops that accompanied him. During the conflict, he noticed, with great admiration, the valour of a French gentleman, one Eustace de Ribaumont, and at length challenged him to personal combat. The challenge was accepted, and a fierce struggle began between them, in which the king was twice struck to the ground. Each time he instantly leapt to his feet, and the combatants seemed so equally matched, that victory inclined to neither. At length Ribaumont, being left almost alone by the retreat of his countrymen, yielded himself a prisoner to his unknown foe.

Edward was so pleased with his victory that he treated all the French officers who had been taken prisoners with great kindness, and invited them to a supper within the walls of Calais, with the Prince of Wales and many of the English nobility. During the evening he himself entered the room, and walking about among his captives, spoke to them familiarly. To Ribaumont he was particularly affable, saying that he had never been in so much danger as when he had fought with him; then taking a string of pearls from his neck, he placed it around that of the French knight, adding—"Sir Eustace, I bestow this present upon you as a testimony of my esteem for your bravery; and I desire you to wear it a year for my sake. Let all know from whose hand you received it. You are no longer a prisoner; I acquit you of your ransom; and you are at liberty to-morrow to dispose of yourself as you think proper."

After Edward's return to England he instituted a new order of knighthood, to bestow on such of the nobles as might render him any great service. During his reign the system of chivalry was in its glory, and every knight and noble prided himself on his dexterity in arms, and on the unsullied purity of his honour. Consequently no reward was more highly esteemed than being invested with the insignia of "The Order of the Garter;" which, from that time to the present, has consisted of five-and-twenty members, besides the sovereign. It was, therefore, exceedingly exclusive, and admission into it was esteemed an honour of the highest character. The first installation took place on the 30th of April, 1349. It is said that an amusing incident suggested to Edward the idea of the new class of knights. At a court ball he picked up a garter which had been accidentally dropped by a lady of rank, and observing some of his courtiers to smile, as if they thought it to be a token of gallantry, he exclaimed, "Honi soit qui mal y pense;" that is, "Evil be to him who evil thinks." He then instituted the Order of the Garter, and gave those words as its motto. It may be as well to remark, that up to this reign, and during the greater part of it, the kings, nobles, and gentry of England usually spoke in the French language. They had not yet so far forgotten their Norman extraction as to prefer the Saxon language to the French; but the fierce animosity which then prevailed between the two nations, arising out of the wars which Edward waged against France, led to a dislike both of the people and language of that country, and thus the Saxon speech of England once more resumed its sway, although greatly enriched by many words and graces which had been adopted into it from the French.

But festivities of all kinds were suddenly put an end to in England, and the sounds of rejoicing turned into tears and passionate lamentations. A cry of terror went throughout the land, and all its inhabitants were arrayed in the garb of mourning. A conqueror greater than any human king stalked over it, and hundreds of thousands fell before his invisible but unsparing arm. He had come from the vast and distant empire of China; swept in merciless triumph over the wilds of Tartary; passed, in his mysterious and desolating career, through the Levant, Egypt, Greece, Italy, Germany, and France; and, in the autumn of 1349, burst like a storm into England. In many countries a third of the population fell dead at his touch; and some writers tell us that half the inhabitants of England perished. London was like an enormous sepulchre; and for a time the greatest labour of the living was to bury the dead. Would you know the name of this grim, murderous visitor? It was the PLAGUE!

CHAPTER XXVIII.

CONCLUSION OF THE REIGN OF EDWARD THE THIRD.—A.D. 1349—1377.

THIS terrible calamity, which swept hundreds of thousands to a sudden and premature grave, helped greatly to prolong the truce between France and England; but it did not prevent a naval battle between the English and Spanish fleets from taking place in the following year. The Spaniards had helped the French, and plundered the trading vessels of England; and for this reason Edward determined to chastise them. For a time the affair was doubtful, and the king and his son were in great danger; but at length victory fell to the English, though not before they had experienced considerable loss.

For a period of six years peace reigned in England; during which, the people were recovering from the sad effects of the plague; but at the end of that time, the war between this country and France again broke out. Philip VI., the French king, was dead, and his honourable but unfortunate son John succeeded him. Edward had made offers of peace to this monarch, and promised to resign his claim to the French crown if the latter would consent to his retaining possession of Calais, Guienne, and certain other places formerly held by the English. The pride of the French would not permit their king to accept these conditions, so in the year 1355, Prince Edward entered the south of France with an extensive host, while his father led another army into the north of that kingdom. As France was agitated by severe quarrels at home, the prince was enabled to ravage the country without receiving any check. All the villages, and many of the towns of Languedoc, he left mere smoking ruins, making the land desolate as far as Toulouse; then turning to the south-east, he plundered and burnt the rich cities of Carcassonne and Narbonne. Having collected immense plunder, he returned in triumph, and took up his winter quarters in the English province of Guienne.

His father was not quite so successful; he advanced without opposition to St. Omer, where the King of France and his army were posted. King Edward had given his troops license to ravage, plunder, and burn as much as they pleased; but the poor inhabitants were beforehand with them, and, collecting all their valuables, had destroyed the rest of their property and fled. Edward challenged John to meet him in the field, and fight a battle; but although the French king had a numerous army, he declined this, and sent a challenge to Edward to meet in single combat. The English king treated this as an idle bravado; and, as the enemy would not fight, and the country was so bare that his soldiers had nothing to subsist upon, he was compelled to retire to Calais, from whence he was recalled to England by the information that the Scots, encouraged by his absence, were invading its northern counties.

Hurrying home, Edward entered Scotland at the head of an immense army, during the winter of 1355-'56. He had purchased Baliol's right (and worthless enough it was) to the throne of that country; and now, laying claim to Scotland by a double title—namely, the gift to him of the country by one of its rival kings, and the acknowledgment of his feudal sovereignty by the other—he resolved to overcome all opposition, and awe or crush the people into a passive submission to his authority. He encamped at Roxburgh; and being tricked by one of the Scottish leaders into a truce of ten days, during which time his countrymen were preparing for their defence, determined on a savage revenge. Ordering his army to advance, he burnt every town, village, church, and monastery within his march; and continued his horrible progress as far as Edinburgh, which also was committed to the flames. This fearful invasion was long remembered by the Scots as the "Burnt Candlemas." But Edward and his army soon felt the want of provisions; the country was so bare and desolate that it yielded nothing; and a fleet which he expected to arrive with supplies being dispersed by a tempest, he was compelled to return to England. His invasion had inflicted dreadful misery upon the Scots; but it brought him no advantage whatever.

Prince Edward and his army were suffered to remain in Guienne without receiving any reinforcements; and it was not until the Midsummer of 1356 that young Edward undertook another expedition, with a small force of only 12,000 men, with which he penetrated as far as the Loire. It was about this time that Edward received the odd name by which he is always remembered—the BLACK PRINCE. It was bestowed upon him on account of his wearing black armour, which set off the exceeding fairness of his complexion; and in the expedition of 1356, it was a sound of terror to the French. The advance of the prince, and the devastation which the march of an army through an enemy's country invariably causes, aroused John, the French king; and collecting an enormous army, he marched to intercept the course of this scourge of his people, determined, if possible, to overwhelm and extirpate him. The Black Prince very wisely kept out of his way; but as every Frenchman detested the English, and refused to give them any information respecting the army of their king, the prince, by accident, came suddenly upon it in the evening of the 18th of September, at Maupertius, a village near Poictiers. Edward would willingly have retreated; but the enemy spread themselves in such a manner that he was surrounded, and retreat rendered impossible. "God help us!" he exclaimed, "we must now consider how we can fight them."

Prince Edward's military talents were very great, and he placed his troops in admirable position; but his army did not amount to more than 10,000 men, many of whom were Gascons, while the French possessed more than 60,000. On the morning of the 18th, Cardinal Perigord, a legate from the pope, arrived at the scene of the coming struggle, and did his best to bring about an accommodation without a battle. Representing to the Black Prince his extreme peril, he implored him to submit and treat for peace. Edward, who would willingly have shunned the conflict, if he could have done so without staining the brightness of his reputation, answered, "Save my honour, and the honour of my army, and I will listen to any reasonable terms." The French king's numbers made him confident of victory; therefore he would only consent to letting the English army pass, on condition that the prince and 100 of his knights of the highest rank would surrender themselves as his prisoners. Edward would not submit to this; and his soldiers loved him too well to purchase their liberty at such a price, so the negotiation was broken off, and both sides prepared for battle.

The next morning, as the sun rose upon the fields and vineyards, the clang of trumpets sounded to arms. The English had chosen a position which could only be approached by a narrow lane, down which the French cavalry poured to the attack; but they were saluted with such a flight of arrows from a body of English archers, who were concealed behind the hedges, that they hesitated, fell into confusion, and then retreated, leaving the lane blocked up with dead and dying men and horses. At this moment a body of 600 archers and men of arms, having made a considerable circuit, fell upon the rear of the French army, and by an unexpected attack caused great confusion. A large detachment of the army, under the command of the Duke d'Orleans, on perceiving this, was seized with a panic, and retreated without striking a blow. Thus, in a little while, two out of the three divisions into which John's army was formed had taken to flight; the third only, under the command of the king, stood firm.

Even this division was more numerous than the whole of the English army; but the latter was so greatly encouraged, that instead of entertaining fears for the result, the soldiers deemed victory certain. A brave knight, named Sir John Chandos, called out to the Black Prince, "Sire, ride forward! the day is yours; let us address ourselves to our adversary, the King of France; for around him lies all the strength of the enterprise. Well I know that his valiancy will not permit him to flee, and he will become our prisoner, please God and St. George." The prince approved this counsel, and, with a loud shout, he and his horsemen dashed through the lane, and swept down like a torrent upon the French battalion. For a time the French stood firm, and the battle raged with terrible fierceness; the air rang with the clash of steel, and was darkened by thick flights of arrows; but it was soon evident that victory was on the side of the English. King John stood with a battle-axe in his hand, laying his enemies dead around him; but his troops fell back, and he was left almost alone, though his youngest son, a boy only sixteen years of age, still fought bravely by the side of his father. The French king was nearly exhausted, had already received two wounds on the face, and might easily have been slain; but the English, by whom he was surrounded, hesitated to kill the unfortunate monarch, and called out to him to yield. Still he fought on with the courage of desperation, and would have fallen a victim to his temerity, had not a young knight, Dennis de Morbecque, speaking in French, urged him to surrender. By the rules of chivalry it was thought dishonourable for a king or noble, even though overpowered, to yield to a commoner, or indeed to any one beneath their own rank. So the French king said, "To whom shall I surrender? Where is my cousin, the Prince of Wales?" "He is not here," was the answer; "but surrender and I will conduct you to him." "Who are you?" hurriedly responded the king. "Dennis de Morbecque, a knight of Artois," was the answer; "but I serve the King of England, because I am an exile from France, and have forfeited all I have there." The French king and his brave young son then yielded.

The Black Prince was resting in his tent after the fatigue of victory, when he heard of the capture of his distinguished foe. He met the fallen king, and treated him with every mark of respect and sympathy; invited him to supper; and even waited upon him personally during that repast. At the same time, he endeavoured to soothe him by saying—"Dear sir, do not make a poor meal because the Almighty God has not gratified your wishes in the event of this day; for be assured that my lord and father will show you every honour and friendship in his power, and will arrange your ransom so reasonably that you will henceforth always remain friends. In my opinion, you have cause to be glad that the success of this battle did not turn out as you desired; for you have this day acquired such high renown for prowess, that you have surpassed all the knights on your side. I do not, dear sir, say this to flatter you; for all those of our side who have seen and observed the actions of each party, have unanimously allowed this to be your due, and decree you the prize and garland for it." The French king was touched by this generous behaviour; and said, that though he had lost the victory, it was some consolation to know that it was gained by a prince who possessed so much valour and humanity.

After the famous battle of Poictiers, which was fought on Monday, the 19th of September, 1356, the Black Prince and his army marched to Bordeaux, without any further attempt being made by the French either to stop him or to re-capture their king. There he concluded a truce for two years with the Dauphin Charles, and, in the spring of the following year, carried his royal prisoner to London, which he entered on the 24th of May, 1357, amidst the applause of immense multitudes of people.

In London, the French king met another royal captive, David Bruce, the King of Scotland, who had remained in easy imprisonment at the English court for a period of eleven years. But as King Edward found that Scotland still defied him, although its king was in his power, he consented to restore him to liberty on receiving a ransom of 100,000 marks. This was agreed to; and in the month of October, 1357, David returned to his native land. At the same time a truce for ten years was entered into between the two countries. David was unable to pay the whole ransom, and endeavoured to discharge it by proposing that, if he died without children, the King of England should succeed to the throne of Scotland. The parliament of that country instantly rejected so unpatriotic a proposition; and on David's death, which took place in the year 1371, he was succeeded by his nephew, the Steward or Stewart of Scotland, from whom descended the family of the Stuarts, who, in after times, ascended the throne of England, and contributed many stirring and tragical events to the pages of its history. King Edward never invaded Scotland again; and after years of violence and conquest, nothing remained to him of that country but the town of Berwick: such is the unprofitable nature of war. Had the wealth and energy which, during so many years, he had lavished in heaping misery upon Scotland, in a vain effort to subdue it, been directed for the benefit of mankind, he would have been the most illustrious philanthropist.

The unfortunate French king was treated with great courtesy by Edward, who, however, demanded an enormous ransom before he would set him at liberty. This ransom was to consist of a great sum of money, together with the restoration of Normandy, and all the French provinces which had been possessed by Henry II., to the English king. John hesitated; the price was a heavy one; the surrender of so much of France to the enemies of his people would make him disliked, if not despised, by his subjects. On the other hand, France had fallen into a deplorable state of anarchy during his absence; his son Charles, the dauphin (who assumed the royal power during his father's captivity), was defied by the King of Navarre, who also laid claim to the throne. The citizens of Paris thought this an excellent opportunity for the assertion of their liberties, and for restraining the despotic power of their sovereigns. The unpaid army lived by plundering the people; and a fearful insurrection took place among the peasantry, who had for ages been treated little better than dogs, and who now rose against their oppressors, the nobles, numbers of whom they murdered in a shocking manner. As people are always cruel in proportion as they are ignorant, it is no wonder that these ruined and starving peasants committed many savage and revolting acts. The nobles and gentry soon retaliated; the peasants, in their turn, were attacked and slaughtered in heaps; those who fled being hunted down, and put to death like wild beasts. Few things could exceed the miserable, distracted state to which France was reduced. An Italian poet who visited it at the time, said—"I could not believe that this was the same kingdom which I had once seen so rich and flourishing. Nothing presented itself to my eyes but a fearful solitude, an extreme poverty, lands uncultivated, houses in ruins. Even the neighbourhood of Paris manifested everywhere marks of destruction and conflagration. The streets are deserted; the roads overgrown with weeds; the whole is a vast solitude." All this was known to the captive king; he longed to return and attempt to restore tranquillity to his distracted country; therefore he yielded to the demands of King Edward, and signed the treaty which was to liberate him.

The signature of King John could not bind his people; and the dauphin and nobles of France disdainfully rejected a treaty which they considered dishonourable to their country. Therefore John remained a prisoner, and Edward prepared for another invasion of France. In a little while, an army of more than 100,000 men was ranged beneath his banners; for the fierce, idle, and dissolute of all classes flocked, like so many hungry wolves and vultures, to prey upon that defenceless land. In the November of 1359, Edward again entered France. Landing at Calais, he advanced and ravaged the provinces of Picardy and Champagne, and then laid siege to the city of Rheims. In the magnificent cathedral of that place the kings of France were crowned; and it is said that Edward's object in his endeavour to take it was, that his coronation, as sovereign of the country, might be performed there. Rheims was bravely defended; and having remained before the city seven weeks, Edward raised the siege.

After plundering several small towns, he marched upon Burgundy, and extorted a fine of 50,000 marks from its duke, on condition of sparing that province. Other places saved themselves from his vengeance in a similar manner; and then the English marched upon Paris, and encamped before its gates. That pleasant historian, Froissart, gives the following account of the manner in which the army proceeded on its march:—"I must inform you that the King of England and his rich lords were followed by carts laden with tents, pavilions, mills, and forges, to grind their corn and make shoes for their horses, and everything of that sort which might be wanting. For this effect there were upwards of 6,000 carts, each of them drawn by four good and strong horses, which had been transported from England. Upon these carts, also, were many vessels and small boats, made surprisingly well of boiled leather; they were large enough to contain three men, to enable them to fish any lake or pond, whatever might be its size: and they were of great use to the lords and barons during Lent: but the commonalty made use of what provisions they could get. The king had, besides, thirty falconers on horseback, laden with hawks; sixty couple of strong hounds, and as many greyhounds; so that every day he took the pleasure of hunting or fishing, either by land or water. Many lords had their hawks and hounds as well as the king." Paris was too well defended for Edward to besiege, and too well stored with provisions to be reduced by a blockade; for the dauphin had spent all his energies in rendering it a secure retreat for himself. Edward challenged the dauphin to lead out his troops and fight him; but that prince had no intention of exposing himself to the chances of such an unequal contest, and he very prudently remained where he was. A want of provisions then caused the English king to retire; and he led his army towards Brittany, abandoning the almost barren country to the fury of his now half-starved soldiers. The misery they had occasioned began to recoil upon themselves; hundreds of men and horses dropped dead from hunger, fatigue, and sickness, and left their bones to whiten on the land they had so cruelly afflicted.

All this time negotiations for peace continued; but Edward insisted upon the terms which he had proposed to the captive King John; and as the French still refused to accede to them, no amicable arrangement could be made. At length the brave Duke of Lancaster, touched with pity, persuaded Edward to listen to terms of a milder and more acceptable character. He said—"My lord, this war which you are carrying on in the kingdom of France is wonderful to all men, and not too favourable to you. Your people are the only gainers by it, for you are wasting your time. Considering everything, if you persist in it, it may last your life; and it appears to me doubtful if ever you will succeed to the extent of your wishes; I would recommend, therefore, whilst you have the power of closing it honourably, to accept the proposals which have been offered to you; for, my lord, we may lose more in one day than we have gained in twenty years." The king was much attached to the Duke of Lancaster, who was his cousin, and this advice had a great effect upon him. A dreadful storm which occurred shortly afterwards, attended by thunder and lightning, and hailstones so large that many of the soldiers were killed by them, also had an effect in softening his mind. Edward feared that this tempest was an announcement of God's anger against his cruel and devastating career, or else that the day of judgment was at hand. Turning himself towards the church of the Virgin Mary at Chartres, he fell upon his knees, and vowed that he would accept terms of peace.

The compact which was entered into by the two nations, is known as the Peace of Bretigny, because it was agreed to at that place. It was concluded on the 8th of May, 1360; and by it Edward renounced his claim to the crown of France, and also to the territories of Normandy, Anjou, and Maine. In exchange for these great concessions, he was to receive the entire sovereignty of Guienne, Poictou, Saintonge, Agenois, the Limousin, Perigord, Thouars, Ponthieu, Calais, and Guisnes. These he was, and his successors were, to possess, without yielding any homage for them to the kings of France. It was also agreed that 3,000,000 crowns of gold, equal to £1,500,000 of our present money, should be given as a ransom for the French king. This great sum was to be paid in instalments extending over a period of six years, and twenty-five barons and fifty-two rich citizens were surrendered as hostages, that this and other parts of the treaty should be fulfilled. It was some time before the business was concluded; but in October the French king was restored to his liberty; and although Edward had proved a dangerous enemy to him, the two monarchs parted with mutual professions of respect and esteem.

The French king was an honourable man; and, although not unstained by some vices, he had obtained from his subjects the title of John the Good. Finding himself unable to pay his ransom, and opposed by his sons and nobles when he wished to make over to Edward the provinces stipulated in the treaty, he resolved on returning to England, and explaining his difficulties to its sovereign. His courtiers strongly advised him against this noble but romantic step, and urged that Edward might, perhaps, again detain him as a prisoner. The resolute monarch grandly answered, that though good faith were banished from the rest of the earth, she ought still to retain her habitation in the breasts of princes. Proceeding to London, he was received by Edward with every mark of respect and affection, and lodged in the Savoy Palace, where he had lived during his captivity. His troubled course was nearly ended. Shortly after his arrival he fell ill; and on the 8th of April, 1364, he died. His melancholy end excited great sympathy among the English nobles. Some French historians have accused him of coming to England to visit a lady whom they say he loved, and not to satisfy his honourable scruples. This ungenerous statement is not supported by facts; and is rendered the more unlikely when it is considered that he was in his fifty-sixth year.

The French king was succeeded by his eldest son, who was crowned as Charles V. In the early part of his reign France was overrun by vast bands of soldiers, or rather robbers, who called themselves "Companies of Adventure." They consisted of outcasts from every country of Europe, who, in times of war, sold their services to the highest bidder, and great numbers of them had been in the pay of King Edward. After the treaty of Bretigny those men refused to lay down their arms, and return to peaceful labour; indeed, it is very likely they were unfit for it. They were so numerous as to be able to defy the law, and, on several occasions, even defeated the troops of the French king in regular battles. When not occupied in fighting, they supported themselves by plunder, and thus proved the curse of the land, and an enormous impediment to its tranquillity.

As Charles could not subdue the troublesome marauders, he hit upon an excellent plan for getting them to abandon his country, and carry on their depredations elsewhere. Castille was ruled by an abominable tyrant, named Pedro the Cruel, who had been guilty of so many cruelties and murders, that his subjects, headed by his half-brother Enrique, Count of Trastamara, rose in insurrection against him. Pedro subdued them, and Enrique fled to France for protection. Among other shocking crimes, Pedro had lately poisoned his wife, Blanche of Bourbon, sister of the French queen. This induced Charles to adopt the cause of Enrique, and he succeeded in persuading the Companies of Adventure to follow that prince to Castille, for the purpose of placing him upon the throne instead of his savage brother. Any scheme that offered a chance of plunder was to the taste of these military vagabonds; so, putting themselves under the command of a chieftain, named Bertrand du Guesclin, they marched with Don Enrique against Pedro.

The French king gladly gave a sum of money towards the enterprise, and the pope also promised 200,000 livres, and to absolve the soldiers beforehand of all the crimes they might commit. Du Guesclin, therefore, went with his army directly to Avignon, where the pope kept his court, and demanded the money. This the latter hesitated about paying; but he readily offered the absolution, which, of course, cost him nothing. Du Guesclin answered abruptly—"I believe that my fellows may make a shift to do without your absolution; but the money is really necessary." Thus pressed, the pontiff extorted a large sum from the inhabitants of the city and neighbourhood, and offered it to Du Guesclin. The generous soldier replied—"It is not my purpose to oppress the innocent people. The pope and his cardinals can easily spare such a sum from their own coffers. This money I insist must be restored to the owners; should they be defrauded of it, I shall myself return from the other side of the Pyrenees, and oblige you to make them restitution." The head of the church was compelled to submit, and he paid the money from his own treasury.

Cruel people are frequently cowardly: this has been recognised almost as a rule, and Don Pedro was no exception to it; he fled from the approach of Du Guesclin without waiting to fight a battle; and, proceeding to Bordeaux, where the Black Prince was residing, implored his protection and assistance. It is not to Edward's credit that he took the part of Pedro; but it appears he considered him an injured sovereign, unjustly driven from his throne, and, consequently, undertook to restore him. It seems, also, this prince was so used to the excitement of war, that he could not live happily without it. Besides, the French king, as we have shown, had undertaken the cause of Don Enrique, and that decided the Black Prince in favour of the cruel Don Pedro. So difficult is it to root out long-cherished animosities.

Prince Edward's views were approved of by his father, and the Black Prince speedily led an English army into Spain. He was met near Najara, on the 3rd of April, 1367, by Don Enrique, with an army said to amount to 100,000 men, or three times as many as were ranged beneath the English standards. In the beginning of the battle, Enrique's brother, and a large division of his army, fled without striking a blow; this contributed to damp the spirits of the rest, and, in the end, Edward obtained a decided victory; and Pedro the Cruel was placed upon his throne again. True to his savage nature, he wanted to slaughter the great number of prisoners who had been taken in the engagement; but the more generous English prince was shocked at such a proposal, and would not permit it. Edward soon found that, to assist the worthless is to reap ingratitude; for base minds are always tainted with that ignoble vice. Don Pedro refused payment and supplies of provisions to that very army which had raised him from the dust, and placed the regal diadem again upon his distinguished brow. Thus, after accomplishing a brilliant victory, the English soldiers, half starved and suffering from the effects of the climate, were compelled to return to Guienne. During this expedition, the Black Prince himself was seized with that fatal disorder which, a few years later, laid him in a premature grave. But Pedro did not live long to triumph in his ingratitude. About a year afterwards he was stabbed by Enrique in a conference which took place between them, and the latter then ascended the throne of Castille.

Prince Edward had contracted great debts by his Spanish expedition; and, to discharge them, he was compelled to lay heavy taxes upon the French provinces belonging to the English, over which he ruled as sovereign. To those taxes the people refused to submit; and some Gascon nobles appealed to the French king as their superior lord. Charles was still smarting from the wrongs France had received from the English: for some years he had been waiting for an opportunity of retaliation, and now that opportunity seemed to have arrived. The great and once terrible Edward had grown old, and age had robbed him of the energy and vigour of former years. He seemed desirous of spending the remainder of his life in peace; and his warlike son had become a melancholy invalid. It was evident that he also was travelling to that land of repose and silence, from which none ever return.

These events were not lost upon the French king; and having secretly made preparations for war, he summoned the Black Prince, as his vassal, to appear at Paris, and justify his conduct to his subjects. By the treaty of Bretigny, when peace was made between England and France, the king of the latter country gave up all claim to homage from the kings of England for the lands they held in France. It was agreed that they should be no longer regarded as vassals of the French crown, but rule Guienne and the other provinces ceded to them as independent sovereigns. So that in summoning Prince Edward as his vassal, Charles was putting forward a claim which he had but recently solemnly abandoned. His object was to create a dispute; and the Black Prince, who perfectly understood it, replied that he would shortly appear at Paris; but that it should be at the head of 60,000 men.

The English king seemed averse to a renewal of the war; but when Charles invaded the territories the English possessed in France, it roused his former spirit; and again assuming his title as king of that country, he sent reinforcements to the Black Prince, under the command of his son John, afterwards well known in history as John of Gaunt, and then created Duke of Lancaster, in the place of the king's cousin, who was dead, but who had given such excellent advice to Edward at Chartres, about making peace with France.

Charles was a prudent monarch: he obtained from his subjects the name of Charles the Wise, and he had timed his aggression well: his troops first fell upon and took Ponthieu, after which the people of Abbeville, St. Valori, Rue, and Crotoy threw open their gates, and yielded submission to the French sovereign. Limoges, the capital of the Limousin, threw off its allegiance to the English, and welcomed the French within its walls. This highly incensed Prince Edward, for it was a place on which he had conferred many benefits. Raising himself upon his bed, to which disease had confined him, he swore by the soul of his father that he would re-take the town, and put all its inhabitants to death.

He instantly laid siege to the devoted town; and, although too ill to stand, caused himself to be carried about in a litter, and thus directed the operations. For a month the stout old walls resisted every attempt to batter them down; but when a breach was made, the English soldiers rushed in, and men, women, and children were slaughtered without mercy. The almost dying prince was carried through the streets in his litter; and trembling, unarmed men, and women with dishevelled hair, and eyes starting with terror, threw themselves in his path, and cried aloud for pity; but the stern cadaverous conqueror went on, heedless of the shrieks and groans of anguish which rose on all sides around him, and left them to their fate. The near prospect of his own death seemed to harden his heart; and he who was once so humane in victory, and generous to the fallen, then became pitiless and rigid as a marble statue. A few knights only he spared from the general massacre; but it was from admiration of their desperate bravery, rather than a sense of compassion; all others perished in one promiscuous butchery, and then the town itself was set on fire, and became a fierce red funeral pyre to the mounds of blood-stained and mangled dead. This sad deed ended the military career of the Black Prince; his star was struggling amid encroaching darkness, and in a few years he was to follow the victims of his savage wrath. In hope that the air of his native country might restore him, he caused himself to be carried to England, and left his affairs in France in a tottering and ruinous condition.

The military successes which the English had hitherto obtained over the French were now to meet a reverse. In the month of June, 1372, an English fleet, which King Edward had sent to France, under the command of the Earl of Pembroke, was met, near Rochelle, by a Spanish fleet of superior strength, and totally defeated. The English fought desperately; for they had already began to consider the sea as their natural element; but they were over-matched, and every ship was sunk or captured. King Edward, forgetting his age, then embarked with an army; but the weather was so tempestuous, that after being detained in port for some time by contrary winds, he abandoned the expedition. Sir Robert Knowles, with 30,000 soldiers, marched from Calais to the gates of Paris, and devastated the country by the way; but the prudent French king would not risk a battle; the English found the towns all closed and fortified, and they could only wreak their fury upon the land. The Duke of Lancaster then marched almost from one end of France to the other; but the French, instead of fighting, only hung upon his rear, and slaughtered all stragglers from the army. Charles had secured the services of Du Guesclin, the famous and skilful general, who had fought in Spain and against Don Pedro; and he managed so well that King Edward was glad to enter into a truce, after having lost all his numerous conquests in France, except Bordeaux, Bayonne, and Calais.—This is commonly the result of victories. Territory won by violence is, as it deserves to be, frequently lost by it also.

The Black Prince seemed to get better after his return to England, and he recovered so far as to be able to take a considerable part in parliamentary business. His activity was spent in opposition to his father, who, in his old age, had grown somewhat indifferent to the interests of his people. He left most of the business of the state to his son, the Duke of Lancaster, who was much disliked, and even suspected of a design to set aside the son of the Black Prince, and obtain the succession to the crown for himself. To satisfy the people on this subject, the king declared, in parliament, that his grandson, Prince Richard, was to inherit his crown. Edward's good queen, Philippa, had been dead some years, and the old king had since attached himself to a beautiful but profligate young woman, named Alice Pierce or Perrers. She was very pleasing in her conversation, as well as graceful in herself; and Edward doted on her so much, that he was quite uneasy in her absence, and he even bestowed upon her the costly jewels which had belonged to his dead queen. Her great influence over him aroused the dislike of the nation against her to such an extent, that the parliament threatened her with banishment.

Another event soon absorbed the minds of Englishmen and filled them with sorrow. This was the death of the Black Prince, who breathed his last on the 8th of June, 1376, regretted, and indeed loved, by the whole of the nation. His great talents, courage, and military glory had much endeared him to the people. He was not free from those cruelties which usually stain the characters of conquerors; but he seems generally to have been humane, generous, and affectionate. It is said that his manners were exceedingly affable and winning; and it is certain that his death was felt as a great national calamity. To this day his memory has been praised by historians, and cherished with admiration by his countrymen. This distinguished prince died in the forty-sixth year of his age, and left but one son, a boy of ten years old. The body of the deceased warrior was carried, with great state, to Canterbury, and buried in the cathedral there. His old, battered, rusty helmet it still suspended above his tomb.

Scarcely more than a year after the death of his brave son, King Edward himself went to his long resting-place; but before that event occurred, a humble parish priest rose up in England, and began that great struggle against ignorance and superstition which, nearly two centuries later, ended in the Reformation. His name was John de Wycliffe, or Wiclif, for it is differently spelt—a name that will always be honourably remembered in England, as that of the first distinguished reformer of the errors of the Roman church. A short account of his life should be contained in every history of this country.

He was born about the year 1324, in the parish from which he took his name, near Richmond, in Yorkshire. After being educated at Oxford, he became a priest; and when in his thirty-second year, attracted great notice by writing a book against the corruptions of Rome, called The Last Age of the Church. Sixteen years later he took the degree of doctor of divinity, and obtained considerable distinction as an excellent public lecturer on theology. About that time Pope Gregory XI. was exerting himself to make King Edward perform the homage and pay the tribute to Rome that had been promised by the weak tyrant, John, but had been latterly neglected. Amongst other means, the pontiff employed a learned monk to write a work in favour of this claim. Wycliffe, who saw the worldliness and ambition of the great head of the church, immediately wrote an answer, which gained him the patronage of the Duke of Lancaster, and a presentation from the king to the rectory of Lutterworth, in Leicestershire. Having occasion to go to Rome, he was confirmed in his opinions about the abuses of its church, and afterwards spoke very boldly against the pope, both to his friends and in his public lectures; and on all occasions he defended the authority of the crown against the avarice and usurpations of the church. This gained him many enemies among those idle priests who loved corruption, and hated all reforms; so they collected a number of passages from his sermons and lectures, which they called heretical; that is, containing opinions opposed to those of the church; and these passages they sent to Rome for the inspection of the pope. As Wycliffe was a truthful, enlightened man, much beyond the spirit of his age, and the passages, no doubt, contained opinions not then commonly understood, the pope, of course, condemned them, and sent letters to the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Bishop of London, to seize and imprison the man who had been presumptuous enough to write them.

These prelates, therefore, cited Wycliffe to appear before them at St. Paul's, and answer for his conduct. On the appointed day the cathedral was crowded; for at that time heresy was new in England, and the people were taught to consider it a profane and wicked thing. When the bold reformer appeared, in company with his patrons, the Duke of Lancaster and Earl Percy, they were scarcely able to obtain an entrance on account of the dense throng. The Bishop of London censured the duke for supporting a heretic, upon which the duke broke out into a violent passion, and threatened to drag the bishop from the church by the hair of his head. As may be supposed, a great uproar followed, and the meeting soon broke up in confusion. This time the people sided with the prelates; and, rushing from St. Paul's, attacked the Savoy Palace, where the Duke of Lancaster lived, and reversed his arms as those of a traitor. Their excitement was so great, that they even murdered an unfortunate priest whom they took for Earl Percy in disguise; and so much tumult followed, that the debates in parliament were interrupted, and the king himself was obliged to interfere to restore tranquillity. This was in the early part of 1377, the last year of Edward's reign.

The remainder of Wycliffe's life was passed during the time of Richard II.; but, as the great events of history do not bring him again into notice, it will be well to mention what is necessary to be further told about him. The following year (1378) he was summoned by the bishops to appear before them in the chapel of Lambeth Palace; but the people had then changed their opinions, and began to regard Wycliffe as a wise and religious reformer, and they forced their way into the chapel in such numbers, and wore such threatening looks, that the bishops were seriously alarmed. They were relieved from this embarrassing position by the arrival of a messenger from the mother of the young king, forbidding them to proceed any further with the cause. Shortly afterwards the pope died; and thus, for a time, the reformer escaped further persecution. He then continued working at the great labour of his life, the translation of the Bible into English. The Bible used by the church was in Latin; and thus it was a sealed book to nearly the whole nation. The gospels had been translated into the Saxon, and so had several outlines and paraphrases of particular books; but the Bible, as a whole, could only be read by the priests. Printing was not invented until the next century; but many copies of Wycliffe's Bible were written and circulated during his life.

He had previously written a work On the Truth and Meaning of Scripture; in which he maintained that the Bible was the sole guide in all religious doctrines; that it was to be followed without regard to the traditions of the church; and that every one had a right to read and judge concerning it for themselves. That it was not a book for priests alone, but for the people; not for a single people, but for the whole world; and that in its sacred pages "all truth is either expressed or implied." He added, that we should follow "the law of God and of reason more than that of our popes and cardinals; so much so, that if we had a hundred popes, and if all the friars were cardinals, to the law of the gospel we should bow more than to all this multitude."

Wycliffe also lectured against the doctrine of transubstantiation; that is, the doctrine which teaches that, in the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, the consecrated bread and wine is miraculously transformed into the actual body and blood of the Saviour. Wycliffe's lectures on this subject raised such a storm against him, that he was compelled to retract his opinions, and was, even then, deprived of his rectory at Lutterworth. In after-times, hundreds of pure-minded and heroic men and women were burnt to death at the stake for holding his opinions upon this subject. In the year 1383, the reverend reformer was seized by paralysis; but he recovered so far as to be able to fulfil his clerical duties The next year he had a second stroke, which rendered him speechless, and he died two days afterwards. He was one of the most remarkable men of his age, which was an age of strong minds and stirring events, and one of preparation for the great work of reformation that followed it. Thirty years after the death of Wycliffe, the high dignitaries of the Roman church had his bones dug up from the grave, as those of a heretic, and committed to the flames. Then, collecting the ashes, they cast them, in scorn, into a little stream which ran into the lovely river Avon—a mean and bitter insult that the effect of his writings well avenged.

To return to King Edward.—In the January of 1377 he completed the fiftieth year of his reign, and, in celebration of it, proclaimed a pardon for all minor offences. In the latter part of his life he sunk into apathy, if not into dotage; and four months after the fiftieth anniversary of his coronation, he expired at his beautiful manor of Sheen, now the town of Richmond. In his last moments he was deserted by his relatives and courtiers; and it is said that even Alice Pierce, his beautiful mistress, after stealing a diamond ring from his finger, abandoned him also. At the moment of his death no one was with him but a faithful priest; all the courtiers and attendants of this once mighty sovereign were crowding to offer their services to his successor. Edward died on the 21st of June, in his sixty-fifth year. He had a numerous family, several of whom preceded him to the grave. Those who survived him were Lionel, Duke of Clarence; John, Duke of Lancaster, called John of Gaunt, in allusion to the place of his birth; Edmund, Earl of Cambridge, afterwards Duke of York; and Thomas, Earl of Buckingham, afterwards Duke of Gloucester. Edward also left four daughters, Isabella, Joan, Mary, and Margaret.

The third Edward was a king of great courage and abilities. He experienced several reverses; and some of his victories (particularly the one of Crecy) were the result of the mismanagement of his enemies rather than of his own skill in war. His reputation as a soldier was also increased by the great military talent of his son, the Prince of Wales. His wars with France and Scotland, though they may have added to the national military fame, were unjust, because they were aggressive. The only thing that can be said in justification of them is, that they prevented conspiracies against him by his powerful and turbulent barons at home. In this light, some excuse may be found for them; but, in a moral point of view, they cannot be defended; and they produced no advantages even to the victors. They compelled Edward to apply frequently to his parliament for money, and thus enabled it to wrest from him many valuable concessions to English liberty; Magna Charta was confirmed fifteen times during his reign, and the law against treason was rendered more simple and merciful. His government, though an arbitrary one, was, in most respects, prudent, usually just, and always vigorous. He was an ambitious prince; but, considering the practices of that age, certainly not a cruel one. His intended severity to the burgesses of Calais is the most reprehensible in this respect; but he suffered himself to be persuaded from that savage design. In his manners he was generous and affable, and his character was unstained by any petty tyranny. Altogether, England prospered under his government, and historians generally speak of his reign as an interesting and glorious period.

The nobility, gentry, and all others who could afford it, indulged, during this reign, in great extravagance of dress and luxury of living. This was a necessary consequence of the gradual extension of commerce and industry, and consequently of wealth. Luxury in living, and expense in dress, when not indulged in to the neglect of necessary duties, are both conducive to the prosperity of a country; but this our ancestors of that age did not understand, and several laws were made to check what was looked upon as mischievous prodigality. No persons who possessed less than a hundred a year were allowed to wear any ornaments of gold or silver, or any dresses of silk; while servants were prohibited from eating meat or fish more than once a day, and their masters (no matter what was their rank or wealth) were not to have more than two courses at dinner or supper, or more than three dishes to each course. These foolish laws (as we now deem them, though, when enacted, they were deemed quite the reverse) were frequently broken, and soon came to be disused. It seems that in dress people were just as fanciful then as now: indeed human nature is always the same; our fashions change, but our feelings remain unaltered. It would be absurd to suppose that people in those times did not possess a little vanity as well as ourselves; but they did not possess the same means of gratifying it, nor always the same taste in doing so. The Scots, who were not quite so wealthy as their English neighbours, ridiculed this love of finery, and some northern wit of that time one day fixed the following lines upon the door of St. Peter's Church, at Stangate:—

"Longbeards heartless,
Pointed hoods witless;
Gay coats graceless,
Make England thriftless.'

Many nobles and men of rank still remained exceedingly ignorant; they studied to fit themselves for war, rather than to acquire that information which is now considered necessary to every one who moves in any public or honourable station. An amusing instance of this ignorance is related by Robert of Avesbury, one of our old chroniclers. The pope, in the year 1344, created Louis of Spain Prince of the Fortunate Islands—meaning the Canaries, then but newly discovered. The English ambassador and his retinue, residing at Rome, were seized with alarm and astonishment. They had never heard of the Fortunate Islands; and, after debating together, came to the conclusion that they could be no other than England and Ireland; and, with this impression, they hurried home, to tell King Edward that the pope had actually presumed to give away his dominions. Of course the absurd mistake was soon explained; but so ill-informed and hasty an ambassador might have caused much mischief. Yet, in spite of this ignorance on the part of those whose duty it was to have been better informed, a desire for instruction was springing up among a part of the people. Speed tells us, that there were then 30,000 students in the university of Oxford alone. A modern historian inquires, "What was the occupation of all these young men?" and then sarcastically, but no doubt very truthfully, thus answers his own question—"To learn very bad Latin, and still worse logic."

In the reign of Edward III., lived the famous ancient English poet, Geoffrey Chaucer, who is regarded as the father of English literature, and has even been called the Homer of this country. The history of a nation is, in fact, a collection of biographies, arranged in chronological order, of its greatest and most illustrious people: a brief account of Chaucer is therefore indispensable. Though the conduct of kings and queens, warriors and nobles, greatly influences the condition of a people, and goes a long way towards producing their happiness or misery, so that upon it the national honour and prosperity mainly depends, it does not form the national character. That work is left to the teachers of the people, and to those who seek to diffuse instruction and information by their writings; and whose influence, through the press, is now so widely extended. When the literature of a country is of a wise and healthful kind, it improves the minds and elevates the tastes of a people; if, on the contrary, it be corrupt and depraved, it tends to debase them. Many a writer who may have lain in his grave, as Chaucer has, for four centuries and a-half, has, through his noble thoughts, strengthened the characters, formed the principles, and elevated the minds of the generation in which he lived; and his works now tend to have the same effect on those who read them. The memory of the intellectually illustrious dead, therefore, should always be reverenced, for our debt to them is great; as it is to the public instructors of our own times.

Chaucer was a public instructor of the age in which he lived. Some doubt has been entertained as to the precise year in which he was born, but it is generally admitted to be in 1328. Some say that his father was a knight; some that he was a vintner; and others that he was a merchant. At a proper age, Chaucer entered the university of Cambridge, but afterwards finished his education at Oxford. He then travelled abroad for a few years, after which he became one of the pages of the king. In this position his abilities attracted the attention and patronage of John of Gaunt, the celebrated Duke of Lancaster. The poet was afterwards made shield-bearer to his sovereign—an office long since disused and forgotten; and, finally, comptroller of the customs, in the port of London, for wool, woolfells, and hides. The profits arising from this office made him a very wealthy man; but he was also exceedingly industrious; for although he kept all the accounts of it himself, yet he found a great deal of time for study and writing poetry. His poems are numerous and very long. They consist of The Canterbury Tales, his greatest work, and which, though unfinished, contains more than 17,000 verses; The Romaunt of the Rose; Troilus and Creseide; The House of Fame; Chaucer's Dream; The Book of the Duchess; The Flower and the Leaf; The Court of Love; &c.

His writings are now somewhat difficult to read, as the English language has undergone many changes and improvements since his time; but there can be no doubt of their great merit, and by many they are considered as only second to the works of the great poet, William Shakspeare. Chaucer certainly possessed a vivid fancy, was a great observer, and his descriptions of character and costume are close and humorous, but tedious to a modern ear. The antique language in which he wrote scarcely looks like the English of our own day at all; though in the following often-quoted lines, Spenser celebrates it for its purity and English character:—

> " Dan Chaucer, well of English undefil'd,
> On Fame's eternal bead-roll worthy to be fil'd;
> Old Dan Chaucer, in whose gentle spright,
> The pure well-head of poetry did dwell."

Chaucer inclined to the religious opinions of Wycliffe; and during the reign of Richard II., got into some political troubles, which compelled him for a time to fly the country. He was afterwards restored to favour, and died during the reign of Henry IV., at the advanced age of seventy-two. He was buried in Westminster Abbey, and a Latin epitaph placed over the grave, of which the following lines are a translation:—

> " Of English bards who sang the sweetest strains, > Old Geoffrey Chaucer now this tomb contains;
> For his death's date, if reader thou should'st call,
> Look but beneath, and it will tell thee all.
> 25th October, 1400."

During the reign of Edward III. a new means of destruction began to be used in warfare: this was gunpowder. Cannons, said to have been introduced in 1338, are supposed to have been first used by English soldiers at the battle of Crecy; though, if they were (which is doubtful), they were not prominently employed, and did not contribute much towards obtaining that remarkable victory. They were used at the siege of Calais, A.D. 1347. The original cannons were clumsy and uncouth; some of them being made of iron rods soldered together, and bound round with iron rings; while others were composed of thin sheets of iron, rolled up and held firmly together in the same manner. Instead of lead or iron shot, stone balls were discharged from them, and a very small quantity of powder was used, for fear that the guns might burst. They did burst sometimes, and killed those around them; so, as yet, the English preferred, for some time, saluting their enemies with a flight of barbed and feathered arrows, instead of the more murderous discharge of cannon. Muskets are reported to have been first used at the siege of Arras, in 1414. The Spanish historians say that their government first put these weapons into the soldiers' hands. It was not till the reign of Henry VIII., A.D. 1521, that they were generally introduced into the English army. At first the muskets were lighted by a match, and were so heavy that they could not be used without a rest. There have been many kinds of guns, to which have been given the names of harquebus, hague-but or hagbut, hand-gun, matchlock, musket, firelock, carabine, &c.

The invention of gunpowder, like that of guns, is lost in obscurity. Some writers have supposed it to have been first known about the year 1320, by a German monk and alchemist, named Barthold or Michael Schwartz; but it was known to our famous English scholar, Roger Bacon, and he described it in his writings in 1270, or fifty years before its supposed discovery by Schwartz. The fact is, that neither of them was the first inventor; for it was known to the Chinese at an earlier time than we have any record of, and was used in the East three centuries and a-half before the time of our Saviour. But its fatally destructive properties in connection with gunnery were a secret; these became slowly understood, and for ages gunpowder was only used for the harmless purposes of making fireworks and signals.

The noble old royal castle at Windsor was built by Edward III.; it was there he instituted the Order of the Garter; and it has, from that time, been a favourite residence of the English sovereigns.

CHAPTER XXIX.

THE REIGN OF RICHARD THE SECOND; CALLED RICHARD OF BORDEAUX.—A.D. 1377—1385.

RICHARD II., the son of the famous Black Prince, and the grandson of Edward III., was, at the time of his coronation, scarcely eleven years old. He was called Richard of Bordeaux, because he had been born at that town during the time his father lived in France. His mother was so beautiful a woman, that, before her marriage, people had named her "the Fair Maid of Kent." She was of the royal family, being a daughter of that Earl of Kent whom the treacherous Mortimer had deceived into an act of treason, and then procured his execution. She had been twice married before she became the wife of the Black Prince. From her first husband she was divorced; the second died; and though she survived the third she was still beautiful.

The coronation of the young king took place on the 16th of July, 1377, in Westminster Abbey. The ceremony was exceedingly magnificent, but it must also have been very tedious; for, before it was over, Richard fainted from fatigue and excitement. The young king's entry into the city had been through triumphal arches; and he rode under a canopy of blue silk, borne over him on spears of silver by the barons of the Cinque Ports. Many gorgeous pageants were performed in the streets for his amusement; and in Cheapside a castle was erected, from which ran streams of wine for the refreshment of the people. This castle had four turrets, and upon each of them stood a little girl, dressed in white, and of the same age as the king. When he approached them, they blew towards him small shreds of gold-leaf, and then, descending from their lofty position, handed to him and his attendants golden goblets filled with wine. After this, some one arrayed to represent an angel, came from the top of the castle, and offered him a golden crown. Great feasting and rejoicing followed the coronation; and the royal boy was so flattered and idolised, that it is a wonder his brain was not turned. All the affection the people had felt for his father they transferred to him, and the loftiest hopes were entertained of his future wisdom and glory. The gay crowd of courtiers and parasites who surrounded Richard, seem never to have guessed that they were weakening the mind, and corrupting the character, of their youthful sovereign. His father was educated in a stern school, amid war, hardships, and endurance, and he became a hero; the son was brought up in a dazzling whirl of flattery and luxury, and he soon sank to the level of the effeminate parasites and court butterflies by whom he was surrounded. Difficulties chasten the mind and give it strength; but ceaseless pleasure is a furnace from which very few, if any, escape unscathed.

The Duke of Lancaster (who will in future be called John of Gaunt in this history, because he is so much better known by that name), though a man of great talents and wisdom, was yet very unpopular with the nation, as it was believed he had sinister views upon the crown. When parliament met, the duke and the other uncles of the king were passed over, and the Lords and Commons appointed a regency of three prelates, two earls, and four knights, limiting their powers to a year. John of Gaunt was offended at his exclusion from this council, and, leaving the court, retired to his beautiful castle of Kenilworth.

The reign of Richard seemed destined to be a troubled one. He had not been seated on the throne a month before a French and Spanish fleet attacked the English coast, ravished the Isle of Wight, and burnt Hastings. They also attacked Winchelsea and Southampton, but were driven away from the latter place with great loss. The truce made between the late king and the French had expired; and as the terrible Edward was dead, and a mere boy wore the English crown, our enemies thought they could avenge the many sad injuries that had been inflicted upon them, and displayed evident signs of hostility. An English parliament met to consider what was best to be done; and a fleet was soon equipped for the defence of the coasts, and placed under the command of the king's uncle, the Earl of Buckingham. In this parliament, the House of Commons first began to assume some authority, and to exhibit a spirit of independence. Its members, for the first time, chose one of their number, Peter de la Mare, as speaker; whose office was to preserve order in their debates, and maintain that courtesy which is requisite in all bodies of men met for discussion. After exhibiting some freedom of speech, they sentenced Alice Pierce, the mistress of the late king, who robbed him on his death-bed, to banishment, and confiscated all her property. They also insisted that two aldermen, John Philpot and William Walworth, both of whom afterwards obtained a considerable distinction, should be appointed to receive the money voted for the defence of the country, to prevent its being wastefully expended.

The following year, John of Gaunt took the command of the fleet; but the war between England and France was conducted in a feeble and spiritless manner. After having captured a fleet of Spanish merchantmen, which, of course, was unable to resist his armed ships, he sailed to Brittany, and laid siege to St. Malo; but was compelled to retire from that place by a French force, under the command of the famous soldier, Du Guesclin. The chief result of his exertions was, to obtain possession of the towns and ports of Cherbourg and Brest—the first of which was ceded to him by the King of Navarre, and the second by the Duke of Brittany, the son of the brave Countess de Montfort, who fought so heroically at Hennebon during the early part of the reign of Edward III. These towns were surrendered to the English in exchange for their assistance against the French, and not obtained by force of arms: so that when John of Gaunt returned home again, people complained, and said that although great expense had been incurred, he had achieved nothing.

Edward had bequeathed many quarrels to his grandson; and the Scots, who were in alliance with France, renewed the war. A bold Scottish adventurer, named John Mercer, having contrived to collect a fleet, sailed with it to Scarborough, and captured every ship he found there. The indignation of the English people was very great against the perpetrators of this outrage, and also against their own rulers, who, they thought, had encouraged it by apathy and negligence. John Philpot, one of the aldermen above mentioned, was a man of great courage and decision. Without applying for the sanction of the government, he fitted out a little fleet from his own purse, and sailed in pursuit of the Scotch plunderer, Mercer. The heroic alderman soon came up with his foe, and a fierce battle was fought, in which the Scot and fifteen of the ships were captured, and all the vessels taken from Scarborough recovered. The English people received the alderman with triumphant joy and gratitude; but they cursed the Duke of Lancaster, who was commander of the fleet, and should therefore have protected their coasts. The council of government censured Philpot for his presumption in having acted without their orders; but he replied that he had incurred their anger because, by teaching them their duty, he had snatched from their brows the proudest laurels of nobility. This answer was not very palatable to them; but Philpot was so popular that they dared not interfere with him. In 1378, a party of Scotch adventurers, led by Alexander Ramsay, surprised and captured the castle of Berwick; whilst a Scotch army crossed the borders, and devastated the northern counties. The Earl of Northumberland, with a force of 10,000 men, recaptured the castle of Berwick with some difficulty: he then entered the southern counties of Scotland, inflicting similar injuries there to those committed by the Scotch in England. This warfare, inglorious to both parties, was continued through 1379. In 1380, John of Gaunt marched at the head of a powerful army to Scotland; and after a few unimportant passages at arms, a truce for three years was concluded.

The little wars in which the English government engaged, though they brought no renown, and very little advantage, still caused great expense. The affairs of the kingdom seemed to have been ill-managed; the royal treasury was soon empty; and the people had been so oppressed by heavy taxes during the last and present reigns, that they were in no humour to re-fill it. In this state of things, the parliament (1378) levied a tax which was considered extremely oppressive. It was called the capitation, or poll-tax; and by it every male and female above the age of fifteen, was to pay the sum of three groats; but to make it fall lighter upon the poor, it was also arranged that they should be assisted in paying it by the rich, in such a manner that no person should pay less than one groat or more than sixty.

The imposition of this tax produced a startling and terrible insurrection, and threw the whole country, and especially the metropolis, into fear and confusion. But the poll-tax was not the only cause of the great commotions which followed it. A change was going on in several countries in Europe; the minds of the people were awakening. They began to see the state of passive degradation in which they had so long lived, and to crave for a change. They had been serfs and villeins, and they desired to become free men: the oppression of the nobles and gentry had been more than they could bear, and they resolved to make an effort to be recognised as fellow-men. A revolution had taken place in Flanders; France had been torn by commotions; and England was ready to follow the same example. In the latter country, the lower order of people were, at that time, little regarded, and were frequently treated with great discourtesy by their superiors. They were, no doubt, very ignorant and rude, and not very likely to attract much kindness from those above them; but their masters and rulers should have taught them better, and some of them suffered severely for not having done so.

The peasantry of England were in this irritable state of mind when the poll-tax was imposed; and their ill-temper was increased by the severity with which it was collected. Many fierce disputes arose between the collectors and the people about the ages of young folks; the former declaring that they were of the age of fifteen, and therefore liable to pay the tax; the latter often contending that their children were beneath that age, and consequently exempt from it. In many parts of Kent and Essex the collectors behaved with so much rudeness and violence, that they were attacked and driven away by the people, and some of them even killed. In consequence of this, royal commissioners were sent into the disturbed districts, that their authority might produce the necessary submission and payment; but the people of Fobbing, in Essex, treated the commissioner and his officers with no more ceremony than they had shown to the collectors. Upon this, the chief justice of the Common Pleas was sent from London to try the offenders, but he was compelled to fly for his life; and the jurors and clerks of the commission fell victims to the fury of the people, who cut off their heads, carried them on poles through the neighbouring country, and called upon all poor men to rise and join them in opposing the oppressors.

Their summons was numerously responded to; and in a little time, not only the whole peasantry of Essex had risen in revolt, but those of Kent, Suffolk, Norfolk, and Lincoln were rapidly following the example. They soon found a leader in a turbulent priest, who assumed the name of Jack Straw, and the insurrection was becoming every hour more formidable.

Even at this period, had the tax-gatherers been withdrawn, the tax repealed or modified, and the people treated with more consideration, the riot would probably have ceased, and the peasantry have returned to their homes and labour. But the government persevered in its obnoxious course, and an outrage committed by one of the collectors extended and strengthened the rebellion. He entered the shop of a blacksmith at Dartford, in Kent, and demanded the tax for his daughter, a young maiden, whose mother declared she was not yet fifteen, and therefore exempt from the payment of it. This tax-gatherer was a coarse, vulgar ruffian; and he not only declared that the poor girl was of the age set down by act of parliament, but he offered a very shameful insult to her in order to prove it. Shrinking from the fellow, she uttered a loud cry of terror; and her swarthy-faced, brawny-armed father, who was at work in the neighbourhood, rushed in to know the cause of his daughter's fear. Learning the violence that had been offered to his child, the blacksmith snatched a heavy hammer from his anvil, and with one blow laid the intruder dead at his feet. The news spread through the neighbouring villages, and Wat Tyler—for such was the blacksmith's name—was soon surrounded and congratulated by hundreds of peasants and working-men, who regarded him as a hero and deliverer.

About the same time, a gentleman named Sir Simon Burley, went to Gravesend, attended by an armed force, and seizing a respectable working-man, carried him off to prison as his escaped serf. This added fuel to the fire of insurrection; a cry of indignation and a shout for vengeance arose from the suffering people, and the peasantry and artisans of all the surrounding counties rose in arms. The determined Wat Tyler was chosen as their leader; and a priest, named John Ball, who had been imprisoned for heresy, was liberated from confinement and made their preacher. Jack Straw and his followers also joined them; and so did other leaders, who assumed the names of Hob Carter and Tom Miller. This was done as a boast of their mean condition, and to show their contempt of the nobles and gentry. The latter had long subjected them to serfdom and tyranny; and now these ignorant men retaliated by plundering their homes, and sometimes murdering the occupants.

These events took place in the year 1381; and in the month of June, Wat Tyler, and an immense host of people marched into the city of Canterbury. Wild and fierce-looking groups they were, but still with something grotesque about them. Some few were armed with axes, bows, swords, or hammers; but the greater number with nothing more than stout-knotted sticks. Some were decently dressed; many were arrayed in rich but ill-fitting garments, that they had stolen from the houses of the gentry; but multitudes tramped on in rags, and with bare heads and feet, their eager eyes, dark, sunburnt faces, and tangled hair giving them a wild, gipsy look. Men of all ages were there, from the grey-haired grandfather to the mere lad who scarcely understood the cause of all the tumult, and many haggard, anxious-looking women, who left their now deserted homes to follow their husbands in this strange, ill-judged pursuit of liberty.

Tyler's object in Canterbury was to put the archbishop to death, for the people regarded him as their enemy: that prelate, however, had already fled from the city. Disappointed in their intention, the insurgents seized three rich men, and beheaded them; then compelling the mayor and inhabitants to swear to be true to King Richard and the Commons of England, they marched away in triumph to London, followed by some hundreds of the poor people of Canterbury.

When Tyler and his followers reached Blackheath, they halted, and their numbers are said to have amounted to as many as 100,000 men. Here the king's mother, who, with a few attendants, was returning from a pilgrimage to Canterbury, was stopped by them; but on learning who she was, the vast mob treated her with respect, with the exception that a few rough swarthy men insisted on kissing the still attractive woman, who was once known as the Fair Maid of Kent. They then escorted her in safety through the host, for they loved the memory of the Black Prince too well to offer any insult to his widow; and their kisses, though somewhat unsavoury, were still but rude expressions of an admiring attachment. Other people who fell into their hands were not so fortunate, for all the judges and lawyers they could seize they instantly put to death.

While they remained encamped at Blackheath and in its neighbourhood, John Ball, the priest, occupied their attention with sermons, or rather speeches. His text was generally this quaint, proverbial rhyme—

> "When Adam delved, and Eve span,
> Who was then a gentleman?"

He said that, in the Scripture, they were told that all mankind came from one common origin, and were all equal in the sight of God: that the beasts of the field and the birds of the air were not for the rich alone, but were intended by their beneficent Author to be equally shared by rich and poor together. Consequently, he recommended a general equality of rank and property, and a leveling of all men to the same condition. With some truth there is more falsehood in this reasoning. In one sense all men are equal in the eyes of their Creator; and all who will labour to produce the fruits of the earth have a right to a share of them. But God has not been pleased to make all men equal in personal gifts; some possess intellect, learning, and industry, while others are weak-minded, ignorant, and idle; and it is therefore impossible to keep them on an equality, even for a single day. The strong will rise above the level, and the weak sink below it; the wise will lead, and the ignorant follow; industry will accumulate property, while idleness will want bread. This is not an artificial state of society, but the result of the natural laws of the world, and all attempts at defeating it only end in failure and confusion. But the poor ignorant men that John Ball preached to did not understand these things; and as he was possessed of a certain uncultivated eloquence, his harangues excited them to a state of enthusiasm.

From Blackheath the rioters went to London, and halted at Mile End, which was then a wide open ground, used for sports and military exercises. The young king had taken shelter in the Tower, and they sent a message to him, demanding a conference. The Archbishop of Canterbury, who also had fled there for safety, advised him by no means to go; but Richard courageously determined to face the rebels, and try to soothe them into tranquillity, and persuade them to return to their homes. Entering his barge, he sailed down the river as far as Rotherhithe, where multitudes of Tyler's followers were collected. On seeing the king approach, they set up such a shout, that it frightened his attendants, who turned the boat round, and rowed back to the Tower for protection.

Marching along the banks of the river, the insurgents demolished the Marshalsea and King's Bench prisons; and, proceeding to Lambeth, burnt the furniture and records of the primate. Afterwards they entered the city, and were joined by a number of the common people there. At first they behaved very orderly, stealing nothing, and paying for all they wanted. But they could not refrain from attacking the Savoy Palace, the residence of John of Gaunt, who was much hated by them, notwithstanding that he was an intelligent and liberal nobleman, and the patron and friend of both Wycliffe and Chaucer. They still supposed that he had a treasonous design of supplanting his nephew upon the throne, though he seems to have been quite innocent of any such intention, and they burnt his palace to the ground. Yet they would not plunder it further than by drinking all the duke's wine, as they wished it to be understood that their object was to punish their oppressors, and not to profit by general confusion. So far were they animated by this spirit, that having detected one of their number in stealing a silver cup, they threw him into the Thames, cup and all.

Excited by the work of destruction, and by the wine they had drunk, they next attacked and demolished Newgate, the Fleet, the Temple, and other public buildings. From one kind of outrage they easily proceeded to another, and resolved on the shocking idea of putting to death all who were opposed to them. Of every one whom they met in their progress through the city, they demanded—"For whom holdest thou?" This was a kind of pass-word; and the answer to it was—"With King Richard and the true Commons;" and all who were unfortunate enough not to know this response, were instantly beheaded. Against the Flemings, and other foreign merchants who lived in London, they were particularly furious, because they had a foolish notion that they lost all that the foreigners gained in their mutual transactions. Thirty of these unhappy men were dragged from the altar of a church, where they had taken refuge, and savagely butchered in the streets, amidst shouts of fiendish delight. All restraint was then removed; order and mercy were forgotten; and when night closed in, London was illuminated by the flames of burning houses, the dust of the city was laid with streams of blood, and ghastly, headless corpses lay exposed in the open streets. That night was spent in one wild orgie of horror, worthy of the fiends themselves.

The next morning, the 14th of June, the mob assembled around the Tower, and with dreadful cries and shouts, demanded the heads of the king's ministers. The young king, who feared that the fortress could not long afford protection, sent the rebels word, that if they would retire to Mile End, he would meet them, and grant all their desires. To this the people consented, and the drawbridge being lowered, the youthful sovereign, attended by a slender retinue, all unarmed, rode forth and led the way. A great part of that vast mass followed, and in a short time Richard found himself at Mile End, in the presence of 60,000 armed and rebellious men. He had not yet reached his sixteenth year, but he displayed a courage and composure which even men seldom possess; and, indeed, his two half-brothers who started with him from the Tower, were so terrified that they abandoned him by the way, and rode back to the fortress for safety.

The great concourse of rebels was no doubt struck with a rude admiration of the young, handsome monarch, and of his courage, in thus placing his life in their hands. Their fierce swarthy faces softened into a milder expression, and, with an air of respect, they presented to him their demands. These were—first, the total abolition of slavery for themselves and their children for ever; second, the reduction of the rent of good land to fourpence the acre; third, the full liberty of buying and selling, like other men, in all fairs and markets; and, fourth, a general pardon for all offences. With a smiling face, Richard declared that all their desires were granted; but he had no intention of keeping his word. The people, who believed in his sincerity, were satisfied, and they separated, the greater part of them returning to their homes.

The men of Kent were the most determined of the rebels, and they, with many desperate rioters, did not follow the king to Mile End, but remained behind, for the purpose of attacking the Tower, and wreaking their vengeance upon the ministers. The attack upon the Tower was so easily successful, that it has been suspected the garrison within it, which consisted of 1,200 soldiers, was favourably disposed towards them. This seems the more likely, because we do not hear that the soldiers were slaughtered; but the rebels seized their old enemy, the Archbishop of Canterbury; Sir Robert Hales, the treasurer; together with the king's confessor, and several persons who had made themselves disliked by farming the taxes, and put them all to death. The king's mother again fell into their hands; but even in the madness of their wrath they spared her, merely, as before, insisting upon extorting a few kisses. Overcome with terror, she was carried away by her ladies in a state of insensibility.

The queen-mother was taken across the river, and lodged for safety in a house called the Royal Wardrobe, and there she was joined by Richard on his return from Mile End. From that place he sent to Wat Tyler and his followers the conditions which had been accepted by the rest of the insurgents, but they rejected them with contempt; and even much larger promises met with no better favour. The next day the young sovereign resolved on again trying the effect of a personal appeal to them. Mounting his horse, he rode away with a few attendants, amongst whom was the Mayor of London, and met Wat Tyler, and a great host of the rebels, in Smithfield. Richard's company did not exceed sixty persons; and when they arrived in front of the Abbey of St. Bartholomew, they found before them thousands upon thousands of fierce armed rustics, who swayed backwards and forwards like a living sea. "Ah!" exclaimed Tyler, when he beheld the royal party, "Here is the king! I will go and speak to him. Move neither hand nor foot until I give you a signal."

Tyler was a man of gigantic stature; and his muscular arms and broad chest betokened immense strength. His bronzed face was flushed with an air of insolent triumph; and his dark, shaggy hair gave him a wild brigand-like appearance. Yet there was something striking in the man; and his broad forehead, bold flashing eye, dilated nostrils, and erect bearing, bespoke him fit to lead and command a multitude of rude and ignorant men. He was armed with a sword and dagger, though he wore those weapons sheathed; and was mounted on a powerful and high-bred steed, no doubt once the property of some wealthy victim of the popular fury.

Riding up to his sovereign with an air of bravado, the bold blacksmith fixed his eyes on the boy-king, and exclaimed—"King! dost thou see all those men there?" As he asked this question, Tyler played carelessly with the hilt of his dagger; but the son of the Black Prince did not quail or shrink from the bold glance that was fixed upon him; and with a calm, self-possessed air, he replied—"I do; why dost thou ask?" "Because," was the answer, "they do all at my will; and have sworn by their faith and loyalty to do whatsoever I bid them." At this moment, some writers say that Tyler seized the bridle of the king's horse: this is not certain; but no doubt he committed some threatening or insolent act which created an alarm for the safety of the young monarch. John Walworth, the Lord Mayor, thinking that, perhaps, the blunt rebel intended to kill his sovereign, suddenly struck him so violent a blow with a sword or mace that he reeled in his saddle, and then, with a heavy shock, fell to the earth. The eyes of Tyler glared like those of a wild beast, as he endeavoured to rise from the ground; but one of the king's esquires, drawing his sword, plunged it almost to the hilt in the body of the fallen man. Giving a heavy groan, he beat his hands convulsively together for a little while, and then expired.

A wild outcry of passion arose from the vast crowd. "We are betrayed!" they shouted; "they have killed our captain; they have murdered our leader!" A forest of clubs rose in the air, among them gleamed the bright heads of spears and axes; and many of the rebels who were armed with bows, had already fitted their arrows to the string. It was a moment of imminent peril to the young sovereign: to have hesitated, or to have shown the least sign of fear, would have been to bring down certain destruction upon himself and his whole party. Richard did neither; the intrepidity of his father animated him at that moment. Riding boldly up to the enraged mob, he shouted loudly to them "What are you doing, my people? Tyler was a traitor. I am your king; and I will be your guide and captain."

There is something in a generous courage, especially when shown in youth, and aided by personal attractions, which disarms opposition, and triumphs over brute force. It is said that the steady gaze of a fearless man will intimidate a lion. This instance was no exception: the rebels lowered their weapons, and gazed with a half-incredulous, half-believing look upon the handsome face of the young monarch. Taking advantage of this momentary impression in his favour, he induced them to follow him to the open fields about Islington. There he was joined by Sir Robert Knollys and a large body of soldiers, at whose appearance many of the rustics slunk away, and running through the neighbouring corn-fields, made for their homes; the rest the king dismissed with the charter which he had previously granted to the men of Essex. Sir Robert Knollys wanted very much to be permitted to attack the people with his troops, and kill as many of them as possible, but Richard very justly would not allow him.

It would have been a happy thing, both for himself and his subjects, if the young king had kept to this merciful and generous course; but soon afterwards, when he had collected a numerous army, he told the people that he did not intend to observe the charters which had been extorted from him: and that his promises of freedom from slavery, and pardon for past offences, meant nothing whatever. For this treachery he was punished severely in after-times, when the whole nation fell from his side, and abandoned him to the merciless hands of a usurper; but now he had everything his own way. The people were greatly exasperated by his duplicity; and the men of Kent collected together in order to defend their rights, and compel him to observe his promises; but undisciplined men cannot stand the attacks of regular troops. They were defeated, great numbers of them slain, and the rest dispersed in confusion. Then began the slower but more terrible slaughter by the law: officers and judges were sent throughout the disturbed districts to arrest and try the offenders. Hundreds were condemned to death; and the headsman was at work incessantly. But this was a slow process; and the victims accumulated so rapidly, that it was thought hanging would be a quicker means. Soon, a hideous row of gibbets was erected, and the dead bodies left hanging on them for days, to strike terror into the survivors, and produce in them a habit of submission. The peasantry were shocked at this sight; they regarded the victims as martyrs rather than criminals; and, taking the bodies down at night from the gibbets, buried them secretly; and no doubt these hidden graves were often hallowed by the sad tears and prayers of bereaved women and little fatherless children. To prevent this, the king, with a severity unsuited to his youth, ordered the rebels to be hanged in chains, so that they could not be removed; and thus a new and revolting ceremony arose in England, which was continued until very lately. One old chronicler tells us that no less than 1,500 executions took place after this wild insurrection. Thus ended this outbreak of the poor against oppression; and it finished so sadly because it was conducted by ignorant men, who employed violence instead of moderation, bloodshed and terror instead of reason and moral power. Had their demands been urged in a different spirit, it is hardly possible that, as they were in themselves so reasonable, they could have been long withheld. Alas, for the poor!—not in those remote days alone, but in this more prosperous and enlightened time—the grim gigantic cause of half their miseries was, and is, ignorance; still, ambitious and designing demagogues mislead and direct them to serve their own purposes.

All the events we have narrated took place in 1381; and they produced no results. Nothing more was said about the poll-tax, and it was suffered to fall into gradual forgetfulness. Some little inquiry was, indeed, at first made into the causes of the late rebellion, but nothing was done to remedy them; and things went on much as they had done before that event.

The following year, that of 1382, an event of a very different character took place. The young king, though little more than sixteen years of age, was married to Anne of Bohemia, the daughter of Charles IV., the Emperor of Germany. She was a kind-hearted and accomplished young lady, and so won the good opinions of the people, that they afterwards called her the "good Queen Anne." A period of more than three years then rolled on, which was chiefly occupied by Richard's quarrels with his uncle, John of Gaunt, who was accused, by a friar, of being engaged in a conspiracy to dethrone his nephew. The accusation appears to have been groundless; but there was one suspicious circumstance attending the transaction. The duke having insisted that his accuser should be arrested, that he might prove his charge, or be punished for his falsehood, the monk was committed to the custody of one of the king's half-brothers, and one morning found dead in his bed. It was reported that he was murdered in a manner too shocking for description. Through a jealous fear of his uncles, Richard then began to surround himself with favourites—those inseparable companions of weak-minded sovereigns; and the great hopes which men had so lately entertained of his manliness and kingly qualities were fast melting away.

CHAPTER XXX.

CONCLUSION OF THE REIGN OF RICHARD THE SECOND.—A.D. 1385—1399.

IN the year 1385, war re-commenced with Scotland. The truce with that country having expired, the Scots became the aggressors, and, in conjunction with a body of French cavalry, ravaged the English borders. Richard, assisted by his uncle, John of Gaunt, collected an army of 60,000 men, and marched into Scotland to chastise the invaders. But the Scots had deserted their dwellings, and driven their cattle into the woods; the English, therefore, found the country barren, and unable to support them: so, after burning Melrose, Drysdale, and even Edinburgh, they were compelled to return to their own country. As usual on these occasions, numbers of the common soldiers died on the way back, from want and sickness. While the English were thus devastating Scotland, the Scotch, taking care to avoid the enemy's troops, entered England by a different route, and ravaged and plundered the county of Cumberland. They attacked Carlisle, but were repulsed with great loss. Richard was advised by his uncle to wait for them on their return, and punish them for their depredations upon his subjects; but he was impatient to get back to his pleasures and his favourites, and therefore marched home again, having done no more mischief to Scotland than the people of that country had inflicted upon England.

The Scots had calculated a great deal upon the assistance of the French; and the English had cause to dread a close union between the people of those nations. But the French did not like the barren country and dull habits of their allies, and the Scots soon began to quarrel with the French. "What evil spirit brought you here?" said they; "cannot we maintain our war with England well enough without your help? Pack up your goods and begone! for no good will be done as long as you are here. We neither understand you, nor you us. We cannot converse together; and, in a short time, we shall be completely wasted and eaten up by such troops of locusts. Even the English never occasioned so much mischief as you do."

John of Gaunt was married to a daughter of Pedro the Cruel, the late King of Castille; and in consequence of this connection he had long laid claim to the throne of that country. This claim was, of course, opposed by the reigning Prince of Castille; so the English duke now collected an army of 10,000 men, among whom was the flower of the young English nobles, and sailed to Spain to maintain what he considered to be his right. Though unpopular with the people, and suspected by his nephew, he had still been the great support of the government; and the French, delighted at his absence, determined on an invasion of England. The disturbed state of this country, in consequence of the late insurrections, also gave them hopes of success. Charles VI., the King of France, made immense preparations, and collected a noble army of 100,000 men. A magnificent fleet lay at Sluys ready for the embarkation of the soldiers, and their conveyance to the scene of the expected conquest. The design of the French monarch was, however, crushed even in its birth. A terrible storm arose and dispersed his fleet: many of the vessels were wrecked and lost; others were captured by the English; and then Charles disbanded his army in despair, and found himself unable to wring money enough from his people with which to collect another.

Richard, who was now approaching his twentieth year, abandoned himself to pleasure, and to the society of his favourites. The chief of these was a young noble, named Robert de Vere; and the next, Michael de la Pole, the son of an eminent merchant, who had risen to the dignity of chancellor, and been lately created Earl of Suffolk. These men, especially the former, exercised so great an influence over him, that it excited the jealousy of both nobles and people. This was not surprising, for the king had bestowed honours and gifts of the most unusual kind upon De Vere—first creating him Marquis of Dublin (a title before unknown in England), and then Duke of Ireland. Nor was this merely an empty honour, for the king bestowed with it the whole revenue of Ireland, upon condition of his receiving an annual tribute of 5,000 marks a year.

When the parliament met in the October of 1386, a message was sent to the king, desiring that De la Pole, the chancellor, might be dismissed from his court and favour. Richard at first refused, saying that he would not, on their account, remove the meanest scullion in his kitchen. The parliament insisted: it was supported by the king's uncle, the Duke of Gloucester, who, since John of Gaunt had gone into Spain, had taken the lead in public affairs; and the young monarch was compelled to submit and abandon his favourite. The Duke of Gloucester, and the nobles who were of his party, having obtained their way on this point, proceeded to a measure far more extreme and violent; they required Richard to surrender the royal power into the hands of a council of prelates and barons, who, as in the reign of Henry III., should discharge all the duties of the state. Of course, this was an expression of a total want of confidence in him, or his ability to govern; and such a measure would leave him nothing but the name of a king. Richard felt insulted and enraged; and declared he would never consent to such a proceeding. But he had so belied the hopes entertained of him in his boyhood, that the nobles had learnt to despise their king; and one member of parliament desired that the record of the deposition of Edward II. might be produced; which was intended as a strong hint of the fate Richard might expect, unless he submitted to the degrading condition required of him.

The commission of government was appointed: it consisted of fourteen prelates and barons, with the stern Duke of Gloucester at their head. The sceptre was thus wrested by the aristocracy from the feeble grasp of their king; and though still a sovereign in name, Richard was in effect dethroned. It is true, the commission was only to last for a twelvemonth; but such a power once called into existence is generally very difficult to abolish.

Richard soon repented of the great concession he had made to his nobles; and, in 1387, calling a secret assembly of the judges at Nottingham, he requested their opinions as to whether the commission of government was legal. It was certainly so far legal that it had been appointed by the king himself; but either from conviction, or a desire to please their young sovereign, the judges answered in the way which they knew would be most agreeable to him. They declared that it was not only illegal, but derogatory to the royalty and prerogative of the king; and that those who procured it, or advised the king to consent to it, were guilty of treason, and punishable with death. They added that "the king was above the laws;" but some of them gave this opinion out of fear; and one, after signing it, said, that "never did any action better deserve hanging than that he had just done." The Duke of Gloucester and his party soon heard of this secret meeting, and the conclusions at which it had arrived, and they became alarmed for their own safety. By it they were all declared to be traitors; but they determined to be beforehand with their young monarch. Collecting an army of about 40,000 men, they advanced upon London, and there Gloucester and his associates accused the advisers of Richard of treason, and demanded that they should be delivered up to them, and placed upon their trial. A few days afterwards they entered the royal presence, and accused by name the Archbishop of York; De Vere, the Duke of Ireland; the Earl of Suffolk; Sir Robert Tresilian, the chief justice; and Sir Nicholas Bember, the Lord Mayor of London. These men they declared were dangerous public enemies, whose liberty was inconsistent with the safety of the kingdom.

Three of the impeached councillors saved themselves by flight; but Tresilian, the chief justice, and Bember, the Lord Mayor, were arrested, tried before the parliament for high treason, condemned, and executed. The greatest crime seems to have been, that they had in all things supported the king's authority, and had advised him to summon the assembly of judges, who had declared the commission of government to be illegal. The three who fled were also found guilty of high treason, but they were beyond the reach of their enemies; the Archbishop of York had gone to Flanders, where he remained until his death, discharging the humble duties of a parish priest; De la Pole went to France, and died soon afterwards; while the other favourite, De Vere, the Duke of Ireland, retired to Wales, where he was authorised by the king to raise an army to oppose Gloucester and the confederated nobles. He did so, but was met and utterly defeated at Radcot Bridge, by Gloucester and Henry of Bolingbroke, the son of the absent John of Gaunt, and cousin to the king. De Vere escaped to Holland, and died there a few years afterwards.

Having thus punished the five advisers of the king, Gloucester and the council of government next proceeded against the judges who had met at Nottingham, and declared their authority to be illegal. The parliament found them all guilty of treason, and pronounced sentence of death. As they pleaded they had acted through fear of Richard, they were not executed, but banished into Ireland. Four knights, who were tried for treason for advising the king to this course, were less fortunate than the judges, for they were all sent to the scaffold. Amongst them was Sir Simon Burley, who, at the beginning of the insurrection of Wat Tyler and the peasantry, had seized and imprisoned a man at Gravesend as his runaway slave. Such an act would, probably enough, be deemed infamous now, but it does not seem to have been considered so then, for Sir Simon was greatly respected. He had been a friend of the Black Prince, and the guardian of the king in his youth, and Richard did his best to save him. Gloucester would not spare the life of the knight, and then the young queen pleaded for him upon her knees; but still the fierce duke was inexorable. and Sir Simon was sent to the scaffold.

During the summer of the year 1388, a fierce little war took place between two border barons—Earl Douglas of Scotland, and Lord Harry Percy of England, the eldest son of the powerful Earl of Northumberland, and who, for his courage and impetuosity, was named Hotspur. In the course of it, the battle of Otterburne, celebrated in our ballad literature under the name of Chevy Chase, was fought. After a desperate conflict, the English were compelled to retire, leaving their chief, Hotspur, and his brother, prisoners; but the Scottish leader, the Black Douglas, as he was called, was killed. In his last moments he thanked God that he should die as his ancestors had done, not in a bed, but on a battlefield.

The commission of government, headed by the Duke of Gloucester, had exercised the royal power for upwards of twelve months, and would, no doubt, have held it much longer, but for a brief exhibition of spirit on the part of the king. Summoning a council of his nobles, he suddenly demanded of his uncle, Gloucester, what he supposed was his age? The duke replied, "Your highness is in your twenty-second year." "Then," continued Richard, resolutely, "I am surely of age to manage my own affairs. I have been longer under the control of guardians than any ward in my dominions. I thank you, my lords, for your past services; but I want them no longer." This announcement was so unexpected, that Gloucester and his confederates, being taken by surprise, resigned their power; and the king issued a proclamation, saying that he had resumed the regal authority.

The affairs of England went on quietly for several years; the king and his uncle, Gloucester, hated each other very bitterly; but there was no absolute quarrel between them; indeed, when John of Gaunt returned from Castille, he interfered as mediator, and a hollow reconciliation took place. Both uncle and nephew professed to be very delighted, and to have a great attachment for each other, but neither of them were sincere. In the year 1394, Richard lost his wife, the good Queen Anne, who died at Sheen, now called Richmond. She seems to have exercised an influence for good upon his weak and pleasure-loving nature; and after her death his troubles fell rapidly upon him. That year the Irish made an effort to throw off the English rule; but on Richard's appearance in that country, they instantly submitted. Seventy-five chiefs did homage to him; and the English king then regaled them with splendid banquets and parades, and even exhibited to them his crown jewels, which he had carried over for the purpose of astonishing these wild Irish princes. He was desirous of conferring the dignity of knighthood upon four of them; but they said it was an honour they did not wish for, and it required a great deal of persuasion to induce them to submit to it.

Late in the year 1396, Richard visited France, and concluded a truce for twenty-five years with Charles VI., the French king. To render this the more lasting he married the daughter of that monarch, the Princess Isabella, although the young lady was not more than seven years old. The Duke of Gloucester, who disliked everything the king did, of course complained about this, and called Richard a trifler, because he preferred peace with France instead of war, as his father and grandfather had done. Indeed, this turbulent duke never missed any occasion of holding up his nephew to the dislike of the nobles and people, and never appeared at court or in council except to disapprove of what was going on there. The English people could not overcome the dislike they bore to the French, and Gloucester encouraged all their prejudices and animosities. He forgot the reverses which attended the English arms during the later years of the great Edward III., and made slighting comparisons between the glorious exploits of that monarch and the inactivity of the present one. The ignorant people soon took up these views, and the scheming troublesome duke became very popular. This opposition seems to have proceeded from a dislike of his nephew, and from an unamiable temper; but one writer of that time accuses the duke of a design of dethroning Richard, and of bestowing the crown at once upon Roger Mortimer, the Earl of March, whom the king had named as his successor; and whom, in 1395, he had appointed lord-lieutenant of Ireland.

Richard at length resolved on putting a stop to the career of this troublesome uncle; and, having arrested his friends, the Earls of Warwick and Arundel, he went to Pleshy Castle, in Essex, and, when the duke came out to meet him, caused him to be seized, put on board a ship, and carried away suddenly across the channel to the castle of Calais. The Earls of Arundel and Warwick were then tried before parliament, not for any recent treason, but for the part they had taken, years before, in the commission of government. If this were treason, many of the nobles who sat in judgment upon them had shared in it; still, such was the fear which the king's recent energy had excited, that the two earls were condemned. Arundel pleaded Richard's pardon for this old offence, but the plea was overruled, and he was condemned and executed. His brother, the Archbishop of Canterbury, was also arrested and accused of assisting in procuring the commission of government; and, as his ecclesiastical dignity preserved him from the hands of the headsman, he was condemned to banishment for life. The Earl of Warwick pleaded guilty, and acted with so much humility, that, instead of a sentence of death, he was consigned to perpetual imprisonment—a punishment scarcely more merciful. Having disposed of some of his opponents in this tyrannical manner, Richard then proceeded to wreak his vengeance on his uncle of Gloucester.

The duke had been arrested in July, 1397; and, in the following September, a warrant was sent to the governor of Calais, commanding him to produce his prisoner before the king and parliament, that he might answer the charges of treason brought against him. The governor replied that he could not produce the duke, because he had died suddenly of apoplexy. Some mystery hangs over the exact circumstances of Gloucester's death; but the general supposition was, that he was smothered in prison by his keepers, and that the murder was committed in consequence of the orders of his nephew, who feared to bring so powerful and popular a noble to trial. The sending to Calais for him to appear and take his trial was a piece of deception which failed of success, for all men believed the king to be guilty of the murder. This was the great crime of Richard's life; his other acts had proceeded chiefly from weakness of character, and that curse of kings in all states where the government is in an unsettled condition—a love of arbitrary power. This deliberate murder of his father's brother reveals a treacherous and cruel nature. The duke scarcely deserves our pity; he had been an unnatural relative, and a turbulent and dangerous subject: but, whatever are men's offences, they should always be punished for them by the laws of the land, and not by the secret violence of the assassin. The parliament had met to condemn him to death, and therefore they did not care much in what manner he perished; so they made no inquiry into the matter, but declared the murdered man a traitor, and confiscated his property.

Encouraged by this destruction of his enemies, Richard ruled in a very despotic manner. The parliament was intimidated, and passed any measures that he pleased, and he caused it to undo everything that the Duke of Gloucester and his faction had done. It voted him certain taxes, not for a year, as was usual, but for his whole life: and, before separating, confided the entire power of parliament to a commission of eighteen of the king's parasites and creatures, who advised him to do just as he pleased, and persuaded him that he could do nothing wrong.

Richard then fancied that he stood secure in his power, and abandoned himself to a gorgeous round of splendid dissipation. Never had so much expense and such magnificence been seen in the court of England. An army of archers guarded the person of the king, and his servants and attendants amounted to the enormous number of 10,000 persons; among whom were 300 cooks and kitchen-servants. This host of people were arrayed in costly liveries, and each day the royal tables creaked beneath the load of rich viands that were placed upon them. All was riot and profusion: but the king thought nothing of the toiling and beggared thousands from whom the means for this wanton luxury was wrung. So great was his power, and so arbitrary his conduct, that an historian, who for a time lived at his court, tells us, that "in those days there were none so great in England that durst speak against anything that the king did." Still, for all this, Richard resembled those thoughtless peasants who sleep in tranquillity in their little cots on the side of a volcanic mountain, while, unknown to them, a fierce red sea of liquid fire is gathering above, which will soon burst forth in irresistible fury, and sweep them to death or ruin.

Murmurs spread throughout the land; but they scarcely reached the ears of the prodigal monarch, who, when they did, turned from the repetition of them with anger. It was said that the late parliament was an illegal one, not fairly composed, but made up of Richard's friends and flatterers; that it had loaded the people with unjust and oppressive taxes; attacked the national liberties, and made no inquiry into the murder of the Duke of Gloucester. It was evident that a storm of retribution was rapidly gathering; but the heedless monarch turned away his eyes, feasted and revelled, relied upon his bands of guards and archers, and believed that all was secure.

About this time a quarrel arose between two distinguished nobles, Henry Bolingbroke, the son of John of Gaunt, and therefore cousin to the king, and Thomas Mowbray, Duke of Norfolk. They had both belonged to the party of the Duke of Gloucester; and were, indeed, the only nobles of that party then left alive. In a private conversation, Mowbray remarked to Bolingbroke that the king was of a revengeful and treacherous nature; and that he feared that, notwithstanding the pardon they had received, their lives were not safe, in consequence of the opposition they had offered to him. He added, that the favourites of the king were, at that moment, laying snares for the lives of many of the principal nobles of the land. Bolingbroke was so void of honour that he revealed this conversation to the king. Mowbray then denied that he had spoken what was attributed to him; called Bolingbroke a liar and traitor; and, challenging him to the field, offered to prove his own innocence by duel. The king consented to this mode of trial; and appointed that, on the 16th of September, 1398, the combat should take place at Coventry. When the day arrived, nearly all the nobles of England were assembled; for a great sensation had been excited; and they were divided into parties, one siding with Bolingbroke and the other with Mowbray. The combatants entered the lists, and were about to engage, when Richard threw down his warder as a signal to stop. To prevent the effusion of blood between men of such high rank, and the probable future consequences of the quarrel, he decreed that both the champions should be banished—Mowbray for ever, and Bolingbroke for a period of ten years. This sentence was unjust, because both could not be guilty of treason; nor was it proved against either; and unwise, because it created for the king two powerful enemies.

The Duke of Norfolk, who seems to have been the most honourable of the two, made a pilgrimage to the Holy Land, and, on his return, died a solitary man in the gay city of Venice. Bolingbroke, whose sentence, before he left, was, on account of his submissive behaviour, reduced to six years of exile, retired to France. Our great national poet has thus touchingly made the banished noble allude to this graceless act of mercy:—

> "How long a time lies in one little word!
> Four lagging winters, and four wanton springs > End in a word! Such is the breath of kings."

Richard had now got rid of all whom he feared or hated; and he revelled more recklessly than ever. His despotic temper knew no bounds; and he governed in the most wantonly tyrannical manner; extorting money from whoever he pleased, and intimidating the judges into passing such sentences as he desired. In a fit of insolent folly, he actually outlawed seventeen counties because, nearly twelve years ago, they had been favourable to Gloucester and Bolingbroke, when those noblemen defeated his favourite, De Vere, at Radcot Bridge. On the death of John of Gaunt, which took place a few months after the banishment of his son [A.D. 1399], Richard seized the immense estates of that aged statesman, to whose advice and assistance he owed so much; although he had promised Bolingbroke that he should inherit them in the same way as if he had remained in England. To banish a man unjustly, and then to seize his wealth, is tyranny and theft; but to these offences Richard added the crime of murder; for he arrested and hanged the lawyer who interfered on behalf of the absent noble. By acts of this character Richard increased the power of the crown, but he made himself detested by the whole of his people.

This was the time he chose to pay a second visit to Ireland. The chiefs of that country had again risen in arms; and in a skirmish with them, the Earl of March was slain. The king evinced a determination to avenge his death; and, gathering a magnificent fleet, he sailed over in the month of May, 1399. He took leave of his little queen at Windsor, and lifting her up in his arms, kissed her very affectionately, saying—"Adieu, adieu, till we meet again!" He did not then dream that he would never more behold her face. Before his departure, information was given him of the existence of conspiracies and insurrections against his crown; but he seems to have disregarded it. Of one person he had some suspicion—the Earl of Northumberland—whom he therefore summoned to join his standard, and follow him to Ireland. The earl made some excuse, and refused to obey, on which Richard proclaimed him a traitor, and sailed without him.

Henry Bolingbroke, or the Duke of Lancaster (for he had succeeded to that title on account of the death of his father, John of Gaunt), had been exceedingly popular in England before his exile. The people loved him; and he was much respected amongst his fellow nobles, many of the most powerful of whom were related to him. He well knew how much Richard was disliked by his subjects; and before that monarch had left England a fortnight, Bolingbroke returned to it. On the 4th of July he landed at Ravenspur, in Yorkshire, bringing with him the exiled Archbishop of Canterbury, and a retinue of not more than sixty persons. This looked like mere rashness; but he had taken his measures with prudence as well as boldness; and no sooner had he stepped on shore than he was joined by the powerful Earls of Northumberland and Westmoreland. He took a solemn oath that he had no purpose in returning from exile except to recover his father's estates, which King Richard had so unjustly kept from him; and he invited all his friends in England, and all lovers of their country, to assist him in this reasonable object. He marched on towards London; and by the time he reached that city, his appeal was so numerously responded to that he was at the head of 60,000 men. The citizens received him with joy: they were glad to see some one ready and powerful enough to humble their tyrannical sovereign; and they did not then imagine that Bolingbroke's designs went so far beyond the recovery of his patrimony as to aim at the crown.

The king's uncle, the Duke of York, had been left guardian of the kingdom during his nephew's absence; but he was a weak old man; and after some few feeble efforts on behalf of Richard, he also, though not very willingly, joined Bolingbroke, and assisted him to take Bristol Castle, in which several of the king's favourites had taken shelter. Three of them—the Earl of Wiltshire, Sir John Bussy, and Sir Henry Green—were ordered to be executed immediately, as misleaders of the king. Lancaster had no authority for the commission of this illegal act; but it delighted the people, and extended his popularity.

A tempestuous sea prevented this ill news from reaching Richard until Henry of Lancaster had been some weeks in England. The messenger found the king at Dublin, employed, as usual, in feasting and revelling. On learning what had occurred, he turned pale with anger, and said he was sorry he had not put Henry to death. He then called his council together to decide what was the best course to take; and it was agreed that it would be the wisest plan to return instantly to England, and meet the danger face to face. Whether from treachery or ignorance, the Earl of Albemarle assured him that affairs were not so bad as had been represented; and advised him to send a body of troops into Wales as a protection for his friends, and to remain in Ireland himself until he had collected ships enough to carry back his whole army to England. He adopted this advice; and the delay occasioned by it transformed the fugitive Henry of Lancaster into an irresistible enemy.

When Richard did land in Milford Haven, he brought with him an army of 20,000 men: but their hearts were not with their king, and the greater part almost immediately deserted him. The few who remained were useless, and only calculated to lead him into danger. Disguising himself, therefore, as a priest, he fled from them to Conway Castle, in Wales, where he expected to find the Earl of Salisbury and his forces. He did indeed find the earl, and about a hundred soldiers with him; but the rest, like his own, had deserted. The provisions of the fortress were almost consumed; and want and despair were now the companions of the once prodigal and wanton king.

In this forlorn condition he was captured by the Earl of Northumberland, who is said to have acted in a very treacherous manner towards him, and conducted him to Flint Castle. There he bitterly lamented that he had not put his opponent to death. "Fool that I was!" he said; "thrice did I save the life of this Henry of Lancaster. Once my dear uncle, his father—on whom the Lord have mercy!—would have put him to death for his treason and villany. God of Paradise! I rode all night to save him; and his father delivered him to me to do with him as I pleased. How true is the saying, that we have no greater enemy than the man whom we have preserved from the gallows! Another time he drew his sword on me, in the chamber of the queen, on whom God have mercy! He was also the accomplice of the Duke of Gloucester and the Earl of Arundel: he consented to my murder, to that of my father, and of all my council. By St. John! I forgave him all: nor would I believe his father, who, more than once, pronounced him deserving of death." The next morning he ascended the tower, and beheld the approach of Bolingbroke and his army. At first he cursed the Earl of Northumberland: then, bursting into tears, he cried, "Good Lord God! I commend myself into Thy holy keeping, and cry Thee mercy, that Thou wouldst pardon all my sins. If they put me to death, I will take it patiently, as Thou didst for us all." When the triumphant Bolingbroke entered the castle, he hypocritically knelt to Richard as to his king. The fallen sovereign uncovered his head, and exclaimed, "Fair cousin of Lancaster, you are right welcome." The proud duke replied, "My lord, I am returned from banishment before my time; but I will tell you the reason. Your people complain that you have ruled them harshly for twenty-two years; but, if it please God, I will help you to rule them better." Richard was then mounted on a miserable horse, and led to Chester; and it is said by Froissart, that at this moment, even his dog, a beautiful greyhound, called Math, abandoned him, and fawned upon Bolingbroke. From Chester the king was taken to London, where he was cursed and insulted by the people; and after having been paraded through the streets in contempt, was committed as a prisoner to the Tower.

Bolingbroke, like Richard, was of royal blood, and the grandson of Edward III.; and although not the next in succession, he resolved on raising himself to the throne of England. To accomplish this, he sent a deputation of prelates, nobles, and lawyers to the imprisoned king, to induce him to resign his crown. The fallen monarch readily renounced his royalty, and sent his ring to the usurper, saying, that of all men, he should be his successor, if he had the power to name one. Of course he was not sincere in this remark, but made it from a fear that his life was in danger. Richard's resignation, signed on the 29th of September, 1399, was read in parliament the next day, and accepted with great joy. A charge of tyranny and misconduct, consisting of no less than thirty-three articles, was then presented against him. Amongst these acts of tyranny were—the murder of the Duke of Gloucester; his conduct to the nobles, who, in the early part of his reign, had usurped his authority by procuring the commission of government; his violations of the laws and liberties of his people; his seizure of the estates of the Duke of Lancaster; and, among many other arbitrary acts, the granting to his favourites protection from law-suits. The charge was read and passed with only one dissenting voice—it was that of the Bishop of Carlisle, who spoke very courageously in favour of the captive king. He said that all the abuses of government which could be imputed to Richard did not amount to tyranny, but were rather the result of error, youth, or misguided counsel; and that they might be remedied much better than by changing the succession, and subverting the laws of the land. He urged, that a rebellious disposition in subjects was the principal cause of tyranny in kings; and that, if the sovereign was not safe, the people could never expect security. That the deposition of Edward II. by the parliament was only an example of successful violence, and therefore ought not to be regarded as a precedent: for it was sad enough that crimes were so often committed, without citing them as instances to justify others. That a descendant of Lionel, Duke of Clarence, the elder brother of John of Gaunt, the late Duke of Lancaster, had been declared successor to the crown; that he had left a son, who was, therefore, their true king on the death of Richard. That Henry of Bolingbroke, the present Duke of Lancaster, had no legal claim, and that he would give a bad instance of the moderation of his future government, if he added to the crime of his past rebellion the guilt of excluding the family which, both by right of blood and by declaration of parliament, would, in case of Richard's death, or voluntary resignation, have been received as the undoubted heirs of the monarchy.

The bishop's speech, instead of benefiting the king, only brought suspicion and trouble upon himself. Henry, and the nobles who surrounded him, listened to it with impatient anger; and when the prelate sat down, he was arrested and carried away as a prisoner. This was an act of shameful tyranny; but very little freedom of speech was permitted in those days, and Henry knew that his claim to the crown would not bear discussion. A sentence of deposition was then solemnly recorded against Richard; and Bolingbroke, advancing towards the empty throne, made the sign of the cross upon his forehead and his breast, and pronounced these words:—"In the name of God the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, I, Henry of Lancaster, challenge this realm of England and the crown, with all the members and the appurtenances, because that I am descended by right line of the blood from the good King Henry III.; and through that right that God of his grace hath sent me, with the help of my kin and of my friends, to recover it; the which realm was in point to be undone for default of government, and undoing of the good laws."

The Duke of Lancaster claimed the crown in consequence of his descent from Henry III., instead of from the great Edward III., on the following ground:—Henry III. left two sons, Edward, who succeeded him, and Edmond, who was created Earl of Lancaster. An unfounded story was in circulation among the common people, that Edmond was the elder brother of Edward I.; but that on account of some deformity in his person, he had been set aside, and his brother made king in his stead: therefore as the present Duke of Lancaster was descended from Edmond on his mother's side, this genealogy made him the true heir to the monarchy. No one of any rank or intelligence believed this improbable tale; but Bolingbroke thought it would convince many of the ignorant people.

After Henry's speech he knelt and prayed for a short time upon the steps of the throne; then rising, he was assisted to his seat on it by the Archbishops of Canterbury and York. From that instant he assumed the power of a king; and, after directing that the old parliament should be summoned again in his name, departed in royal state, and invited the prelates and nobles to a banquet which had been prepared in Whitehall. On the 13th of the following month (October, 1399), he was crowned as Henry IV. at Westminster Abbey. By a singular circumstance, the ceremony took place on the anniversary of the very day on which he was banished. The Order of the Bath was instituted by Henry at his coronation. He conferred it upon forty-six esquires, who had watched and bathed the previous night.

A few days after Henry's coronation, he sent the Earl of Northumberland to the prelates and barons in parliament, to ask their advice as to what should be done with the deposed monarch. That nobleman added, that, under any circumstances, Henry intended to spare his life. They replied, that he should be imprisoned in some secret place, and guarded by faithful officers, who should prevent his having any communication with his friends or followers. In accordance with this decision, he was taken about from one castle to another at night, just as Edward II. had been, and finally lodged in the castle at Pontefract. In the month of January in the following year (1400), he died there, and his body was brought to London, and exhibited, for two hours, to the gaze of the people, the face being uncovered, and the head reclining on a black cushion. There is a story that he was murdered by a knight called Sir Piers Exton, and some other ruffians, several of whom he killed before he received his death-blow. This is generally disbelieved, and is certainly inconsistent with the fact of the corpse being exposed to view in St. Paul's, for in that case the wounds would have been seen, and the murder discovered. Another account (and that appears to be the true one) is, that he was starved to death. Stowe says, that for "fifteen days and nights they vexed him with continual hunger, thirst, and cold, and finally bereft him of his life with such a kind of death as never before that time was known in England." Some of the old chroniclers say that he starved himself voluntarily, and died for want of food, and a broken heart. In either case his end was a shocking one, and should serve as a warning for profligate and imperious princes. The royal and dishonest trifler, who had wasted the means of thousands, and turned a deaf ear to the sufferings of his people, perished from want, and that, too, in a dungeon.

Richard was buried at his own favourite residence at Langley. He left no children; and the little French princess, to whom he had been married, was only ten years old at the time of his death. Of course she had never lived with him as his wife; she was too young for that, and also too young to feel his loss very bitterly. For some time she was kept in England, for Henry wished to marry her to his son; but the French king, who was so much shocked at the fate of Richard that he had a severe attack of illness in consequence, objected to that arrangement; and the little lady was at last sent back to the court of her father. Some years afterwards she was married to her cousin Charles, the Count of Angoulême, and, while still very young, died in her confinement. Richard's death took place in the 34th year of his age, and the 23rd of his reign.

In person Richard was tall and graceful; and his features were handsome, but feminine. He had a hesitation in his speech almost amounting to a lisp. Though possessed by nature of more than average ability, a bad education had made him a trifler. In early life he was spoilt by excessive indulgence; and afterwards, flatterers and parasites were his ruin. Some sparks of courage, and even heroism, are to be seen in his character, especially during his youth; but his temper was fitful and uncertain, and his mind became weakened from a long course of luxury and pleasure, to both of which he was extremely attached. Like most weak princes, he always had favourites around him, and was, therefore, deficient in that impartiality and dignity which is expected in a king. He was abrupt in his manner, and passionate in his temper; but the darkest points of his nature were slyness, treachery, and an eager love of revenge. He resembled the unfortunate Edward II., both in his character and fate; but his mind was stronger, and his temper less amiable. He aimed at assuming a despotic authority: but that arose rather from his evil education than from natural viciousness. He was unequal to the difficulties of his position, and unable to win the esteem, or command the obedience, of the troublesome barons of that unsettled time. Though he had many faults, and committed some crimes, yet they seem to have proceeded rather from weakness than wickedness; and his gloomy fate excites at once pity and regret.

CHAPTER XXXI.

THE REIGN OF HENRY THE FOURTH, CALLED BOLINGBROKE, OR HENRY OF LANCASTER.—A.D. 1399–1401

AS Richard II. had no children, the true heir to the throne was Edmund Mortimer, the Earl of March, because he was a descendant of Lionel, Duke of Clarence, the elder brother of Henry's father, John of Gaunt. But this Edmund Mortimer was only nine years old, and would have been no match for the crafty and talented Henry, who was three-and-thirty. The young prince's friends thought it wisest to say nothing about his title, for fear it might lead him into danger; therefore Henry was crowned without opposition. Still he thought, that when the young earl became a man, perhaps he might attempt to recover his birthright; so the usurping sovereign sent him and his younger brother to Windsor Castle, where they were kept in an easy confinement.

The people generally were much attached to Henry; but many of the nobles entertained a jealous feeling towards him. This feeling he added to by making an inquiry in parliament into the circumstances of the death of his uncle, the Duke of Gloucester, who was murdered in prison at Calais; and calling to account the nobles who had accused that factious man of treason. Most of the peers had been mixed up in the cabals that had taken place during the troubled reign of Richard, and had taken part with or against the duke. Charges were made and retorted; a scene of confusion followed; noblemen loudly called each other liars and traitors, and forty steel gauntlets were thrown upon the ground as challenges to mortal combat. Henry had the talent to calm all this fury; the challenges were withdrawn; and those who had accused Gloucester of treason, escaped with the forfeiture of the estates and titles which they had received as rewards from Richard for their enmity to Gloucester.

This was immediately after the coronation of Henry, and, therefore, before the death of the unhappy Richard; so the nobles who had been bereft of some of their land and titles entered into a conspiracy to murder the new sovereign and restore the imprisoned one. The principal members of this plot were the Earls of Rutland, Kent, Huntingdon, and Salisbury, the Lords Despencer and Lumley, together with the Bishop of Carlisle and the Abbot of Westminster. On the 3rd of January, 1400, they proclaimed a tournament, to be held at Oxford, and invited the attendance of the king. Henry promised to go; and it was arranged that they should rush suddenly upon him, and kill both him and his sons during the sport. It is very likely that they would have succeeded in their attempt, had not the Earl of Rutland treacherously betrayed the scheme to the king. The conspirators waited all day at Oxford for the arrival of Henry; but when evening was approaching, and they found he did not come, and that Rutland too was absent, they concluded that they had been betrayed. Collecting a troop of 500 horsemen, they rode at once to Windsor, intending to surprise the castle, where Henry was residing, and then put him to death. The king had left Windsor, and the conspirators were a second time disappointed. Scarcely knowing what to do, they trifled all that day about the town, and, on the next, Henry appeared at Kingston-on-Thames with an army of 20,000 men.

The rebellious nobles immediately fled to their several counties, to arm their retainers, proclaiming the imprisoned king, Richard, in all the towns they passed through. But the people were tired enough of Richard, and had no desire to see him placed on the throne again; their feelings, at present, were entirely in favour of Henry: so, instead of joining the insurgent nobles, they arrested them, and put them to death. The Earls of Kent and Salisbury were seized and beheaded by the people of Cirencester; the Lords Despencer and Lumley met a similar fate at Bristol; while the Earl of Huntingdon was cruelly murdered by the servants of the late Duke of Gloucester, whose enemy he had been. Two knights, Sir Thomas Blount and Sir Bennet Sely, were tried and executed as traitors at Oxford, with all the revolting ceremonies usually attendant on such occasions; and two monks also perished at London by the hand of the executioner. It was soon after this attempt on the life of Henry that King Richard died or was murdered at Pomfret Castle, and his untimely fate was, no doubt, hastened in consequence of the revolt.

Though he had thus triumphed over his enemies, Henry felt that it was necessary to strengthen himself in every way he could. For this purpose he tried to conciliate the clergy, by granting them a new law for the more severe punishment of heresy. The followers of the opinions of Wycliffe, or Lollards, as they were called, had become very numerous: Henry's father, John of Gaunt, had openly favoured them; and he himself had been suspected of leaning towards their principles. He knew that an opinion of this kind would injure him in the eyes of the clergy; and, upon their solicitation, he gave his consent to a law, by which it was enacted that, when any heretic refused to abjure his opinions, he should be delivered, by the bishop or his commissioners, to the civil magistrate, and burnt to death in the presence of the people. This wicked and infamous law was passed during the month of January, 1401; and it would have been better for England, and for Henry too, had he never been born, than that he had put his name to that fatal parchment. It is possible that when he gave it his sanction he supposed it would never be put into actual practice, but merely kept to terrify those whom the priests called heretics into submission: perhaps he thought that no disciples of the Divine and Gentle One could be so hardened by temporal power and superstitious frenzy as to devote a fellow-creature, however erring, to the awful end of being tortured to death by fire. If he did think so, he was fatally mistaken.

William Sawtre was the first victim of this statute. He had been rector of Lynn, in Norfolk, of which living he was deprived on a charge of heresy in 1399. He subsequently recanted his opinions, and had been appointed priest of St. Osyth's, in London. But he was not happy in his mind: he felt that, to avoid punishment, and secure the means of life, he had denied the truth; and he presented a petition to parliament, imploring that they would examine him upon the subject of religion. The object of this application was suspected by the bishops; and they summoned him to appear before them in convocation. Thomas Arundel, the Archbishop of Canterbury, then questioned him respecting his opinions. He had previously refused to worship the cross, saying that he would not worship the cross on which Christ suffered, but only Christ that suffered on the cross; and affirmed, that, after pronouncing over the bread the sacramental words of the body of Christ, it remained of the same nature as before, and did not cease to be bread.

After much questioning as to whether he still retained these opinions, the archbishop decided that he was a relapsed heretic; for Sawtre still maintained, that after the words of consecration were pronounced by the priest, the bread remained bread, exactly the same as it was before the words were spoken. Sentence was then given against him, and he was degraded and deposed from the priesthood. This was done step by step; first he was deprived of his office as a priest, then as a deacon, then as a sub-deacon, then as an acolyte, then as an exorcist, then as a reader, then as a sexton. His priestly gown and cap were taken from him, his ecclesiastical tonsure rased away, and he was delivered over to the high constable and marshal of England, to receive the hideous punishment to which his clerical judges had condemned him. In surrendering Sawtre to the secular authorities, the priests, who well knew what was to be done with him, hypocritically begged them to receive the victim favourably. The unhappy man was burned to death in Smithfield, in the month of March, 1401, to the horror and disgust of a great multitude of spectators. "Thus," says Foxe, in his famous Book of Martyrs (in which you will find an account of most of the unhappy victims of superstitious wickedness)—"Thus it may appear how kings and princes have been blinded and abused by the false prelates of the church, insomuch that they have been their slaves and butchers, to slay Christ's poor innocent members. As King Henry IV. was the first of all English kings that began the unmerciful burning of Christ's saints for standing against the pope, so was this William Sawtre, the true and faithful martyr of Christ, the first of all them who I find to be burned in the reign of this king."

After the return of the Princess Isabella, the young widow of King Richard, to France, the French were desirous of declaring war, to avenge her wrongs and the death of her husband; but, though some attacks were made on the English dominions in that country, France was in such a state of internal weakness that they were soon abandoned; and as war had not been openly declared, Henry took but little notice of them.

To prevent his barons from plotting against him at home, Henry resolved to give them employment in Scotland. He knew that if he sat idly upon his throne, his subjects would busy themselves by inquiring about his title to it; and the English, notwithstanding their repeated failures, still longed for the conquest of Scotland. Besides this, a strong feeling existed in that country against Henry's usurpation; and the truce having expired immediately after his accession, the Scots began to plunder and harass the English people who lived near the borders. Collecting an army at York, in the summer of 1400, Henry summoned the King of Scotland to appear before him as his lord paramount. This summons was, as might be expected, treated with contempt; and Henry marched with his army directly to Edinburgh, took possession of the city, and laid siege to the castle. The wars of the English in that country had hitherto been disgraced by savage excesses; the course of their armies was too often to be traced by vestiges of murder and desolation; while the sword and the fire-brand were constantly in use; and the Scotch had been equally, if not more, rapacious when they made their raids into England. It must be recorded to the credit of Henry, that he would not permit these outrages; and in this expedition he showed as much mercy and forbearance as is consistent with the nature of war. When two of the canons of the abbey of Holyrood came to him, to intercede for the safety of their house, he answered, "I will never, as long as I live, injure any religious house; and the monastery of Holyrood, where my father found shelter when in exile, is especially entitled to the protection of his son." As the Scottish army would not risk a battle with Henry, and the castle of Edinburgh was too strong to be taken by assault, and the English soldiers were suffering from sickness and want of provisions, he was compelled to withdraw from Edinburgh and return into England.

Before he arrived there, he received intelligence of an insurrection in Wales, which had broken out in 1400, during his absence in Scotland. It was led by a remarkable man, named Owen Glendower. He was a Welsh gentleman, who was, or at least pretended to be, descended from the last of the native princes of his country. He had been a student at one of the English universities, and became, afterwards, familiar with the law in the inns of court. Learning was not a very common thing, even amongst gentlemen, in those days; and Glendower's knowledge was so considerable, that it gained for him the character of a magician with the poor ignorant peasants among whom he lived. His small estate lay near to the great one of a powerful noble—the Lord Grey de Ruthyn, who tyrannically seized a part of the property of his poorer neighbour. Owen Glendower was a man of high spirit and passionate temper, and by no means likely to submit to such a wrong. Still he proceeded quietly, and petitioned parliament to do him justice; but as he was famous for his attachment to the late King Richard, his petition was taken no notice of. Then his fiery nature was aroused; and, collecting a numerous band of his countrymen, he drove Grey de Ruthyn from his land by force. The English government supported the noble, and the Welsh people sided with Owen, who, upon being pronounced an outlaw, declared himself the lawful sovereign of Wales, and set Henry at defiance.

The Welsh people flocked to the standard of Glendower in immense numbers, and the insurrection soon became formidable. King Henry, who was a man of great decision, led an army directly into Wales, and trusted that he should instantly crush the patriot and his followers. He was by no means so successful as he expected to be. Owen and his followers prudently concealed themselves among the unapproachable recesses of their native mountains, and the powerful English monarch was compelled to retire in consequence of a want of provisions. A second and a third expedition met with no better success; Owen still remained in arms, and committed devastations upon the estates of the English. In these skirmishes he took his old oppressor, Lord Grey de Ruthyn, prisoner; and even captured Sir Edward Mortimer, uncle to the young Earl of March, whom Henry had shut up in Windsor Castle.

Though Henry had abandoned Scotland, the border feuds between the people of that country and the English had never ceased. The Earl of Northumberland and his son, Henry Percy (who had been liberated from his imprisonment in Scotland for some years), ravaged the lands of the Earl of Douglas, and the latter retaliated by repeated excursions into the northern English counties. On one occasion, having collected a great quantity of spoil, Douglas was met on his return home by the Percys, and defeated at Nesbit Moor. He was enraged at this defeat; for, though a powerful and brave man, he was so unfortunate a leader as to have earned the surname of Tyne-man, that is, Lose-man, on account of his frequent failures in war. Being resolved to retrieve his reputation, he collected 10,000 of the best and bravest warriors of Scotland, and then burst into England, spreading ruin and terror as far as the wells of Newcastle.

The Earl of Northumberland and his brave son, Henry, who, on account of his impetuosity, was called Hotspur, permitted the Scots to go on in their destructive expedition, and again intercepted them suddenly on their return to their own country. The Scots, who supposed their enemies were struck with terror, and dared not meet them, had been thus deceived into a fatal security, and were taken by surprise. Arranging his men in a solid square, upon an eminence called Homildon Hill, Douglas waited for the attack. This would have been an excellent position if the English force had been all horsemen, or men-at-arms; but, unfortunately for the Scots, they were chiefly archers, who could shoot up the hill without ascending it. The English bowmen began the battle, and shot with such power and rapidity, that it is said many of the dead bodies of the Scots resembled hedgehogs, they were struck with so many arrows. Douglas and his men seemed paralysed; for a time they did nothing, and the slaughter among them was terrific. At length, a brave Scotch gentleman, Sir John Swinton, cried out, "Oh! my brave fellow-soldiers, what fascinates you to-day, that you stand like deers and fawn in a park to be shot, instead of showing your ancient valour, and meeting your foes hand to hand? Let those who will descend with me; and in the name of the Lord, we will break that host, and conquer; or, if not, at least die with honour, like soldiers!" This brave speech broke the spell which seemed to hang upon the Scots; and another knight, Sir Adam de Gordon, who had long been at enmity with Swinton, dismounted from his horse, exclaiming—"Let us be reconciled on this spot, that I may receive knighthood at thy hands, for I can never receive that honour from one more noble and brave." The knights embraced each other, re-mounted their horses, and then charged down hill, followed by the greater part of the Scottish army.

The English archers then slowly retired; but every now and then they turned and discharged a new flight of arrows at their foes, who soon fell into utter confusion. Laying aside their bows, the archers then rushed upon the enemy, and despatched immense numbers of them with their knives and short swords. The Scots were completely defeated; and the Earl of Douglas, together with several nobles, and eighty knights of the first families in Scotland, were taken prisoners. This engagement between the Percys and Douglas took place on the 14th of September, 1402; and is known as the battle of Homildon Hill. In itself it was not very important, being merely a border feud upon a large scale; but it led to one of the most striking incidents of Henry's reign—the rebellion of the powerful Northumberland family against him.

On hearing of this victory, King Henry sent an order to the Percys not to ransom or set at liberty the prisoners they had taken: he wished to keep them, that he might be able to dictate what terms he pleased to Scotland; but, by so doing, he gave great offence to the Earl of Northumberland and his son, who considered that he was interfering with their rights, in taking from them the power of ransoming their prisoners. He had given another cause of offence to this warlike and influential family, by refusing to allow them to ransom their relative, Sir Edward Mortimer, who had been taken prisoner by Glendower; and, as they had greatly assisted to place him on the throne (it was Northumberland who first joined him at Ravenspur), they now resolved on attempting to pull him down from it.

It is very likely there were other causes of suspicion and dislike between the king and the great earl. Henry would naturally be jealous of the power of the man who raised him to the throne; while, on the other hand, so great a subject would never think himself sufficiently repaid for so important a service. The result was, that the two Percys entered into a conspiracy to dethrone Henry, and place the crown on the head of the young Earl of March, who was the rightful heir to it. In this they were encouraged by Scrope, the Archbishop of York; and the more to strengthen themselves, they set Earl Douglas at liberty without ransom, on condition that he would join them in a war against the king. Still feeling themselves scarcely strong enough for such a purpose, they also entered into an alliance with the Welsh chieftain, Glendower, who then released his prisoner, Mortimer, gave him his daughter in marriage, and promised to supply 12,000 Welsh soldiers towards the execution of the daring project.

When everything was ready, the Earl of Northumberland fell ill, and was unable to assume the command of the rebel army; but his son, Hotspur, taking his place, led it towards North Wales, in order to join Glendower and his Welsh. The resolute King Henry was soon on the alert, and, hurrying towards Wales, he endeavoured to prevent Hotspur from joining his Welsh allies. Thus the two armies came in sight of each other on the 22nd of July, 1403, near Shrewsbury. Douglas and his Scots joined the rebels; but Glendower and the Welsh never made their appearance. Still the spirited Percy resolved upon fighting; but, as the twilight was rapidly closing in, the battle was deferred until the morrow. That evening, he sent a defiance and manifesto to the king, to whom he would give no other title than Henry, Duke of Lancaster. In it, he upbraided him of being guilty of perjury, rebellion, and murder. Perjury, because, when he returned from exile, he swore upon the gospels that he came to claim nothing but the inheritance which Richard so unjustly held from him. Rebellion, because he had deposed and imprisoned his lawful sovereign; and murder, because he had caused that unhappy sovereign to be kept, for the space of fifteen days and nights, in the castle of Pomfret, without meat, or drink, or fire, whereof he perished of hunger, thirst, and cold. This document contained other charges against Henry; one of which was, usurpation of the rights of young Edward Mortimer, Earl of March, the true heir to the crown: it concluded by defying him and his followers as traitors, oppressors, and destroyers of the realm.

Early the next morning, the 23rd of July, the two armies, each consisting of about 12,000 men, confronted each other. Englishmen were opposed to Englishmen; and members of the same family might, perhaps, be arrayed on different sides. There was, doubtless, some feeling of this kind among the opposing soldiers. For a short time the two hosts stood and looked at each other in solemn silence. Henry seems to have wished to spare the lives of his subjects, even of those who had rebelled against him; for he sent a priest to Hotspur, to see if, even at that hour, they could not arrange their quarrel, and conclude a peace. That brave young noble doubted Henry's sincerity, and refused his terms; then the trumpets sounded, and the conflict began.

The battle-cry of the royal party was, "St. George for us!" that of the Percys, "Esperance!" The struggle was desperate in the extreme—many of the leaders fighting as if the victory depended alone upon their exertions. The king was ever in the thickest part of the battle; and his son, the Prince of Wales, distinguished himself for his intrepidity; and, though wounded in the face by an arrow, could not be persuaded to leave the field. Douglas and Percy both sustained the great reputation they had acquired for deeds of arms; and the former resolved, if possible, to kill the king with his own hand. Henry had many gentlemen dressed in the royal garb in order to deceive the enemy, and several of these were slain by the powerful Douglas; but he himself was enveloped in plain armour, and thus passed unobserved. Hotspur, after penetrating into the midst of the royal lines, was pierced to the brain with a chance arrow, and fell dead upon the spot. His death so disheartened his followers, that they fell into confusion and fled. The battle lasted for three hours, and 2,300 gentlemen are said to have perished, together with about 6,000 common soldiers. The Earl of Worcester, the Baron of Kinderton, and Sir Richard Vernon, were taken prisoners by the king, and beheaded on the battle-field as rebels. Earl Douglas had received some injuries, and was also taken prisoner, but was regarded as a foreign foe, and treated with courtesy.

The old Earl of Northumberland, the father of Hotspur, had recovered from the illness which kept him from the battle, and was marching with a body of troops to join the rebel army, when the news reached him of his son's defeat and death. Almost paralysed by sorrow, he seems not to have known what to do; for, instead of providing for his safety by flight, he disbanded his soldiers, and shut himself up in his castle at Warkworth. Of course, he was soon obliged to surrender to the king; but he then pretended that his only object in arming was to mediate between the parties. The king did not believe this excuse; but he pretended to do so, and generously pardoned his enemy.

Henry led an active life, for his enemies would not long permit him to remain idle. Owen Glendower and his Welshmen did not make their appearance at the battle of Shrewsbury, but immediately afterwards they renewed their depredations, and the king's eldest son was despatched with some forces against them. The French, also, with whom Henry was nominally at peace, attacked Guienne, plundered the English ships at sea, and made descents upon the coast; in one of which expeditions, they burnt the town of Plymouth, and ravaged the surrounding country. The French government apologised, and said that the violations of the peace had taken place without their sanction; but Henry well knew that they had secretly countenanced them, and he gave permission to English rovers to retaliate on the French ships and coasts. This was done to a great extent; many French vessels were captured, and some towns left mere smoking ruins, as memorials that the English would not permit wanton injuries to pass by unavenged. During the whole of this reign, there were constant bickerings and skirmishes with the French, but no open war.

CHAPTER XXXII.

CONCLUSION OF THE REIGN OF HENRY THE FOURTH.—A.D. 1404—1413.

IN the third year of Henry's reign, some of his enemies circulated a report that King Richard had not died at Pomfret Castle; but, having escaped from that fortress, the body of another man was exhibited and buried as his, and that he himself was then a fugitive in Scotland, and would shortly make his appearance to claim his crown. A wonderful and improbable story is almost sure to be believed; and this strange rumour obtained credit amongst great numbers of the people. Henry was exceedingly irritated, and he caused Sir Roger Clarendon (who was a natural son of the famous Black Prince), nine Franciscan friars, and some other persons, to be executed as traitors, for propagating this report. People then became silent upon the subject, for the most talkative folks did not like to run the risk of having their speech cut short by the rope of the hangman; but this severity caused the rumour to be the more firmly believed.

For a time nothing further was heard of Richard; but, in the year following the battle of Shrewsbury [A.D. 1404], it was again reported that he was alive, and had taken refuge in Scotland. A person of the name of Serle, who had been one of the attendants of King Richard, accordingly went to Scotland to behold his late master. Of course, he did not find the wretched king, who had been buried nearly four years previously; but he met his court-fool, one Ward, who bore some likeness to the deceased monarch. Serle persuaded this man to personate Richard; and the story that Richard was alive, and would soon enter England at the head of an army of Scots, spread in every direction. After doing considerable mischief by getting a number of people into trouble, Serle was arrested, and not only confessed the imposture, but added, that he had been an accomplice in the murder of the Duke of Gloucester. His confession did not save his life; he was drawn on a hurdle through every town from Pontefract to London, and then executed as a traitor. The fool seems to have been wise enough not to venture out of Scotland, and thus he escaped the anger of the English king.

Henry never forgot the double tenure by which he held the crown; and he was, therefore, careful not to oppress his people with taxes, lest they should be encouraged to depose him as he had deposed Richard. When, in this year, he applied to parliament for supplies, it proposed to him to seize a great part of the lands belonging to the church, and use the revenue arising from them as a fund for the support of royalty. This suggestion, no doubt, proceeded from the spread of the doctrines of Wycliffe, for that famous reformer had contended, that the wealth of the church was a great cause of its corruption. The clergy were instantly alarmed, and accused the Commons of impiety; and Henry, who it is supposed would have had no objection to robbing the church if it could have been done quietly, when he saw that he was likely to create a disturbance, assured them that he had no such idea; but, on the contrary, wished to leave the church better than he found it.

In the year 1405, Henry was again threatened by plots and rebellions; but, fortunately for him, his enemies acted without unity, and with little wisdom. The Earl of Northumberland, who knew that, though pardoned, he was still suspected, was at work, collecting followers and getting up another warlike demonstration against the king. Scrope, the Archbishop of York, the Earl of Nottingham, Sir John Falconberg, and other gentlemen of rank, immediately entered into his views, and took the field with an army of 8,000 men, at Shipton-on-the-Moor, near York. There they published a manifesto, in which they reproached Henry with his usurpation of the crown, and the murder of the late king, and required that the true heir should be restored, and all public grievances be redressed. The chief conspirator, the old Earl of Northumberland, was, as usual, not ready, and, therefore, did not appear to support his confederates. The Earl of Westmoreland, and Prince John, the third son of the king, approached them with an inferior power; and, although no conflict took place, they succeeded in capturing the rebel leaders by a stratagem, which it is wonderful to think should even have deceived children. Westmoreland and the prince desired a conference with the earl and the archbishop between the two armies. They listened to the grievances of the insurgents, begged them to mention what remedies they desired, and then promised that the king should grant all their demands, and give them entire satisfaction. The earl and the archbishop were delighted, and had no suspicion of the insincerity of these sudden concessions. Westmoreland then proposed that, as peace was restored between them, it would be better for both sides to disband their forces, instead of oppressing the people by the maintenance of two armies. The rebel leaders fell into the snare, and dismissed their forces; and Westmoreland, who had secretly issued contrary orders to his army, immediately arrested them without resistance. This conduct was exceedingly treacherous; but the perfidy of one party was not greater than the simplicity of the other.

The prisoners were then tried as traitors, but the chief justice refused to pass sentence upon them, because the earl had a right to a trial by his peers, and the archbishop was not answerable except to an ecclesiastical tribunal. Besides, no bishop had yet perished in England by the hands of the executioner, and the judge did not like to be the first who should sentence one to that extreme punishment. But Henry had resolved that no one should rebel against him with impunity, and that the highest prelates in the land should be punished for their offences in the same manner as the laity. He appointed Sir William Fulthorp as a judge—a man who possessed so few scruples on the subject, that, without any indictment, trial, or defence, he pronounced sentence of death upon both the earl and the archbishop. The sentence was executed immediately; but Henry was not a revengeful man, and he extended his pardon to the other leaders of the insurrection.

The Pope, Clement VI., issued a sentence of excommunication against every one concerned in the death of the archbishop. Of course, this was aimed at Henry; but the pontiff did not like to excommunicate so powerful a king by name; and when Henry sent him a justification of his conduct, the prudent priest revoked his denunciation. This submission shows how much the power of the Roman church had declined within the last two centuries. Had a Christian king chosen, in former times, to send an archbishop to the scaffold, an interdict would have been pronounced upon his dominions, excommunication and dethronement hurled against himself, and all the princes of Europe stirred up to execute the latter sentence. For such a change the whole Christian world might well be thankful; but greater, very much greater, changes were gathering in the invisible and mysterious future.

When the Earl of Northumberland learnt the fate of his confederates, he and his friend, Lord Bardolph, fled to Scotland for protection; for the Scots were connected with his plot, and had agreed to support it by an invasion of England. Henry raised a considerable army, and after taking all the castles belonging to the earl, marched into Wales to assist his eldest son, who had been engaged in continual skirmishes there with Glendower ever since the battle of Shrewsbury. The prince had obtained several slight advantages over Glendower; but he was unable to conquer that brave man, who eluded his enemies so dexterously, and surprised them so suddenly, that nearly all the English soldiers believed in the common report that he was a great magician, and able to command the service of the devil. Hitherto he had been more troublesome to Henry than dangerous; but he had solicited the aid of the French, and they had sent an army of 12,000 men to his assistance. Owen and his allies drove back the prince and penetrated into England as far as Worcester, ravaging and plundering, after the fashion of the times. There they were met by King Henry, and deemed it prudent to retreat. He followed them into Wales, and an engagement took place among the mountains, Henry sustaining large losses. Our old historians are not very communicative upon this point; but it appears that Henry retired in confusion, and left many of his baggage-waggons behind him. The French did not remain in Wales to follow up this success; they were tired of the country and the people; it was dull compared to their own gay land, where people danced and amused themselves in spite of every calamity: what was worse, too, provisions were rather scanty, and they feared the return of King Henry with another army more numerous than the last; so they went home again, and left the Welsh to do the best they could for themselves.

Prince Henry did not follow his father; he remained in Wales; and his dexterity and courage were so great that, after much fighting, he at length, in the year 1405, subdued the whole of the south of that country. Glendower was finally defeated on the 11th of May, and forsaken. Very little is known of the remainder of his life, but that little is highly romantic. He travelled about in the disguise of a shepherd, seeking shelter occasionally at the houses of his friends; and it is a pleasure to know that no one was base enough to betray him to his enemies. Though thus reduced, his spirit was unconquered and unconquerable; he rose again in arms to secure the independence of his native land, and eventually breathed his last [A.D. 1416], in freedom among the mountains of his country.

While Prince Henry was slowly acquiring renown in Wales, his father obtained a great advantage over the Scots. This was the capture, in 1405, of Prince James, the heir-apparent to the Scottish throne. The eldest son of Robert III. had been murdered, and the father, fearing for the life of the second, who was but a boy twelve years old, determined to send him to France for protection. A truce existed between England and Scotland, but it was continually broken through on both sides, and the vessel containing the young Scottish prince was captured by an English cruiser. This event broke the heart of his aged father, who pined away, and died on the 4th of April, 1406. The attendants of James, on being taken before Henry, requested to be permitted to continue their journey, as they were carrying him to France to complete his education. Henry had no intention of acting so generously; but, sending the lad to Windsor Castle, he replied, "In truth, I myself am no indifferent French scholar, and my brother of Scotland could not have sent his son to a better master." True to his word, Henry bestowed upon the young prince an excellent education. James loved poetry, and read with delight the tales of Chaucer. In after-times, he himself became famous for the elegance of his taste and extensiveness of his learning, and celebrated as a poet of great distinction. He remained in honourable imprisonment, in England, for nineteen years, when he was liberated, and ascended the Scottish throne; and, though he obtained the reputation of being one of the best and wisest of his country's monarchs, he perished by the hand of an assassin.

England was now tranquil at home; but, in 1406, the French invaded the dominions Henry possessed in their country, and took possession of no less than sixty castles in Guienne and Saintonge. They also resolved upon retaking Calais; but, after immense preparations, that important town remained untouched. Henry seems to have left these provinces to defend themselves, for he sent them no assistance. At that time the French king was suffering from a malady of the mind, which rendered him incompetent of attending to the affairs of state; and the country was distracted by the dissensions of two powerful nobles, the Dukes of Burgundy and Orleans. Each of them had a numerous party; that of the first being called the Burgundians, and the latter the Armagnacs, and a savage warfare was carried on between them. Henry interfered in these disputes in a not very honourable manner. It was to his interest to increase the internal quarrels of the French, that they might have neither the leisure nor power to attack him. When the Duke of Burgundy solicited his assistance, he, therefore, readily sent him a small force, and afterwards just as readily listened to, and accepted, more advantageous terms from the other party, to whom he also sent military assistance. But the French, jealous of English interference, began to see their own folly; so, paying the English soldiers what they had agreed, they dismissed them and made up their quarrel.

The Earl of Northumberland could not live in peace in Scotland; he hated Henry so bitterly that, notwithstanding his former failures, he determined to try his hand at another rebellion. In the January of 1407, he and Lord Bardolph made their appearance with a small army in Northumberland, and took several castles there. Very few people joined them; and they were opposed and defeated, at Bramham Moor, by the sheriff of Yorkshire. The obstinate old noble and his friend both died upon the field of battle; but their bodies were dismembered, and the limbs hung up as those of traitors.

This was the last rebellion during Henry's reign: his iron resolution had crushed all opposition, and he was now firmly seated upon the throne. But his mind and body had both been over-tasked, and his health failed him. He became averse to company, suspicious in his habits, and gloomy in his devotion. He no longer possessed the attachment of the people, and became jealous of his son, the Prince of Wales, whom they dearly loved. The prince is reported to have been very wild and fond of low company; and many odd stories are told of him, some of which our great poet, Shakspeare, has introduced into his historical drama of Henry the Fourth. These stories are, no doubt, exaggerations, and few of them are mentioned by any writer of that time; but it appears the prince did give himself up to low company, and, for some time, took an interest in the affairs of state, in order to allay the jealous feeling entertained towards him by his father. A busy courtier having reported some idle and disrespectful observations of the prince to his royal parent, the king was seized with a fear that his son might proceed to violence against him. This made a deep impression on his mind; but the prince, on hearing it, behaved with an openness which at once removed those shocking doubts. Seeking his father's presence, he threw himself at his feet, and said—"Sir, I am told you have entertained a suspicion of me, injurious to my honour and to the reverence and veneration I have for your person. I freely confess that I have been guilty of some intemperate sallies which deserve your indignation; but I never had the least thought of any attempt upon your person or government. They that dare to charge me with so monstrous a crime seek only to disturb your peace. To clear myself from this imputation I have taken the liberty to come and throw myself at your feet, humbly entreating you to cause all my actions to be as rigorously examined as those of your meanest subject." The king, from that time, abandoned his suspicions, and lived in peace and amity with his son.

In the year 1410, the House of Commons renewed the attack it had made upon the church in the early part of Henry's reign. A calculation of all the ecclesiastical revenues was made, and which amounted to 485,000 marks a year, and contained 18,400 ploughs of land. This great property it was proposed to divide among fifteen new earls, 1,500 knights, 6,000 esquires, and 100 hospitals; beyond which, there would be a considerable surplus left for the king's own use. The duties of the clergy, said the Commons, would be much better attended to by 15,000 parish priests, at a small yearly salary, than by the enormously wealthy church which then existed. At the same time, they begged the king to mitigate the severity of the laws against the Lollards. Henry was now giving himself up to a gloomy devotion; he received this application very sternly, and gave the Commons a severe reproof. To show his decision, he shortly afterwards signed the death-warrant of an unhappy man accused of heresy.

This martyr for the sake of his religious opinions was a working-man—a tailor or a smith—of the name of John Badby. He was charged before the Archbishop of Canterbury with holding several erroneous ideas on the subject of religion, the chief of which was a denial of the doctrine of transubstantiation. Archbishop Arundel was an unmerciful man; and, as Badby would not recant his opinions, he sentenced him to be burnt in Smithfield. The victim of priestly cruelty was put into an empty barrel, which was surrounded by dry wood. The Prince of Wales, who was present, being touched at the sight, advised him to retract his errors and accept of pardon. Badby resolutely refused, and the fire was applied to the heaps of stakes. As the flames spread upwards with a roaring sound, he was overcome with pain and terror, and called out for mercy. The prince, still anxious to save the wretched man, instantly ordered him to be taken out of the barrel, and exhorted him to save himself by recantation; but the spirits of the martyr were now reassured: he refused to give up his opinions, and being replaced in his former position, soon perished in the fire.

Henry was scarcely past the summer of life, but anxiety and excitement had made him old. He became subject to frequent epileptic fits; was afflicted with some disorder of the skin; and it was plain that his end was approaching. One ancient chronicler relates, that he had such a jealous fear of losing his crown, on account of the many attempts that had been made to wrest it from him, that he always kept it on a cushion by his pillow while he slept. On one occasion he had a severe fit, and lay motionless so long, that the Prince of Wales thought he was dead. Taking up the crown he removed it from the chamber. Shortly afterwards the king revived, and missing that type of royalty, asked what had become of it. He was told that the prince had taken it away. Sending for him, the grieved father sternly inquired if he desired to rob him of his throne before his death? The humbled prince replied, "That he never had any such thoughts; but believing him to be dead, he had taken the crown as his lawful heir, and the only person that had a right to it. Nevertheless, he thanked God he saw him again recovered, and heartily wished he might live long to wear it himself." The pacific monarch exclaimed, with a sigh, "Alas! fair son, what right have you to the crown, when you know your father had none?" "My liege," answered the prince proudly, "with the sword you won it, and with the sword I will keep it." The monarch paused for a time, as if he felt the injustice of his past career, and then answered, "Well, do as you think best; I leave the issue to God, and hope he will have mercy on my soul."

One day he was praying in Westminster Abbey, before the shrine of its founder, Edward the Confessor, when he was suddenly taken with his last paroxysm. There was an idle prophecy abroad that he should die in Jerusalem, for it had once been his intention of making a crusade to the Holy Land. On reviving a little he remembered this prophecy, and desired to be placed in a room in the apartments of the abbot, which was called the Jerusalem Chamber; there he breathed his last. His death took place on the 20th of March, 1413, in the forty-seventh year of his age, and the fourteenth of his reign. He was buried in Canterbury Cathedral, by the side of his first queen. Henry had been twice married—first to the Lady Mary de Bohun, daughter of the Earl of Hereford; and next to Joan of Navarre, daughter of the king of that country, and widow of the Duke of Brittany. He left four sons: Henry, who succeeded him on the throne; Thomas, Duke of Clarence; John, Duke of Bedford; and Humphrey, Duke of Gloucester. Also two daughters, Blanche and Philippa.

There are many dark spots on the character of Henry; the chief of them being the perjury and usurpation by which he obtained his crown, and the murder of King Richard—of which cruel deed there is too much cause to consider him guilty. He will also ever be remembered with some feeling of horror, as the English monarch who yielded to the importunity of a cruel priesthood, and passed the revolting statute for burning heretics. It is no light crime to have been the first to sanction such infamous atrocities; and his wickedness in this respect will remain as legible in the pages of history, as if written in letters of fire, tears, and blood. Still, it must be added, that, though not very particular about the means of increasing his power, he was not generally cruel or tyrannical. He showed great moderation to his rebellious subjects, and never oppressed his people with heavy taxes. He was active, firm, courageous, and self-possessed, had great powers of mind, and many kingly qualities. If he had not usurped the crown, and been in consequence harassed by frequent rebellions, he would, no doubt, have made a wise and beneficent sovereign; and, as a former historian remarks, "We can hardly conceive how any one could carry his ambition to the same height, and transmit a throne to posterity, with less violence to humanity."

CHAPTER XXXIII.

THE REIGN OF HENRY THE FIFTH; CALLED HENRY OF MONMOUTH.—A.D. 1413—1415.

HENRY V. was crowned about three weeks after the death of his father, on the 9th of April. He ascended the throne amidst the rejoicings of the people, and no one said a word about his defective title, or the claim of Edmund Mortimer, the Earl of March. It is difficult to account for the attachment the nation felt towards him, though it probably arose from his known bravery and generous amiability of character. The riots of his youth, and his love of low pleasures and companions, instead of exciting a feeling against him, seemed only to add to the general impression in his favour. A story is told, that he and his riotous associates, when heated with wine, would sally out into the streets and commit robberies upon belated passengers. That the depraved companions of the prince committed such disgraceful acts is not improbable; but it is not very likely that he himself took part in them. Next in infamy to the actual commission of crimes, is the protecting and encouragement of those who perpetrate them. This offence the prince was guilty of; for, on one occasion, when some abandoned companion of his was brought before the Lord Chief Justice Gascoigne, Henry appeared at the bar along with the criminal, and even proceeded so far as to strike the judge. Gascoigne, observing that the majesty of the law and the sovereign of the country were insulted in his person, immediately sent the prince to prison. Perceiving the error he had committed, and, doubtless, sorry for his vulgar rudeness, the latter submitted, without resistance, to the sentence of the upright judge. When the circumstance was related to his father, the king exclaimed, "Happy is the monarch who possesses a judge so resolute in the discharge of his duty, and a son so willing to yield to the authority of the law." When Henry became king, he retained Gascoigne in his dignified and important position, desiring him to persevere in the same rigorous and impartial execution of the laws.

Henry's wildness—if it were as great as the old chroniclers tell us it was—ceased when he assumed the sceptre; and he conducted himself with a sober dignity, which delighted the nation the more because it was unexpected. His first acts of power were exceedingly generous ones: he released Edmund Mortimer, the Earl of March, from the confinement in which he had been so long kept by the jealousy of the late king, and restored to him the estates of his father. The son of the brave young Henry Percy, better known as Hotspur, was recalled from exile, and also restored to his family estates and honours. The remains of King Richard, which had been buried obscurely at the Friars' Church, at Langley, the new monarch caused to be taken up, and interred with great ceremony in Westminster Abbey, by the side of his first wife, the "good Queen Anne." This magnanimous conduct converted to friends those who might reasonably have looked upon him with feelings of enmity.

The first year of Henry's reign was, however, distinguished by a sort of insurrection of the Lollards, or followers of the opinions of the reformer Wycliffe. Notices were posted during the night upon the church doors, stating that, if the people were oppressed, there were 100,000 of them ready to rise and assert their rights by force of arms. Our information about this affair is by no means so full as might be wished; but it was supposed that the secret leader of this insurrection was Sir John Oldcastle, who became Lord Cobham in consequence of his marrying the heiress of that title, and who was commonly known as "the good Lord Cobham." He had been one of the dissolute companions of the king, when the latter was Prince of Wales; but having attentively read the writings of Wycliffe, he became an altered man, and was soon regarded as the most distinguished leader of the reform party in religion.

To put down Lollardism, the clergy thought it desirable that a victim of rank should be sacrificed to strike terror into the nation, and to roll back the increasing tide of inquiry and distrust of the church. Taking advantage of the riots, they accused Lord Cobham to the king as a heretic and a leader of the disaffected people; and required permission to proceed against him. Henry, who was loth to think ill of his late friend, told the archbishop that he himself would talk to Cobham, and endeavour to persuade him to renounce his errors. Having sent for him, the king advised the noble reformer "to submit to his mother, the holy church; and, as an obedient child, to acknowledge his fault." That resolute man would not abandon his conviction of the truth to win the smiles of the prince, and he replied—"I am ever most anxious to yield prompt obedience to you, my lawful sovereign, knowing you to be a Christian king, and, as God's vicegerent on earth, carrying the sword of justice to punish evil-doers, and to protect those who are faithful to virtue. But suffer me to add that, touching the pope and his spirituality, I owe him neither suit nor service; and from the sacred Scriptures I know him to be the great antichrist, the beast of perdition, and the enemy of God. His commands are unlawful, are against the truth, and he himself is an abomination standing in the holy place."

Henry was angry at this intemperate language, and, perhaps, vexed that his arguments should produce no effect; therefore he gave the archbishop permission to proceed against Lord Cobham as a heretic; and that nobleman was committed to the Tower. When brought before the archbishops and prelates assembled in the chapter-house of St. Paul's, he defended himself for two days with great skill and eloquence. They asked if he would confess his errors, and receive absolution for them. In answer, he knelt devoutly on the pavement, and raising his hands towards heaven, said—"I confess myself here unto THEE, my eternal living God, that in my frail youth I offended Thee, O Lord, most grievously, by pride, wrath, covetousness, pleasure, and intemperance. Many men have I injured in mine anger, and done other horrible sins; good Lord, I ask Thee mercy." Then standing erect, the tears filled his eyes, as he added, "Lo, good people, lo—for breaking of God's law, and his great commandments, these men never yet cursed me; but for their own laws and traditions, most cruelly do they handle me and other men. And, therefore, both they and their law, according to the promise of God, shall be utterly destroyed."

These bold and true remarks threw the court, for a time, into confusion, and the archbishop then examined Lord Cobham as to his belief. That brave man replied, "I believe fully and faithfully in the laws of God. I believe that all is true which is contained in the sacred Scriptures of the Bible. Finally, I believe all that my Lord God would that I should believe." This answer was not considered a satisfactory one; and, as he refused to worship the cross, and to admit the doctrine of transubstantiation, he was convicted of heresy, and sentenced to the flames. It is very likely that the king was shocked at this sentence against his old friend, for he granted him a respite for fifty days; and during that time Lord Cobham contrived to escape from the Tower, and fled to Wales. It is very likely that Henry secretly permitted him to do so.

Disappointed of their victim for the time, the priests resolved that, if possible, Lord Cobham should not finally escape them. They accused him, therefore, of having collected a great host of people, and of an attempt to seize the person of the king at Eltham. This is denied; and some writers have asserted, that he was quite innocent of the insurrection, and that his name was associated with it for the purpose of his ruin. It was reported that 25,000 rebels were to assemble at midnight, in St. Giles's Fields, and await the arrival of Lord Cobham. Henry caused the city gates to be closed to prevent any reinforcement of the Lollards from that quarter, and proceeded with a detachment of troops to the meadows. Instead of the vast assemblage that he expected, he found only eighty persons, about twenty of whom were killed, and the rest taken prisoners. Whether these men had met for any rebellious purpose it is difficult to say; and some have asserted that they were only inoffensive Lollards, who, not daring to meet openly for prayer and instruction, used to assemble at night for religious purposes in the fields round London. At the same time that these poor people were seized, a small party of Lollards were arrested, with arms in their hands, at Harengay Park. Among them was Sir Roger Acton, a friend of Lord Cobham's, and Beverley, one of their preachers. No mercy was shown to these suspected conspirators; and on the 13th of January, 1414, thirty of them were hanged in St. Giles's Fields as traitors, and then burnt, gibbets and all, as heretics.

Cobham himself was not found; and it seems most likely that he had nothing to do with this insurrection —if, indeed, it was one at all. Three years afterwards, when Henry was in France, Cobham left his hiding-place in Wales, and joining a party of Lollards, invited the assistance of the Scots. This was a treasonable act; and the Scots flying before the approach of the regent with an army, Cobham was compelled again to seek refuge in Wales. This time he was not so fortunate, for he was betrayed and taken prisoner.

On being arraigned before the House of Lords, they condemned him to be hanged as a rebel, and burnt as a heretic. The sentence was executed [A.D. 1417] in a revolting manner: he was suspended horizontally from the gibbet by three chains, and in this attitude a lighted torch was applied to the pile of faggots beneath him. But his priestly torturers were disappointed in their desire to gloat over his dying agonies: such fiendish cruelty defeated itself, for the smoke ascended from the lighted faggots in so dense a cloud, that it is supposed he was suffocated before the fire reached him. Enthusiasm or misfortune seems to have affected his mind, for he is reported to have begged a bystander to bear witness that he should rise from the dead on the third day after his execution; and that when the king beheld that miracle, he trusted all persecution of the Lollards would cease.

Archbishop Arundel died in February, 1414: he was seized with some painful disease of the tongue, which deprived him of his speech, and in a short time terminated his life. He had lately condemned Lord Cobham to the flames as a heretic; and the followers of that unhappy nobleman declared that this was the visible judgment of heaven; that the Lord had caused the offending tongue, which had pronounced so cruel and unjust a sentence, to become mute for ever.

Arundel was succeeded in his office as primate by Chichely, the Bishop of St. David's. This prelate was even more severe and persecuting in his temper than his predecessor, and he caused the Lollards to be apprehended in such numbers, that there were not prisons enough to put them in. To obviate this, he built an addition to Lambeth Palace, which is still known as the Lollard's Tower. In the year 1415, he caused two tradesmen of London, named John Claydon and Richard Turmin, one a furrier and the other a baker, to be burnt to death in Smithfield for heresy. The crime of Claydon seems to have consisted only in his having some books on the reformed principles of religion in his possession; but, as he had been in prison before, on a charge of holding erroneous doctrines, he was instantly condemned as a relapsed heretic. It is painful to think that such cruel acts could be committed by a Christian priesthood, in the name of that divine religion which expressly forbids all ill-will and violence, even to our greatest enemies.

It was the dying advice of the late king to his son, not to let the English barons and people remain long at peace, because they were of so restless a nature, that, if they were not occupied by wars abroad, they would engage in insurrection at home. Henry had not forgotten this recommendation; and he had been little more than a year upon the throne, when he sent ambassadors to Paris, to demand the crown of France. He based his claim upon the unjust pretensions of Edward III., which have been already explained. Henry knew very well that he had no right to the crown of France; but he wished to go to war with the people of that country, and was glad of any excuse for doing so. For this reason he made a demand, which he knew would never be granted, and began collecting an army for the invasion of his continental neighbours.

Henry's ambitious designs were encouraged by the clergy, for a reason which is not greatly to their credit. When he demanded a supply of money from his parliament, that body renewed the offer they had formerly made to his father, and desired him to seize the lands of the church. The clergy, in alarm, wished to turn the mind of the king from this idea by filling it with other business; and Chichely, the Archbishop of Canterbury, persuaded him that his claim to the crown of France was a just one, and that God would assist him in obtaining it. He added, that the clergy would subscribe a larger sum for carrying on the war, than their predecessors had before given for any purpose whatever. Indeed, the archbishop made such a long and eloquent speech upon the subject, that it is said Henry was quite convinced that his claim was a religious and proper one.

Thus encouraged, the king resolved to push his demand, which the wretched condition of France at that time rendered as ungenerous as it was unjust. That unhappy country was afflicted by an insane king and a civil war. The Burgundians and Armagnacs kept the people in a state of uproar by their dissensions; and their excesses were backed by two rival bodies of workmen—the butchers and carpenters of Paris. The butchers, after committing many atrocities, and murdering numbers of people, for the good of France, as they said, were overcome and driven out of Paris by the carpenters. After a series of horrors which desolated the country, interrupted all trades and arts, and reduced the wretched people almost to a state of starvation, the rival nobles agreed to a reconciliation; and a peace was entered into by the Burgundians and the Armagnacs, that they might unite their powers to resist the invasion of the English.

The treachery and wickedness of the dauphin, the eldest son of the insane king, was so great, that he chose this moment for raising himself at the expense of his country, and actually conceived a plot for driving both the Burgundians and Armagnacs from Paris, and murdering all those who resisted. The plot, however, was discovered: this worthless prince fled from Paris, and the two great factions began their quarrels again.

The Armagnacs then triumphed; but the changes were singularly rapid, and the dauphin shortly afterwards returned, and made himself master of Paris. There he insulted the wretched people by a display of the most prodigal extravagance. While the streets were filled with gaunt, wolfish-looking men and women, and emaciated children, crying in vain for bread, the dauphin and his wanton companions kept up a succession of masked balls and luxurious festivities. Everywhere in France—except in this thoughtless wicked court—there existed violence, confusion, and horror. Such a state of things could not last; and the miserable people even looked towards the invasion of the English with a sort of wild hope. "They cannot treat us worse," said they, "than our own rulers do."

Such was the distracted state of France when Henry declared himself its lawful king, and demanded that the crown should be resigned to him. At first no answer was returned; but the French saw, from his warlike preparations, that he was in earnest. Soon after he sent a second message, saying that he would surrender his claim to the crown of France, and enter into a perpetual peace and alliance, on condition of his receiving Catharine, the French king's daughter, as his wife; with 2,000,000 crowns as her portion, together with 1,600,000 more as the ransom of King John, who had been taken prisoner by the Black Prince at Poictiers. Besides this, he demanded all the provinces which had been ceded to Edward III. by the treaty of Bretigny; and the sovereignty of Normandy, Anjou, Maine, and some territories in Provence.

Henry knew that these exorbitant demands would not be complied with; and when the French offered him the hand of the Princess Catharine, with a dowry of only 600,000 crowns and the duchy of Aquitaine, he rejected their overture with contempt. He had made up his mind for war; and even a triumph over the French, unless attended by what is called the glory of military pomp, would not satisfy him.

Having appointed his brother John, the Duke of Bedford, regent during his absence from England, Henry [A.D. 1415] started with his army to Southampton, there to embark for France. At that famous seaport town his expedition and his life ran a risk of suddenly ending together. His own cousin, the Earl of Cambridge, with Lord Scrope and Sir Thomas Grey, conspired together to murder him. It is said that they were bribed to commit this wicked deed by the French princes, who, if it had succeeded, would thus have averted the storm that threatened them. The object of the conspirators was, after the death of Henry, to place Edmund Mortimer, the Earl of March, upon the throne; but the young prince, shocked at their perfidy, and animated by feelings of honour that do him infinite credit, is supposed to have disclosed the plot to the king. Henry was extremely indignant, for he had treated all the three traitors as his intimate friends; and with one of them, Lord Scrope, he was on such terms of familiarity, that they frequently shared the same bed. The conspirators were brought to trial, condemned to death, and immediately afterwards beheaded.

The conspiracy put down, Henry sailed for France with an army of about 30,000 men, on the 11th of August, 1415, and landed near Harfleur. It took three days to disembark the troops and stores; and, on the 17th, he commenced the siege of the town and fortress of Harfleur, which surrendered to him on the 22nd of September. Having taken possession of the town, he drove out all the French inhabitants, intending to re-people it with English. But this victory, unimportant as it was, cost Henry an enormous amount of human life: the place and the season were so unhealthy that his soldiers died by hundreds; and, after having sent his sick and wounded back to England, his army of 30,000 men was reduced to about 9,000.

Such a force was too small for any important enterprise; and a French army, of more than 50,000 men, was advancing towards the English. Henry's officers recommended him to return to England; but his pride would not permit him to do that; and he feared the contempt of his people if he went back, after having accomplished so little. "No," said he, "no; we must first see, by God's help, a little more of this good land of France, which is all our own. Our mind is made up to endure every peril, rather than that they shall be able to reproach us of being afraid of them. We will go on, and it please God, without harm or danger; but if they disturb our journey, why then we must fight them, and victory and glory will be ours."

Henry began his march from Harfleur in October, intending to pass through Normandy, Picardy, and Artois to Calais. His progress must have been dreary enough; for the country was almost barren, and the people miserably poor, therefore his army found great difficulty in obtaining provisions. The peasants themselves were almost starving, and had scarcely anything to give or sell; and the English soldiers soon became ill and feeble for want of proper food. Besides this, immense bodies of French soldiers followed them at a distance, and killed every one who strayed from the main army. At length, Henry reached the river Somme, by the Blanche-Taque or White Spot, where Edward III. had crossed shortly before the battle of Crecy. He also hoped to be able to cross the river at this point; but he found the bridges broken down, the fords fortified, and columns of French soldiers watching him from the opposite banks.

Affairs began to look desperate; and King Henry had good cause to fear that his small force would be hemmed round, and utterly destroyed by the enemy. Proceeding up the river, he made several attempts to cross it, but was each time driven back: at length, discovering a ford near St. Quentin, into the bottom of which stakes had not been driven, he dashed into the river, and got his army and waggons safely across.

Having surmounted this difficulty, Henry commenced his march to Calais on the 5th of October, ordering, "that no one, under pain of death, should burn, lay waste, or take anything on the way, except necessaries." Notwithstanding his danger, he preserved his coolness, and kept excellent order in his army; for disorder or flight would have brought certain destruction upon it. His patience and self-possession must have been sadly tried, for numbers of his soldiers dropped upon the roads, and died there from want and sickness. On the 24th of October he crossed the river of Ternois at Blangi, and beheld the whole French army drawn up in the plains of Azincourt; which place has since that time been called, in England, Agincourt. A battle was unavoidable; but the chances of success were fearfully against the English, for the French army was six times more numerous than theirs. In the course of the day, Henry sent a gallant Welsh officer, named Davy Gam, to ascertain the strength of the enemy. On his return, this brave man said, "There are enough to be killed, enough to be taken prisoners, and enough to run away." This quaint answer pleased the king; for it showed a hopeful, fearless mind; and he thought, from it, that his poor soldiers were resolved to do their best.

When night came on, it rained and was very cold; but the English kept up their spirits by playing military airs, though some of them made their wills, confessed to their priests, and took the sacrament. If sad at heart, they showed no signs of fear; they were too proud to do that: if they must die, they would die as became Englishmen, with arms in their hands, and faces to the foe; but they still remembered what their forefathers had done at Crecy and at Poictiers, and they had hopes that they might live, and live to conquer. The French, on their part, were certain of the victory, and they passed the night in carousing, and calculating the ransom of the prisoners they expected to take the next day.

Henry was up at sunrise on the 25th of October, and heard matins and mass with his soldiers; and then, placing his army between two woods, he patiently awaited the attack. As usual, the archers were ranged in the front; and each man, besides his customary arms, carried a long stake sharpened at both ends and tipped with iron; these they struck in a slanting position into the ground, with the points towards the foe, and thus formed a defence against the attacks of the French cavalry. When all was ready, Henry rode from rank to rank, encouraging his troops. On his surcoat the arms of England and France were gorgeously embroidered; and round his bright steel helmet he wore a golden coronet radiant with gems; but his bright grey eye, gleaming with hope, and the cheerful confidence expressed in his manly face, attracted the notice of his troops far more than the brilliancy of his accoutrements. He told his soldiers that he had resolved either to conquer or perish, and assured the archers that the French had sworn to cut off the three fingers of the right hands of all they took prisoners, so that they should never be able to use a bow again. He said they had not come into France like enemies, burning towns and villages, and plundering the people; and that they were not like their adversaries, who were full of sin, and fearless of God.

An officer, named Walter Hungerford, said that he wished some of the brave knights and archers, who were then living idly in England, were present to help them. Henry overheard this remark, and instantly exclaimed, "No! I would not have a single man more. If God gives us the victory, the fewer we are, the more honour; and if we lose, the less will be the loss to our country. But fight with your usual courage, and God and the justice of our cause will protect us. Before night, the pride of our enemies shall be humbled in the dust; and the greater part of that multitude shall be stretched on the field, or captives in our power." Such heroic conduct on the part of the king spread a fearless confidence throughout the English ranks.

Notwithstanding their superiority of numbers, the French hesitated, and would not begin the attack; Henry therefore distributed some food and wine among his men, to give them strength and heart. It was strange that the French should have felt any misgivings as to the result; but they seem to have done so; and they even sent a messenger to Henry, offering to permit him to pass freely on to Calais, if he would restore Harfleur, set all his prisoners at liberty, and abandon his claim to the crown of France. The resolute king refused these offers, and still awaited the attack. Again the French paused; and then Henry himself resolved to begin the battle. He secretly sent two bodies of archers to lie in ambush, one in the rear of the French army, and the other on its left flank or side. As soon as the battle began, these concealed troops were to set fire to some buildings that were near them, and thus endeavour to create an alarm among their enemies.

"Banners advance!" cried Henry; and in an instant the whole English army was in motion, marching on over the wet miry ground to within bow-shot of the French army. Striking their pointed stakes into the earth, the English archers set up a loud cheerful shout, which was answered by their comrades in ambush, and the next instant the air was darkened, both before and behind the French, by the thick flights of winged arrows that clove their way through it. For a moment they were astonished; but quickly recovering their self-possession, the French shouted "Mountjoye! St. Denis!" and pointing their lances, spurred their horses on to the attack of the archers. These men, who were gentlemen, thought that they must, by a desperate charge, be able to break the ranks of the archers, who were mostly peasants. But the latter shot their long arrows with so much force and rapidity, right into the faces of the approaching horsemen, that many fell dead from their steeds; some turned and rode back; and the horses of others, being wounded, plunged about, half mad with the pain, and became unmanageable. Only three knights broke through the ranks of those sturdy bowmen, and they were instantly dragged from their horses, and put to death with the knives and hatchets of the English.

An utter want of order prevailed throughout the French army; it contained so many nobles and leaders, that contradictory orders were given; and soon after this first repulse, the over-crowded troops fell into confusion. Tearing up their stakes, the English archers advanced with confident huzzas; and the French cavalry falling back, got into some newly-ploughed fields, which had been so softened by the heavy rain that they sunk deep into the mire, and were scarcely able to extricate themselves. Then the English archers, slinging their bows behind them, rushed forward with their bill-hooks and hatchets, slaying all they met.

One division of the French army was defeated; but a second remained, far more numerous than the whole of the English; and Henry, calling back his archers who had done such good service, advanced to the attack with his men-at-arms. The French then fought with more vigour; and Henry, whose glittering coronet was seen everywhere in the thickest of the battle, was several times in danger of losing his life. Eighteen knights had bound themselves together by an oath, that they would either kill him or take him prisoner. Riding up in a body, one of them struck Henry upon the helmet with his battle-axe; and the king, reeling beneath the blow, staggered and fell upon his knees. At that moment he would have lost his life, but for the fidelity and bravery of his troops, who closed round him like a living wall, and killed all his assailants.

The Duke of Alençon then fought his way towards the English sovereign, and cleaving down the Duke of York, aimed a blow at Henry's head; but the broad axe glanced aside, and only clove away part of the diadem which encircled his helmet. The next moment the French noble was attacked by such a host of English, that, foreseeing the certainty of his fate if he resisted, he shouted to the king, "I surrender to you. I am the Duke d'Alençon." Henry would have saved him; but before he could speak, the duke was struck dead at his feet. His death caused a general panic; and the French army, yet far more numerous than the English, turned and fled.

Then the English had leisure to make prisoners; and a great number, both gentlemen and common soldiers, were soon taken. While they were thus occupied, they saw the remains of the French rear-guard at some distance, and heard a loud noise and cry from their own camp. Fearing that the enemy had rallied, and commenced another attack, Henry commanded that all his prisoners should be put to death. A fearful slaughter of these unhappy men followed; but it was soon discovered that the alarm from the camp was occasioned by a body of peasants and vagabonds who had attacked it in the hope of plunder, and killed many of the boys and women who remained with it. On learning this, Henry stopped the carnage, and saved the lives of those prisoners who remained.

Calling around him the French and English heralds, the victor exclaimed, "We have not made this slaughter, but the Almighty, as we believe, for the sins of France." This was a convenient sort of morality, and quite in accordance with the ideas of the people of those times; but it seems a miserable, if not blasphemous, excuse for such wholesale murder. Henry had no right to invade France; if he did so, he knew that its people would resist him, and therefore his ambition was the cause of all the horrors that ensued. But, having quieted his conscience by laying the murders of that day to the charge of the Merciful One, he asked the heralds to whom the victory was due? Mountjoye, the French king-at-arms, replied humbly—"To the King of England; to him must the victory be given." "What," said Henry, "is the name of yonder castle?" He was told it was called Azincourt. "Then," continued the king, "since all battles ought to be named after the nearest castle, let this battle bear, henceforward and lastingly, the name of the battle of Azincourt."

Scarcely ever was there a conflict which proved more fatal to the nobles and chivalry of France. Seven princes of the royal family of that nation had perished, together with a long list of the bearers of illustrious titles. Besides these, 8,000 French gentlemen lay dead upon that blood-sodden field, and 2,000 common soldiers. Henry's prisoners are said to have amounted to the number of 14,000. The English lost only about 1,600 men: many will have it that their loss was much smaller; and some old chroniclers have said that it did not amount to more than forty; but that is a vain and idle boast. Henry had many noble prisoners; and amongst them was the Duke d'Orleans, who, besides being severely wounded, was seized with a deep melancholy at the disgrace of his country. Henry strove to console him. "If," said he, "God has given me the grace to win this victory, I acknowledge that it is through no merits of mine own. I believe that God has willed that the French should be punished; and if what I have heard be true, no wonder at it; for they tell me that never were seen such disorders, such a license of wickedness, and such vices as now reign in France. It is pitiful and horrible to hear it all, and certainly the wrath of the Lord must have been awakened!"

The next day, the 26th of October, Henry and his army continued their march towards Calais. His troops were too few, and too much enfeebled by want and sickness, to follow up their success; and therefore, having concluded a truce for two years, he determined, at once, to proceed to England. There he was received with expressions of the wildest delight: he entered London in triumph, and the citizens held a great festival in his honour. At the foot of London-bridge two turrets had been erected for the occasion, and in front of them stood a tremendous fellow dressed up as a giant, who recited some verses written to welcome the monarch. Upon one of the turrets was placed a representation of a lion and an antelope, and, on the other, a number of pretty little girls, dressed in white, and decorated with little crowns of flowers, to make them look like angels: they greeted the king by singing, "Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord." When he had proceeded through the crowded streets (the houses of which were hung with rich silks and tapestries), as far as Cornhill, he beheld a tower filled with patriarchs, who chanted, "Sing unto the Lord a new song; praise His name in the holy church." As the king passed, they threw down a shower of living birds. In Cheapside there were fountains, which spouted jets of wine, and more singing patriarchs, and people dressed as kings, who welcomed the monarch on their knees. Other pageants were presented; and when Henry entered St. Paul's, amidst the joyful pealing of church-bells and the deafening shouts of dense crowds of his delighted people, the Te Deum was sung by a great chorus of priests, and then the king went home to his palace at Westminster.

For some days, nobles, priests, and people all strove which should express most affection for him, and joyous shouts of "Long live our brave king!" "Long live Harry the Fifth!" rang through the towns and villages of England. Thus it always is, in England and elsewhere: no gifted man, be he statesman, prelate, poet, or philosopher, whether he has saved life by his discoveries, or added to its dignities and comforts by his inventions, is ever regarded by his countrymen with that enthusiaatic love and admiration which they lavish on the CONQUEROR! The power of the sword still seems greater than that of the pen, and might yet triumphs over mind; as it frequently does over right. Notwithstanding the dreams of philanthropists, there appears to be no prospect of this state of things being reversed.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

CONCLUSION OF THE REIGN OF HENRY THE FIFTH.—A.D. 1415—1422.

ENRY'S parliament voted him liberal supplies of money; for they were in a temper to give him anything: still two years passed away before he again led an army to France to press his unjust claim on the crown of that country. The French learnt no wisdom from the terrible misfortune they had so lately experienced, and were still engaged in fighting with and murdering each other at home. In the year after the battle of Agincourt, they did make a vain attempt to recover Harfleur from the hands of the English. The governor of that town sent to Henry for assistance; and the king despatched his brother, the Duke of Bedford, with a fleet to rescue the place from the French, who had besieged it both by land and sea. The French fleet was superior in numbers to the English; for it had the assistance of some vessels from Spain and Genoa; but, after a savage fight, the English were the victors, and again were the French compelled to acknowledge their inferiority. Having driven them away from Harflour, the duke put that town into a state of defence, and then returned to England.

Henry began to prepare for another invasion of France before the truce had expired; and, in 1417, he carried over an army of 35,000 men, 16,000 of whom were archers. This army left Southampton on the 23rd of July, and landed, on the 1st of August, at Tonque, in Normandy, without any opposition. Having stormed and taken many towns and castles, he established himself in winter quarters. The French court, knowing the misery of its own people and the power of its opponent, sent messengers to beg for a peace. Henry would grant none except on his own conditions; which were, that the Princess Catharine should become his queen, and that he should be declared regent of France, and successor to the throne upon the death of the monarch who then occupied it. Though the French had suffered severely, they were not inclined to submit to such terms as these; and, in the spring of 1418, Henry renewed his military exploits.

His army was soon strengthened by additional thousands from England; and he speedily took town after town until he had subdued the whole of Lower Normandy. Then, crossing the river Seine, he laid siege to the important and strongly fortified city of Rouen. It was bravely defended; and Henry, unable to take it by storm, resolved to blockade and reduce it by famine. As the citizens were well supplied with provisions, he was detained for many months before its walls; and during that time he was visited by the Cardinal Ursini, who came with a meritorious desire of inducing him to put an end to the war. Henry had a great respect for the church; and, according to the notions then generally entertained upon the subject, he was a religious man; but he would not forego his ambitious schemes. So far from doing so, he made religion an excuse for continuing his cruel conflict. In answer to the cardinal, he said, "It is the will of Heaven; God has led me hither by the hand to punish the sins of the land, and to reign in it like a true king. There is no sovereign, no law, in France. No one thinks of resisting me. I have just rights, and I shall go on and put the crown of France upon my head. It is the will of God." At length the people of Rouen were starved into submission, and surrendered, after having eaten every horse and dog in the town. Henry was not an ungenerous conqueror: he spared the lives of the soldiers and the property of the citizens, merely making the latter pay a heavy fine.

The French were alarmed, and the two factions into which their government was divided, entered into treaty with the English sovereign. These factions then consisted of the queen and the Duke of Burgundy on the one hand (who had, as they held possession of the insane king, carried the appearance of legal authority), and the dauphin on the other, who was looked up to by a very large party as being the true heir to the monarchy. Henry listened to both, and then offered to make peace with the queen and the Duke of Burgundy. He said he would abandon his claim to the throne of France, on condition of his receiving the Princess Catharine in marriage, the possession of Normandy and his other conquests, and all the territories ceded to the English by the treaty of Bretigny. These conditions were agreed to by the queen and the duke, and there only remained some little formalities to conclude the business. But the French were not sincere in their conduct; and having trifled with Henry for some time, the queen and the Duke of Burgundy suddenly broke off the negotiations, and entered into an alliance with the dauphin and his party against the English.

Henry was not the man to let treachery and insult pass unpunished. Resuming the war, he led his army almost to the walls of Paris, and took the populous town of Pontoise, where he found a considerable treasure. Though the two French factions were reconciled to each other, yet they could not agree, and the depraved nobles contrived to bring more misery upon their country than the English did. The dauphin and his associates having invited the Duke of Burgundy to a conference at Montereau, on the 18th of August, 1419, to consult on the best means of promoting the welfare of France, murdered him in a brutal and perfidious manner. All his countrymen were disgusted with this act of savage treachery; and the people of Paris, swearing that they would avenge the murder of the duke, desired a truce with the English, whom they began to consider less their enemies than the son of their own king.

Philip, the son of the murdered duke, and the French queen, then entered in earnest into a treaty with Henry, at Troyes. It was arranged that he should marry the Princess Catharine, and succeed to the crown of France, after the death of the king then wearing it. The two countries were to be united under one sovereign: but both of them were to retain their peculiar laws, customs, and liberties; and, until the death of the French monarch, Henry was to be declared regent of France, and be invested with the power of government. It has been observed by an elegant writer of history, that "it is hard to say whether the consequences of this treaty, had it taken effect, would have proved more pernicious to England or to France. It must have reduced the former kingdom to the rank of a province; it would have entirely disjointed the succession of the latter, and have brought on the destruction of every descendant of the royal family; as the houses of Orleans, Anjou, Alençon, Brittany, Bourbon, and of Burgundy itself, whose titles were preferable to that of the English princes, would, on that account, have been exposed to perpetual jealousy and persecution from the sovereign."

These considerations were, however, either not thought of, or not regarded; for the treaty was concluded on the 24th of May, 1420, and accepted, without opposition, by the parliament and people of France. Indeed, it seemed as if Henry would become as popular in France as he was in England; and the prelates and barons of the former country were anxious to outdo each other in their readiness to acknowledge him as regent, and to take oaths of fealty to him. He was at once affianced to the Princess Catharine, who was exceedingly graceful and beautiful, and who seems to have been very amiable also. On the 2nd of the following June, the royal marriage took place in the church of St. John, at Troyes. The next day Henry gave a splendid banquet; but when some of the French nobles wished to celebrate the event by a series of tournaments and festivals, he resolutely prohibited it. France was now his country, and he wished to tranquillise it by driving out the dauphin and putting an end to civil war. "I pray," he said, "my lord the king to permit, and I command his servants and mine to be all ready to-morrow morning, to go and lay siege to Sens, wherein are our enemies. There every man may have jousting and tourneying enough; and may give proof of his prowess; for there is no finer prowess than that of doing justice on the wicked, in order that the poor people may breathe and live."

Henry soon reduced the town of Sens; and, after that, those also of Montereau and Melun, though he passed four months before the walls of the latter; but he failed in securing the dauphin, for that young prince fled into Languedoc, where he also assumed the title of Regent of France, and appealed to God and to his sword to maintain it. Shortly afterwards, Henry and his crazy old father-in-law, the French king, entered Paris together in triumph, amidst the shouts of the people; the procession also was made more imposing by the priests chanting, "Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord!" This hymn of welcome was not a very appropriate one; but the French people began to regard Henry rather as a deliverer than as an enemy; such had been the wretched anarchy to which they were subjected under their native rulers.

In the January of 1421, Henry took his young wife to England, where he was again received with enthusiastic affection by his people. Catharine was crowned queen at Westminster Abbey with great magnificence, and the king and queen made a royal progress together through many of the great towns.

Henry's career of success was not entirely unchequered; he had left his brother Thomas, the Duke of Clarence, governor of Normandy. The duke having invaded Anjou, which supported the dauphin, he was opposed by that prince and a body of 7,000 Scots, under the command of the Earl of Buchan. The two armies met at the village of Bangé; and, after a fierce conflict, the Duke of Clarence was slain, and the English defeated. The battle was not a disgraceful one; for, although 1,200 English were killed, and 300 more taken prisoners, they left not less than 1,000 of their enemies dead upon the field. This incident raised the spirits of the dauphin and his party, for it was the first action that turned the tide of success against the English. Thus encouraged, the dauphin collected more forces, and began to approach gradually towards Paris, where the people, finding their sufferings not greatly relieved, had begun to murmur against the English.

Henry was alarmed for the safety of his conquest. Having obtained a grant of money from his parliament, he collected a new army, consisting of 4,000 men-at-arms, and 24,000 archers. Amongst his ranks was James Stuart, the King of Scotland, whom Henry released from his long captivity. Leaving his queen at Windsor Castle, the warlike king embarked with his army at Dover; and, on the 12th of June, 1421, landed at Calais. His presence and decision of character soon restored the English supremacy; and, having taken several towns, he entered Paris, amidst the acclamations of the people. The dauphin was then besieging the town of Chartres; but he fled from its walls on the approach of Henry. About thirty miles from Paris was the town and strong fortress of Meaux, commanded by a savage officer, called the Bastard of Vaurus, an ally of the dauphin's. This man was notorious for his revolting cruelties; and whenever an Englishman or a follower of the Duke of Burgundy had the misfortune to fall into his hands, they were instantly slaughtered. Sometimes he plundered the surrounding country, and carried off the inhabitants as prisoners. If their friends could raise a sum of money for their ransom, he set them again at liberty; but if they could not afford to do so, he caused them to be hanged on an elm-tree outside the walls of Meaux. This man, as you may suppose, was the terror of the country for many miles round; but Henry had resolved upon putting a stop to his extortions and murders. For some months the town resisted, and then it was carried by storm. Its ruffianly commander fought desperately; but he was captured, and hanged on the very elm-tree which had been the unconscious instrument of so many of his cruelties. Three of his officers were also executed with him. This just retribution gave great satisfaction to the people.

While Henry was encamped before the walls of Meaux, he received intelligence that his queen, Catharine, had presented him with a son, at Windsor Castle. The little prince was born on the 6th of December, 1421; and his birth was celebrated by great rejoicings, both in France and England, for he was regarded as the future sovereign of both countries. In the following May, the queen arrived in Paris, where she was received with as much affectionate admiration as if she had been something more than human. The air rang with shouts, and the people implored blessings upon her beautiful and cheerful face? Everything seemed to smile upon Henry; and when, on the festival of Whitsuntide, he sat side by side with his queen in the palace of the Louvre, both of them arrayed in robes of state, and with the glittering symbols of royalty upon their brows, he might be said to have reached the pinnacle of his ambition. He was the actual ruler of two great nations—a king loved by his people, a hero admired by all Europe. The flower-girded cup of prosperity was filled for him to the brim; but a dim, shadowy form presented it: his prospect seemed one of beauty, hope, and glory; but a cloud was gathering in the distance. In the midst of his grandeur he was seized with a painful disease, of a kind that baffled the skill of the most eminent surgeons of the age.

Hearing that the dauphin had collected an army in the south of France, and that he was assisted by a body of Scottish troops, Henry left Paris, and marched against him. But the brave and ambitious king was supported by a false strength, arising from excitement; and, having proceeded about twenty miles, he was obliged to stop at Corbeil. Feeling himself seriously ill, he surrendered the command of the army to his brother, the Duke of Bedford, and was carried back, in a litter, to the neighbourhood of Paris.

The progress of his disease was rapid; and in a little time he became aware that he was dying. His young queen was kept in ignorance of his condition, and did not see him in his last moments. With that resolute calmness which always distinguished him, he sent for the Duke of Bedford and his brother, Humphrey, together with some of the great barons of his court, to receive his dying commands. He explained to them many things about the business of the state, and entreated them to behave towards his infant son with the same faithfulness they had always shown to him. He said he did not fear to die, but he should like to have lived until France had been utterly subdued; he was sorry that he must leave unfinished a work he had carried on so successfully; but he expressed his confidence that their courage and prudence would be able to complete what he had left undone. He felt no remorse for the misery he had inflicted on France, and the blood he had caused to be shed; he thought his quarrel a just one, and that it was God's will that he should punish the people of that country for their sins. The regency of that kingdom he left to his younger brother, the Duke of Bedford; that of England to his youngest, the Duke of Gloucester; and to the Earl of Warwick he bequeathed the care of his son. He exhorted them to keep peace and friendship among themselves during the long minority; and desired them never to make peace with the dauphin unless he surrendered all claim to the crown of France. Even if their arms were not so successful as he expected, they were never to make peace with France unless Normandy and Aquitaine were given up to them; and he then warned them not to release the Duke d'Orleans and the other French princes who were taken prisoners at Agincourt.

His listeners wept, and vowed a religious obedience to his commands; and, also, that they would protect his queen and infant son. Desiring the presence of his physicians, he asked how long they thought he had to live? One of them, with tears in his eyes, replied, that without a miracle he could not live above two hours. Then, calling for his confessor and his chaplains, the dying monarch directed them to chant the seven penitential psalms. As the solemn service proceeded, he lay almost motionless, and it was evident that the rigidity of death was fast settling over his face. When they came to the verse, "Thou shalt build up the walls of Jerusalem," he made a sign for them to stop, and then said that he had always intended, after he had subdued the whole realm of France, and restored it to peace and order, to conquer the Holy City from the Saracens. Having thus spoken, he expressed a wish for the priests to proceed, and in a few minutes he had ceased to breathe: he who had so often braved death in its most violent aspects, sank into that long, mysterious slumber as calmly as an infant. Henry died on the 31st of August, 1422, in the thirty-fourth year of his age, and the tenth of his reign.

No English sovereign was ever before buried with so much magnificence. The body, after being embalmed and enclosed in a leaden coffin, was placed on a magnificent car, divided into several compartments. The first bore a representation of the arms of St. George; the second, of the arms of Normandy; the third, of those of King Arthur; the fourth, of St. Edward; the fifth, of France; and the sixth, of England and France united. Upon the car was a bed of crimson and gold, on which reclined a statue of the late king in his robes, crowned, and holding a sceptre in his right hand, and a globe and cross in his left. Five hundred knights and esquires in coal-black armour, and with their spears reversed, rode in attendance upon it. After them came 300 persons arrayed in long white robes, and carrying torches; with them were mingled heralds bearing achievements, banners, and pennons. These were followed by the royal household, and James, the late captive King of Scotland, who attended as chief mourner. Some distance behind them came the widowed queen, with a numerous array of attendants. The body was carried from the noble cathedral of Notre Dame, at Paris, in slow and solemn procession to Calais, where a fleet was waiting to bear it to England. The enthusiastic joy which had been shown by the people when Henry had last landed there, was turned into universal sorrow.

Throughout the country his loss was regarded as a national calamity.

When the sad train approached London, it was met by a procession of churchmen, consisting of fifteen bishops in their pontifical attire, followed by a great body of abbots and monks. The people also came out in great multitudes, and reverently uncovered their heads as the gorgeous car containing the body of their late sovereign passed. Then the concourse of priests began chanting the impressive service for the dead; and in this manner the body was taken to St. Paul's, and the funeral obsequies performed in the presence of the chief nobles and parliament of England. Henry was afterwards buried in Westminster Abbey, near the shrine of Edward the Confessor.

His young and beautiful widow, Catharine, was left desolate in a land of strangers. Her grief was, no doubt, very sincere; but she soon suffered herself to be consoled. Not long after Henry's death, she married Sir Owen Tudor, a Welsh gentleman. He was a private man, and his father is said to have been a brewer; so people were rather scandalised at what was considered an unbecoming alliance. But Sir Owen was the handsomest man of the day; and if the queen did not please the nobles, she pleased herself. To put as good a face as possible upon the matter, it was reported that the Welshman was descended from the ancient princes of his country; but the report was not credited. Catharine brought him two sons, Edmund and Jasper; the first was created Earl of Richmond, and the second Earl of Pembroke. She died in 1437, and was buried by the side of her first husband in Westminster Abbey. Sixty-three years after the death of Henry, a descendant of Sir Owen mounted the English throne, and founded the House of Tudor.

A great deal has been written about the personal qualities and character of Henry V.; and few princes have been so extravagantly praised. Though not quite so great a hero as some of his admirers would represent him, he certainly was a prince of remarkable talents. He was cheerful in his temper, and affable in his manners, though latterly he grew rather proud and imperious; and is said to have committed a French officer to prison for looking in his face while he addressed him. Probably the look conveyed some defiant or offensive expression; for no other instance of such arbitrary conduct is related of Henry. On the contrary, he was usually distinguished by a noble magnanimity. His ambition was great; and it induced him to engage in an aggressive and unjustifiable war. His bravery was as great as his ambition, and his victories were seldom disgraced by cruelties. Though a devout man, according to the notions then held of devotion, and desirous of gaining the good opinion of the priesthood, yet he was greatly averse to the burning of heretics. In the beginning of his reign, he rather shocked Archbishop Chicheley, by telling him that he did not like persecution for opinion's sake, and that he wished more liberty in such matters. His friends loved him for his affability, and his enemies were often won to him by his mercy. Though we have not so many opportunities of judging of him in that capacity, yet he is said to have been as great a statesman as he was a warrior. He certainly understood the truest art of government—that of winning the affections of his people. He was a rigid preserver of justice, and his readiness in forming decisions was equal to his firmness in executing them. Some writers have praised him for generosity; but others, and especially the French (who have generally judged him with great fairness), have accused him of avarice. Perhaps he was occasionally slow in rewarding the brave soldiers and wise counsellors who served him; but his means were very limited, and his war expenses enormous.

His personal appearance was striking: he was tall and thin, with a graceful, well-knit figure, and a remarkably handsome countenance. His deportment was princely, his limbs powerful, and he was very active and expert in all warlike exercises. To this day his memory has been preserved with something like an affectionate fondness by the English people, who, notwithstanding the injustice of his wars, look back with pride to his brilliant victories.

CHAPTER XXXV.

THE REIGN OF HENRY THE SIXTH; CALLED HENRY OF WINDSOR.—A.D. 1422—1431.

A WISE Roman pontiff once exclaimed, "Woe to that land whose king is a child!" It may be added—and double woe to that land whose king, in spite of manly years, remains a child in character and mind. For years this was to be the position of England. Its new sovereign was an infant only nine months old; and, before he arrived at maturity, he was discovered to be, not only of too feeble and gentle a character to rule a fierce and turbulent people, but, at times, subject to that terrible calamity—mental derangement! The malady of his unhappy grandfather, the insane Charles VI. of France, descended to the infant King of England;—a fatal inheritance, which, together with the weakness of his character, encouraged the turbulence of his nobles, and led to that long series of savage and convulsive struggles between the Houses of York and Lancaster known as the Wars of the White and Red Roses.

The baby king, Henry VI., was considered too young for the performance of the ceremony of coronation. An infant who could not talk, of course could not take the customary oath to defend his people, and administer justice with impartiality; the coronation was, therefore, deferred, and did not take place until 1430, when the young sovereign was in his ninth year.

Soon after the death of the late king, the parliament assembled to provide for the future government of the country. That body objected to the Duke of Gloucester assuming the title of regent; they said that title could not be bestowed upon any one without their consent; and as that had not been asked, they would not sanction the appointment of their late sovereign. They gave the Duke of Bedford the title of Protector of the Church and Realm of England, a title which was supposed to confer less authority than the more sounding one of regent, and one which, they said, would constantly serve to remind him of his duty. A council of government was then named, consisting of sixteen members; and as the Duke of Bedford was absent in France, his younger brother, the Duke of Gloucester, was to act as his representative. The latter nobleman did not much like this prudent conduct of the parliament; but he was an honourable man, and yielded to it without opposition. The education of the little king was entrusted to his great uncle, Henry Beaufort, Bishop of Winchester, a natural son of John of Gaunt. This prelate, whose character has been painted in such dark and terrible colours by our great poet Shakspeare, was proud and ambitious; but in other respects he seems to have been rather an amiable than a wicked man. The taint upon his birth excluded him from any hope of ever occupying the throne of England; and this was one reason why he was chosen as the guardian and teacher of the baby monarch: but his ambition lay in another direction; and the wealthy bishop, who afterwards became a cardinal, aimed at obtaining the triple crown of Rome and becoming supreme sovereign of the Christian church.

The parliament did not object to the Duke of Bedford assuming the title of Regent of France That nobleman was a brave soldier and skilful general, and the English knew that their interests in that country could not be placed in better hands. He was surrounded by a number of daring and resolute officers, whose names have become as familiar as household words to the readers of history. There were the famous Earls of Warwick and Salisbury, with those of Somerset, Suffolk, and Arundel; the brave Sir John Talbot, with whose name French mothers used to frighten their children into silence, and whom Frenchmen thought was a devil in arms; and Sir John Fastolfe, who was as brave and noble as the humorous fiction—whose name so much resembles his—of our great poet was cowardly and worthless. If the English lost the country which Henry V. had so recently obtained, it was not for lack of stout hearts and strong arms—they had them in abundance; but because they had attempted a feat beyond their resources and power, and because it required a greater effort to retain France than to conquer it.

The death of Henry V. was followed by that of his father-in-law, the French king. He expired on the 22nd of October; and the fugitive dauphin, who was miserably poor, was proclaimed King of France by his followers. Shortly after, he was crowned and anointed at the city of Poictiers as Charles VII.; and although the English treated both him and the ceremony with contempt, yet he was supported by many patriotic Frenchmen, who wished to see the throne occupied by a native prince, and not by an English intruder. In the meantime, the Duke of Bedford had proclaimed the infant King Henry as sovereign of France, and the prelates, parliament, universities, and the principal citizens had sworn fealty to him.

Charles, after his coronation, collected an army of Scots and Frenchmen; and towards the close of 1423, laid siege to an important town called Crevant. This place belonged to the Duke of Burgundy—that powerful duke whose friendship the dying Henry had advised his successors always to court and retain. The regent Bedford, therefore, sent an English force, under the Earls of Salisbury and Suffolk, to raise the siege. On their way, the English were joined by a body of the followers of the Duke of Burgundy; but still their numbers were very much inferior to those of their opponents. Inferiority of numbers has, however, seldom dismayed the hearts of Englishmen, nor did it on this occasion; but, in consequence of it, an order was given to spare none, and to take no prisoners until the battle was won. The conflict took place on the banks of the river Yonne, the English being opposed to the Scots, and the followers of the Duke of Burgundy to their own countrymen, the French. This was an excellent plan; for the French soldiers dreaded the strength and prowess of the Scots, and feared to encounter them, and the English were a better match for the hardy warriors of the land of mists and mountains. A fierce battle ensued, and the English were victorious; the Frenchmen fled, and great numbers of Scots were slaughtered or taken prisoners. The battle of Crevant was, at that time, regarded as one of the military glories of England.

Though defeated, Charles was not subdued, and a number of trifling insurrections and sieges followed, which it is by no means necessary to detail. One was more important. The town of Ivry, in Normandy, held out for Charles; and as it was a strong and important place, the Duke of Bedford besieged it in person. After a resistance of three months' duration, the governor consented to surrender the town within a certain period, if no relief arrived. The fugitive king resolved to make an effort in its favour, and he sent all the military power he could collect to drive away Bedford and the English. His army consisted of about 7,000 Scots, and as many French: among the leaders of it were the famous Earls of Douglas and Buchan, and the Counts of Alençon, Aumale, and Narbonne. When these warriors arrived near Ivry, they were so struck by the good order and formidable appearance of the English army, that, although it was scarcely so numerous as their own, they hesitated to attack it. Leaving Ivry to its fate, they marched away to the town of Verneuil, into which they were admitted by the inhabitants.

Ivry, being thus abandoned, immediately submitted to the English, and Bedford then marched after the enemy, and in a very short time encamped his army before the walls of Verneuil, where the French and Scots took shelter. On the approach of the English, the leaders of the allies held a council of war, to determine the course they should pursue. All agreed that they could not long remain in Verneuil; because, if they did, they would consume all the provisions there, and be in danger of starving. Some of the Scots advised a retreat; they said that the past misfortunes of the French arose from their rashness in giving battle when there was no necessity for it; that this army was the last resource of the French king; that it was therefore necessary to be very cautious, for that in time the people might adopt his cause, and discord arise amongst his enemies. The rest, however, did not like the idea of turning their backs upon the enemy, and a battle was resolved upon.

The struggle was bravely contested; but, as usual, the impatience and impetuosity of the French led to their ruin. The Duke of Bedford placed a great body of archers in front, where they thrust their sharp stakes into the ground, in the same way as they had done at Agincourt. The brave, but prudent, Earl of Douglas wished to wait for the attack; but the Count of Narbonne, raising the national shout of France, "Mountjoye St. Denis!" rushed with his troops upon the English bowmen. The charge was a desperate one; many English perished; and a body of archers was thrown into confusion, and driven back to the rear. As it turned out, this was a fortunate circumstance; for the French had charged in that direction also, and these archers, instantly recovering their order, assisting in driving them back with great loss. The battle raged furiously for nearly three hours: many brave deeds were performed on both sides; but the French were losing ground; and when the archers returned from the rear, and shot their flight of death-winged arrows incessantly into the faces of their foes, the French and Scots turned and fled, leaving about 4,000 of their companions dead upon the blood-soaked earth. Among them was the Earl of Buchan and the Earl of Douglas, together with the son of the latter, and many other brave Scottish gentlemen. A number of French nobles and knights also lay among that grim host of silent warriors. Mingled with them were the bodies of about 1,600 Englishmen, all lying together peaceful and motionless enough then, for the hurricane and roar of battle were succeeded by the dread hush of death.

This battle was fought on the 27th of August, 1424, and the next day Verneuil surrendered to the Duke of Bedford. Thus the arms of England were again triumphant, and the cause of the fugitive Charles, and of French independence, seemed utterly destroyed. But the brightest prospects are often but treacherous ones; and this is peculiarly the case in war. In spite of their victories and power, circumstances were at work which were to destroy the dominion of the English in France. The Duke of Gloucester had married a princess, called Jacqueline of Hainault and Holland. The lady had previously been married to the young Duke of Brabant, a relation of the powerful French Duke of Burgundy; but as she much disliked her husband, she declared that their marriage was illegal, because they were cousins-german. After this declaration she left him, and married the English Duke of Gloucester. That nobleman considered that the states of Hainault and Holland now belonged to him, in consequence of the right of his wife to them; and raising a small army, they both went over and took possession of Mons, the capital of Hainault. The Duke of Burgundy was highly incensed at this conduct; he considered that Gloucester had insulted his relation, the young Duke of Brabant, by marrying his wife before she had been actually divorced; and he was jealous of the extension of the English power by their possessing Hainault and Holland. He sent an angry message to Gloucester, and these noblemen then quarrelled, and challenged each other to single combat. The duel did not take place; but the quarrel was kept up; and for about a year and a-half Gloucester defied all the power of Burgundy.

This dispute was a serious blow to the English supremacy in France. The troops which Bedford had expected from England were employed by Gloucester to support his cause against Burgundy in Hainault and Holland; and from that time Burgundy himself was an indifferent, if not treacherous, ally of the English. The Duke of Bedford thus found himself prevented from following up his victory at Verneuil.

Unable to accomplish his purpose of obtaining possession of the states of his wife Jacqueline, whose marriage with him had been annulled by the pope, Gloucester returned to England. He seems to have been of a passionate temper, for there he quarrelled violently with the rich and ambitious Bishop Beaufort, the tutor of the young King Henry. The retainers of the duke and the bishop fought in the streets of London; and so much disturbance was created, that it was feared a civil war might be the result of their dissensions. To reconcile them the Duke of Bedford came to England, and compelled them to shake hands. Beaufort was supposed to be not very sincere in his forgiveness, and soon afterwards he left the country.

Brittany had supported the cause of the English in France; but, during the absence of Bedford, the duke of that country had broken his alliance, and taken up the cause of the wandering French monarch, Charles. This greatly strengthened the latter, and another incident occurred which tended to raise the spirits of his followers. The Earl of Warwick having undertaken the siege of Montargis with a small army of not more than 3,000 men, that place was relieved by the Count of Dunois, who attacked Warwick with so much valour and skill, that the latter was compelled to raise the siege and retreat.

The Duke of Bedford was a brave soldier, and, in that respect, a worthy brother of Henry V. On his return to France he soon revived the great military reputation of the English. His first act was to punish the treachery of the Duke of Brittany, who but two years before had entered into a most solemn alliance with him. Collecting a great army, he fell upon Brittany before the people were prepared to resist him, and having defeated them, utterly devastated their country, and compelled the duke to submit to the conditions he imposed upon him. These were—immediately to abandon the cause of the French king, Charles; to observe the treaty of Troyes; to acknowledge the Duke of Bedford as regent of France, and to do homage for his duchy to the English sovereign. Bedford then determined on an exploit which, he thought, would utterly destroy the pretensions of Charles, and complete the subjugation of France. This was the taking of the rich and powerful city of Orleans.

Since the English had been in possession of Paris, many Frenchmen had regarded Orleans as the capital of their country. It is situated almost in the centre of France, and was considered a sort of key, or entrance, to the south of that kingdom. Past its walls flowed the Loire, a noble river, which nearly divides the land; and beyond that broad stream were most of the towns which still adhered to their native sovereign, Charles. Even the great conqueror, Henry V., had never crossed the Loire; and the conquest of France, on the south side of its banks, would be the fulfilment of his uncompleted scheme of ambition. But to accomplish that, Orleans must first be subdued; and Bedford resolved to reduce it either by siege or blockade. Having received a reinforcement of 6,000 soldiers from England, he entrusted the command of the expedition to the brave Earl of Salisbury, who had distinguished himself for his military skill in the wars of the late king. That general took several small places in the neighbourhood of Orleans, and then proceeded to encircle the city with his troops. By pausing to take these trifling advantages, instead of proceeding at once to the reduction of the city, his intention became known, and the French determined to use every exertion to prevent it.

The inhabitants of Orleans laid in a great stock of provisions and warlike stores, burnt the suburbs of their city, and desolated all the vineyards, fields, and gardens around it, that they might yield no supplies to their enemies. Neighbouring towns sent them provisions, money, and soldiers; and Charles and his courtiers, sensible of the great importance of the place, strained every nerve for its assistance. The Sire de Gaucourt was appointed the governor of Orleans, and many other brave and experienced leaders and their forces entered it before the arrival of the English. The coming struggle excited immense interest, even beyond the domains of France; for it was generally understood that it would be the last great effort of the people of that fertile land for their national independence.

Salisbury commenced the siege on the 12th of September, 1428. There was a bridge which led from the left bank of the river to the town; it was defended by a fortress called the Tournelles; and across this bridge he was desirous of leading his troops. The fortress was bravely defended; and even women mounted the battlements, and threw down stones and boiling oil upon the heads of the besiegers; but, after a severe conflict, it was taken. Some days afterwards, Salisbury ascended the tower of the Tournelles to overlook the town, and see where he could best attack it, when he was struck by a cannon-ball, which shot away part of his face, and instantly killed a gentleman who stood behind him. The brave English general languished for a week, and then died, to the great regret of the troops. The command was given to the Earl of Suffolk; and, as it was in the month of November, and the weather extremely cold, all thought of active warfare was postponed till the spring. The soldiers built wooden huts round the walls of the city, and protected them from the shots and arrows of the enemy by banks of earth. The people of Orleans had no notion of being quietly starved, and they contrived to obtain many supplies of provisions. To get them past the English lines into the city was the difficulty; and to effect that, a number of skirmishes took place, and many bold deeds were done.

Before the spring came the English besiegers were also in want of provisions, for bodies of French soldiers desolated the surrounding country, that it might not yield sustenance to the enemy; and no food was to be had, except from a distance. In consequence of this, in the February of 1429, the Duke of Bedford sent 500 waggon-loads of stores from Paris for the use of the English soldiers before Orleans. It being the season of Lent, a large part of this supply consisted of salted herrings. The convoy was guarded by 1,600 soldiers, led by Sir John Fastolfe; and the rumbling waggons, with their desired contents, arrived slowly, but safely, as far as a little village near Orleans, called Rouvrai.

While resting at this village, a body of French and Scotch soldiers, amounting to 4,000 men, marched suddenly into the road through which Sir John Fastolfe and his convoy must pass. They were led by the Counts of Clermont and Dunois, and their object was, to make a prize of the provisions intended for the English besieging Orleans, and give them to the French besieged within it. Fastolfe immediately prepared for a contest which he saw was inevitable. Having arranged his waggons in such a manner that they formed a protection to the archers, those stout-armed men placed their arrows on the string, and waited for the attack. The Scots were so confident of victory, on account of their superior numbers, that they rushed on with furious impetuosity. The English archers received them with their usual intrepidity, and shot so quickly, and with such fatal aim, that the Scots fell like ripe corn before the sickle. Terrified at the heaps of their dead comrades, the Scots drew back in confusion: the French hardly fought at all; but, thinking that discretion was the better part of valour, turned their horses' heads and fled from the field. The victory was complete; and Sir John Fastolfe, having rested his soldiers, led them and his convoy in triumph to the English camp round Orleans. On account of the kind of food contained in the waggons, this important conflict, fought on the 12th of February, 1429, was called the Battle of Herrings.

The English pressed the siege of Orleans with vigour: its inhabitants were beginning to feel the slow and terrible approach of famine; and the French king was so dispirited, that he began to despair. In this position the people of Orleans requested that their city might be delivered into the hands of the Duke of Burgundy, who, though a Frenchman, was an ally of England; and they promised to remain neutral. The Duke of Burgundy went to Paris, and himself delivered this message to the regent Bedford, who, with some coldness, replied, "That he was not of the humour to beat the bushes while others ran away with the game." By this he meant that those who had so nearly subdued Orleans ought to have the honour and profit of the conquest. The answer, though not very polite, was certainly such as might have been expected, especially as the Duke of Burgundy was but a slippery friend of the English interest: but that prince was greatly offended by it.

Famine then appeared openly in Orleans; the sick and feeble died from want, and strong men grew haggard, pale, and sullen. Wealthy citizens sat dejectedly on their thresholds, and hollow-eyed sentinels paced their rounds with sinking hearts. The English soldiers ate their herrings outside the walls of the city, and kept such good guard that no provisions could enter it. The French king, who was living with his followers at Chinon, despaired utterly, and would have fled into a remote province for safety, but for the persuasions of his more courageous wife.

At this time an extraordinary person appeared, who reversed the prospects of the war, raised the spirits of the French, struck a panic into the English, and finally compelled them to retire from the walls of Orleans. This strange being was not a mailed warrior or wise statesman, but an uneducated country girl. Word was brought to King Charles, at Chinon, that the deliverer of France was at hand, and waiting at the town of Fierbois for his permission to approach. This promised deliverer was the then obscure Joan of Arc, who afterwards excited so great a sensation throughout France, and, finally, became universally illustrious by the glory of her actions, and universally pitied in consequence of her country's ingratitude, and her own gloomy fate.

Joan of Arc was born about the year 1412, in the village of Domremy, near the town of Vaucouleurs. Her father was a shepherd, or some kind of rustic labourer; and as she had been industriously brought up, she also assisted in the toils of the field, and tended flocks of sheep in the wild and beautiful district in which she dwelt. Some writers tell us that she was employed as a servant in a village inn; and that, from the practice of occasionally attending upon horses, she acquired that dexterity in the saddle which she afterwards exhibited. She was one of five children, and her parents were too poor to bestow upon her any scholastic education; but she was, notwithstanding, very religiously brought up. Her mind, also, was of a highly devotional and poetic character, and she pondered so long over the dreadful accounts she heard of the wretchedness of her country, as to fall into a wild, religious, and patriotic enthusiasm. At length she fancied that she saw visions and heard angelic voices, and imagined that St. Michael, St. Margaret, and St. Catherine appeared to her, commanding her to go to the assistance of her king, to raise the siege of Orleans, and to drive the English from her suffering country.

Joan's imagination was so excited, that she not only fancied she saw visions of saints and angels surrounded by a brilliant halo of light, and heard them speak, but that she also conversed with them. She told them that she was of very humble birth, altogether uneducated, and was therefore unable to obey their commands. St. Michael answered, that aid would be given to her from heaven. Her father and mother had no faith in Joan's visions; they were alarmed at the idea of her leaving them, for fear she would come to harm, and endeavoured to persuade her to forget her fancies. Their efforts were useless; upon one point Joan was fixed—she must go to Orleans and liberate her country from the English. The saints and angels continued their visits and repeated their injunctions; but they did not appear so frequently as formerly: instead of them, she generally heard angelic voices only, which conversed with her and gave her advice. Of course all this was delusion, proceeding from a heated fancy, and a mind a little disordered upon one point; but it was upon that point only; in all other things she was remarkable for her clear views and sound judgment.

The country-people had among themselves an old prophecy, which said that France, after having been ruined by a wicked woman, was to be restored to prosperity and glory by a spotless virgin. The angel speakers, or voices, as Joan called them, had told her that she was the virgin spoken of, and that she would be made the instrument of the salvation of her suffering country. They said she must go first to the Sire de Baudricourt, the governor of the neighbouring town of Vaucouleurs, and that he would provide means for her to travel to King Charles, or the dauphin, as she still called him, because he had not been lawfully crowned. For a long time her father refused to let her go; but at length, one of her uncles, a kind-hearted wheelwright, was so struck with her patriotic enthusiasm and earnest piety, that he became a believer in the truth of her visions, and consented to accompany and protect her. Arrived at Vaucouleurs, she obtained an interview with Baudricourt; and, saying that the Lord had sent her, implored him not to neglect the voice of God, who spoke through her—but to second those heavenly revelations which had driven her to her present glorious enterprise. The governor, thinking that she was either mad, or a vain, foolish girl, dismissed her with angry contempt. Joan and her uncle did not, however, return home; they remained at Vaucouleurs, and Joan spent her time in prayers before the pictures and images in the churches, and in entreaties to the governor to listen to her again, and send her to King Charles. The townspeople wondered at Joan's devotion, and soon began to believe in her delusions; and in a little while they were all talking of the wonderful maid who was to save France. While at Vaucouleurs, the Duke of Lorrain, who was suffering from an incurable disease, attracted by her spreading reputation, applied to her as to a person of miraculous power, and desired to know if she could heal him. She replied, she had no mission to him; he had never been mentioned to her by her voices. The governor, Baudricourt, half suspected her to be a witch or sorceress; but he admitted her again, and caused her to be exorcised by a priest, who adjured her, if she was an evil spirit, to depart from them. As Joan did not vanish at these words, or shrink from the holy water that was sprinkled on her, but knelt very reverently and kissed the cross, both the priest and the governor thought that she could not be influenced by the devil; and the latter furnished her with a horse, a sword, and a suit of man's clothes, and sent her, with two esquires and four attendants, to Charles at Chinon.

The way was a long and perilous one, and the roads beset by English, and by Frenchmen who adhered to the English cause; but Joan and her little escort arrived there in safety. She sent messengers on before her to the ruined king, to tell him that the deliverer of France was come, and sought permission to approach him. On hearing who this deliverer was, Charles laughed; but after a few days he consented to see her. "Gentle dauphin," said she, on her introduction, "I am called Joan the Maid, and the King of Heaven hath sent me to your help. If it please you to grant me troops, by divine commission and force of arms I will raise the siege of Orleans, and conduct you to be crowned at Rheims, in spite of all your enemies. This is what the King of Heaven hath commanded me to tell you; and His will is, that the English shall return to their country, and leave you in peace in your own kingdom, as being its true and only heir." These words Joan spoke, not only without the bashful awkwardness which it is natural that an ignorant country-girl should feel in the presence of her sovereign and his court, but in a tone of firmness and earnest solemnity, which produced a great effect upon her listeners. It is added, that, taking Charles on one side, she told him, that, to prove the divine nature of her mission, she would reveal to him a circumstance which he believed to be known only to himself and to his Maker, and which she could not have become acquainted with except miraculously. She said, "Does not your majesty recollect, that on the All-Saints' day when you were about to receive the communion, you asked of Jesus Christ, if you were not the legitimate heir to the throne, to deprive you of the power or will to defend yourself; and if He was still irritated against France, to let the chastisement which He reserved for your people fall upon you alone?" It is said that Charles acknowledged the truth of this disclosure, and no longer doubted that the maid had supernatural and divine qualities: but the story is, at least, a very suspicious one. Things that are improbable may take place, but the age of miracles and supernatural inspiration has ceased.

Amongst other wonderful things told of Joan, it is stated that she demanded a particular sword then hanging up in the church of St. Catherine of Fierbois, which, although she had never seen, she described minutely with the marks upon it, and the place where it had long lain neglected; that sword, she said, was to be the instrument of her future victories. This account may be true; for perhaps there was some old legend or tradition, which she may have heard, connected with the weapon.

Though Charles and his courtiers were convinced of the divine mission of Joan, or at least pretended to be so, yet it was thought prudent to subject her to a long examination by the bishops and doctors of the church. Their object was, to discover whether her supposed preternatural power was from heaven, or whether she was a sorceress, and received help from the eternal enemy of man. Joan did not like so much questioning; but her answers were clear, sensible, delivered without hesitation, and sometimes even witty. One of her interrogators, who had a gruff voice and unpleasant manner, enquired of her, "What language do your voices speak?" "A pleasanter one than yours," replied the irritated maiden.

Another learned doctor said to her, "If God wishes and intends to deliver France from her enemies, where is the use of fighting?" Joan, who had no notion of men praying to God for assistance unless they had also tried to help themselves, replied, "Let us fight; the help will come when we are fighting." She was then asked to give a sign of her miraculous mission. "No!" exclaimed she, "not here; this is not the place; but send me to Orleans with as small number of men as you will, and I will give you a sure sign; that sign shall be the raising of the siege of Orleans." Joan's answers appeared perfectly satisfactory; and those who came persuaded of her imposture, left convinced of her inspiration. When, at last, it was determined to believe in the pretensions of this wonderful girl, and to employ her against the English, every effort was adopted to add to her fame, and increase the then widely-spread superstition respecting her. A new suit of shining white armour was forged expressly for her; the antique sword marked with five crosses, which she had desired, was procured for her from the church of St. Catherine. She was mounted on a spirited white horse, and bore in her hand a white banner dotted with fleurs-de-lis, and bearing on one side a representation of the Almighty, and on the other the words JESUS MARIA. Two heralds, two pages, and an esquire attended upon her; a body of horse-soldiers was placed under her command; and a procession of priests followed her, bearing another banner, which was supposed also to possess a miraculous power. Joan had a graceful figure, and handsome, though masculine, features; her complexion had an olive tinge, and her hair and eyes were of a raven blackness. She rode well; and when she appeared in her striking martial costume, both soldiers and people were seized with ecstacies of delight and admiration. Her graceful look, her character for sanctity, and the now general belief that the hand of God would lead her and smite her enemies, awoke a military enthusiasm among the French, and they flocked in numbers to the standard of their almost beggared monarch.

A great convoy of provisions was collected at Blois for the relief of the starving soldiers and citizens within the walls of Orleans; Joan and the most famous of Charles's generals were to carry it through the English lines into the beleaguered city; and they left Blois on the 28th of April, 1429. Before this, she had sent a letter to the besiegers, commanding them, in the name of the omnipotent Creator, by whom she was commissioned, immediately to raise the siege, and abandon France; and threatening them with the divine vengeance in case of their disobedience. In it she said—"I am chief of the war. In what place soever I find your men in France, I will make them depart whether they will or no. If they will submit, I will take them to mercy. The virgin comes from the King of Heaven to drive you out of France. If you will not obey, she will make such a havoc as has not been known in France this thousand years. And be assured the King of Heaven will send to her and her men-at-arms greater strength than you can have. Go, in God's name, into your own country." It concluded with the words—"Hear this advice from God and the virgin." The Earl of Suffolk and his officers pretended to ridicule this strange communication, and to treat Joan with contempt. They said the affair was a silly trick; and that the French must be mad to think, after the whole power and chivalry of their country had been in vain exerted against the English, that they could conquer by means of a cow-driving girl. But the soldiers had heard so much of the miraculous maiden, as she was called, that they were struck with superstitious awe, and their once bold hearts filled with a vague sense of terror. Compelled to acknowledge that there was something extraordinary in Joan, the English captains then said that her power was not derived from heaven, but from hell; and that she was a foul sorceress, who worked by charms and witchcraft. The soldiers believed this, but it did not improve their spirits; for they said they did not fear the power of men; they would fight any human force that might be brought against them; but they would not war with fiends.

In this state of mind, these brave men who had so often conquered the enemy upon the open field, and faced death almost with indifference, became as timid as children. If, at night, the sentinels heard the bleak spring wind moan through the boughs of the trees, or snap some dead branches, or if an owl screamed from the blackened ruins of some burnt farm-house, they trembled with fear and imagined that some evil spirit was near them. Some fancied that they saw grim gigantic figures by the pale starlight; and others even thought that they beheld armed horsemen galloping and fighting in the clouds.

When the convoy of provisions approached, on the 29th of April, headed by Joan and guarded by a body of soldiers, the English were so dispirited that they made no attempt at resistance, but merely looked on in silence. From within the walls of Orleans a loud triumphant shout was raised, of "The Maid! the holy Maid is come!" The gates were thrown open; the besieged rushed out and fell upon the English, and Joan and the succours entered. Great was the joy within the city; some shouted, some wept for gladness; and all looked upon Joan as a blessed messenger of mercy and deliverance. From this time the title of the Maid of Orleans was conferred upon her.

The besieged received other succours; bodies of troops constantly entered Orleans, and soon their number far exceeded that of the assailants. In this state of things matters were reversed, and the French became the attacking party. Shortly after her triumphant entry into Orleans, Joan suddenly called for her armour and weapons; her voices, she said, had just revealed to her that she must go out and fight the English. Riding to the gates, she discovered that the French had made an attack upon one of the English fortifications, and had been driven back. Calling upon the soldiers, she herself led them to a second attack; a new spirit instantly animated them, and they followed her with heroic ardour. A fierce fight followed, which lasted three hours; the fortification, which was called the Bastille of St. Loup, was taken, and every Englishman in it put to the sword. After this success, Joan desired to attack the main body of the English in their intrenchments; but the Count of Dunois prevailed upon her first to expel the enemy from their forts, and thus open a free communication between the city and the surrounding country. The next day she led the French against the famous fortress of the Tournelles, and assaulted it with great fury. Depressed and superstitious as the English were, they recovered their old courage in the heat of conflict, and drove back their numerous assailants. Again the French charged, and again they were beaten back, leaving the ditch of the fortress filled with their dead. Seizing a scaling-ladder, Joan placed it against the wall, and calling to the French to follow her, instantly ascended. The soldiers obeyed their heroic chieftainess; but at that moment an arrow, sped by the strong arm of an English archer, struck her in the neck, and she fell senseless from the ladder among a heap of dead. The soldiers carried her away, and it was soon found that her wound was not a fatal one; the arrow was withdrawn, the injury dressed, and, after spending a short time in prayer, she again appeared before the walls, and animated the troops by her presence. The English, who fancied that they had seen her dead, now believed she was immortal; and some said they were quite sure they saw the archangel St. Michael riding by her side, on a steed of dazzling whiteness, and fighting for their foes. After a terrible slaughter on both sides, the English were defeated, and the French regained the fortress.

The English army was so downcast and over-matched by superior numbers, that its leaders resolved to raise the siege and abandon Orleans. On the 8th of May, 1429, they destroyed their fortifications, and marched away in good order. Though baffled, they were not conquered, and their failure arose rather from their own superstition than from the courage or military talents of their enemies. Joan had now established her character as a prophetess; she had given the sign she promised—Orleans was delivered, and the independence of France was saved.

The Earl of Suffolk placed his army in several castles, while he himself took shelter in the fortress of Jargeau. In the meantime, Joan went to pay her respects to King Charles, who, with more prudence than courage, had hitherto kept at a distance from danger. Now he took heart, and rode with Joan and a body of troops to besiege Suffolk in Jargeau, which they reached on the 11th of June. The place was obstinately defended, and the maid had another narrow escape, for she was struck on the head with a stone, which felled her senseless to the ground; but, after a bombardment of three days, the place surrendered. All was consternation among the English troops; and Lord Talbot, collecting them from the various castles where they had been stationed, led them away towards Paris. The French pursued him with an army which received many additions during its march; and the English general, having also been joined by 4,000 fresh men, halted at the village of Patay, and prepared for battle. Though the French had an army of very superior numbers to the English, yet, when they came in sight of them, they hesitated about fighting. "Ride on!" exclaimed the intrepid Joan, "ride on, in the name of the Lord, and conquer. The English are delivered into my hands—you have but to smite them." The French did ride on; and falling upon the English before they were prepared, gained a complete and almost instantaneous victory. The archers had not time to draw their bows before they were attacked by the French cavalry, and slaughtered in heaps. Sir John Fastolfe, seeing his troops so full of superstitious fears, turned from the field, and fled with them without striking a blow. Talbot and some other brave captains, who disdained to run, were taken prisoners; and 2,000 English were left dead upon the field. This conflict, which took place on the 18th of June, 1429, and was called the Battle of Patay, wonderfully revived the courage and loyal spirit of the French.

Joan had performed one part of her supposed miraculous mission—that of raising the siege of Orleans; she was now to fulfil the other, and conduct Charles to the ancient city of Rheims, to be crowned at the cathedral, where it was customary for the sovereigns of France to receive the insignia of their royalty. For this purpose she insisted that he should instantly set out for that distant city. The roads between were in the occupation of the English, and the towns along them also acknowledged the English rule. The enterprise was a dangerous one, and Charles and his court hesitated; Joan both reproved and encouraged them, and finally the timid king resolved to follow the heroic girl. He started with an army of 12,000 horsemen; and, after taking several towns in his way, reached Rheims in safety. That city was in the hands of the English; but on hearing that the Maid of Orleans had arrived, the inhabitants drove away all the officers of that nation, and welcomed Joan and Charles within their walls, where he was solemnly crowned in the cathedral, on the 17th of July, 1429. To add to the dignity of the ceremony, he was anointed with the sacred oil which the priests pretended to believe was brought from heaven by a pigeon, and given to King Clovis on the first establishment of the French monarchy.

During the coronation, Joan stood by the side of the king, arrayed in complete armour, and holding her sacred white banner aloft. It was a striking sight to behold the generous dark-eyed girl standing proudly erect by her worthless sovereign, whom she loved with a true patriotic feeling, because, to her mind, he represented the independence of France, and the freedom of its children. After the glittering circle of royalty had been placed upon his brow, the warrior maid knelt at his feet, and thus addressed him:—"Gentle king, now is accomplished the will of God, who would have you come hither to Rheims to receive your consecration, and show that you are the true king, to whom the kingdom of France rightly belongs."

The tide of fortune now turned with Charles. After his coronation he advanced into the Isle of France, and town after town submitted to him as he passed. He was accompanied by an enthusiastic monk, called Friar Richard, who preached so eloquently that many places yielded in consequence of his sermons, instead of forcing Charles to besiege them. A multitude of beautiful white butterflies also hovered round Joan's sacred banner; and these being considered as an emblem of heavenly favour, the towns more readily opened their gates to Charles, whom they thought to be divinely protected. When Joan saw the people coming in crowds to greet their sovereign, she burst into tears of joy, and exclaimed, "How happy should I be to end my days among such a people!" Some one enquired, "Joan, knowest thou when thou shalt die?" "No," she replied, "that is when it shall please God; but I greatly desire to return to my parents, and live with them, as I am weary of the footsteps of war." It seems she was really in earnest in uttering this wish; for many of the French generals grew jealous of her fame, and treated her in a very ungenerous manner. They did not like to hear every victory and triumph attributed to her instead of to them, ungratefully forgetting, that, without her assistance, their cause would, in all probability, have been lost, and their king would have lived and died a fugitive. Joan also considered that she had fulfilled her mission, and she begged the king to permit her to return to her father and mother, and her former mode of life: this he had no desire to do, and he found means to persuade her to remain, urging that, with her help, he should be able utterly to expel the English from his country.

The Duke of Bedford had all this time acted with remarkable skill and prudence; but he was not supported by the English government. He did all that he could possibly do with the limited means at his command: he put all the English garrisons in a state of defence; he kept a watch over the French people, lest they should rise in insurrection against him: and he renewed his friendly alliance with the Duke of Burgundy. Still he could not collect an army of more than 10,000 men; and Charles's forces were marching up to the very walls of Paris. Bedford led out his troops; but the French king and his army retreated instantly. The regent then marched into Normandy, which was invaded by a partisan of Charles; and that monarch, in the meantime, returned to Paris, hoping to take it during Bedford's absence.

Charles endeavoured to persuade the Parisians to open their gates and declare for him; but they refused to do so, and he then commanded the assault to be made on the suburb of St. Honoré. It was made on the 12th of September, and the English soldiers repulsed the besiegers. Joan, who was one of the first among the assailants, was again wounded, and lay senseless for some time among the dead. On reviving, she endeavoured to cheer her men once more on to the assault; but they were again driven back in disorder, and Joan was forced along with them. Men are ever prone to ingratitude; and the moment good fortune seemed to be forsaking Joan, the thankless French reviled her as the cause of their repulse. "You are a false prophetess," said they; "you told us we should have slept this night in Paris." Joan replied with spirit, "And so you would if you had fought as I fought." Still it was plain that her influence and popularity were declining; and she resolved on leaving the army. She even hung up her suit of armour in the abbey church of St. Denis, and dedicated it to that saint; but she was prevailed upon to remain.

The town of Compiègne was besieged by the Duke of Burgundy, assisted by a body of English troops; and Joan was persuaded by King Charles to go to its assistance. Fighting her way through the besiegers, she entered the town with a considerable reinforcement; and the citizens, who received her with joy, immediately believed themselves to be invincible. But the prosperity of the warlike maid had reached its height, and a rapid and gloomy descent was before her. The very day she entered the town, she sallied out at the head of her soldiers, and attacked the enemy. She took them by surprise, and killed a great many; but they rallied, and came up in such numbers that Joan ordered a retreat. This order her troops obeyed readily enough; and, as Joan frequently turned round and fought with those who pursued her, she was at last left almost alone. A stout archer then dragged her from her horse; and her cowardly soldiers, flying into the city, shut the gates, and, without an effort to save her, left the heroine in the hands of the enemy. Leaping to her feet, she fought furiously to regain her liberty; but she was surrounded, overpowered, and carried away a prisoner.

There was great rejoicing among the English and the Burgundian faction of the French; and the Te Deum was solemnly sung at Paris in honour of the capture of a poor country girl. Princes are proverbially ungrateful; and Charles made no effort to save the noble woman who had saved his drooping cause. He had previously ennobled her family, and declared that her native village should be exempt from taxes for ever; but he left Joan herself in the hands of those who were resolved to shed her blood. The Duke of Bedford thought, that now the sorceress, as he called her, who had defeated his troops, was a captive, he should be able to restore the tottering authority of the English in France; and his ungenerous triumph knew no bounds. Joan was a prisoner of war, and had a right to be treated with that courtesy to which, according to military notions, her great bravery entitled her; but the malignity of her enemies had a different fate in store for her.

She was demanded by the Bishop of Beauvais, in whose diocese she had been captured, to be tried by an ecclesiastical court for sorcery, impiety, idolatry, and magic. The university of Paris had the ignorance, meanness, and cruelty to join in the request; and John of Luxembourg, in whose custody Joan was, sold her to the bishop for 10,000 francs. After remaining for more than six months in prison, during which time she was loaded with chains, the unhappy girl was put upon her trial. The Bishop of Beauvais and forty learned doctors of divinity presided on the occasion. Day by day, for sixteen days, those stern, heartless men perplexed her with subtle questions, that they might draw from her such answers as might be construed into heresy, or help to convict her of being a sorceress. Her clear and simple replies sometimes won upon the pity of her judges; but, when that was the case, the inhuman bishop savagely interrupted her, and frowned her into silence.

She was asked, how she knew that the voices she heard were not those of demons instead of angels? She replied, that neither the devil nor any of his ministers could possess any power over a maiden like herself. Some of the questions her reverend persecutors asked her were silly, and even profane. Amongst other nonsense, they inquired whether the saints she saw in her visions had hair on their heads, and whether they were dressed or naked? Her sensible answer was, "Do you suppose God has not wherewithal to clothe them!" Then they asked if she had ever seen any fairies, and what she thought of such beings? She said, "I never saw any, though I have heard of them; but I do not believe they exist." At one time, so many asked her questions together, that she modestly reproved those learned men by saying, "One at a time, good fathers, if you please."

Her judges considered that it was a heresy for her to wear the costume of a man, and demanded why she did so? She answered, that it was at the express command of her heavenly visitants, St. Catherine, St. Margaret, and the archangel Michael. This answer was considered an aggravation of her offence. The doctors were quite sure that her beautiful white banner, with which she had so often led her soldiers to victory, must be a magical one, and the work of fiends or witches. She said there was nothing about it but the blessing of God, and that she placed no reliance upon any other power. They told her that she had insulted the French nobility by standing at the side of Charles during the time of his coronation at Rheims. Her just reply was, that those who had shared the danger had a right to enjoy the triumph. When accused of heresy, she said that her whole life was one long denial of the charge; that, whether while tending her sheep in her native village, or amidst the activity and horrors of war, she had always been attentive to her religious duties and to the ceremonies of the church. Hitherto her unaffected answers had defeated the subtlety of her judges; but at last they ensnared her by asking if she would submit to the decisions of the church if her voices ordered her otherwise? She answered, she would submit all things to God, the fountain of truth. This was considered a very shocking heresy, and, in the end, she was found guilty of all the crimes of which she had been accused; her revelations were declared to be inventions of the devil to delude the people, and she was remanded to her prison.

Her judges consulted the university of Paris, and many of the bishops; and both these bodies agreed that Joan was a wicked heretic and impostor, and deserved to perish by fire. Some people, however, were averse to putting her to such a shocking death; and priests and confessors visited her in her cell, and persuaded her to submit in all things to the church, which they assured her was a merciful mother to its children, and could not err. If Joan was not convinced by their arguments, she was bewildered and overcome. Her spirit was broken by imprisonment, and her mind terrified by the threats of the priests. In this condition she consented to recant her statements, and sign a confession of imposture. She could not write, but she placed a cross against her name; and then, instead of being condemned to death at the stake, she was sentenced to perpetual imprisonment, and to be fed on bread and water. Such was the boasted mercy of the Roman church to one who, far from having sinned against its decrees, had ever been one of the humblest and most enthusiastic of its votaries.

Joan was once more conveyed to her cell, and compelled to wear her female attire. Then her spirits revived, her enthusiasm returned, and she fancied that she heard the sweet voices of angels, and beheld visions of the saints in glory. She was, no doubt, watched; for her persecutors, suspecting her feelings, and repenting of their forbearance in not taking her life, placed the dress of a soldier in her prison. The sight of it aroused all her martial feelings: she longed again to be riding at the head of her troops, and to be leading Frenchmen to victory; and she could not resist the temptation she felt to array herself in a garb similar to the one she had worn when she was the idol of the people, and the acknowledged saviour of her prince. She was detected by her gaolers wearing the forbidden dress: that alone was considered as a relapse into her errors, and she was condemned to death. On the 30th of May, 1431, she was driven in the hangman's cart from prison to the spot intended for her execution. This was the market-place of Rouen, around which were erected scaffoldings for the accommodation of the bishops, priests, and nobles, as if they had come to witness a tournament or festival, instead of so repulsive and horrible a sight. When Joan first saw the stake she wept and shuddered, but afterwards recovered herself and prayed fervently. A kind of pulpit was placed in the enclosure, and a monk, ascending it, delivered a short sermon. It ended with a piece of monstrous hypocrisy. "Go in peace," said this wolf in sheep's clothing—"go in peace, Joan; the church can no longer defend thee!"

It was the church which had persecuted her, and the Bishop of Beauvais who had hunted her to a dreadful fate; and now that right reverend priest sat foremost in the gallery, to glut his cold, stern eyes with the view of her last anguish. Gazing upon him with a bitter anger, Joan cried out, "You are the cause of my death; you promised to restore me to the church, and you have delivered me up to my enemies." The bishop sat unmoved, though many of the spectators shed tears, and retired from a scene they had not fortitude and nerve enough to witness. Then the monks put the hideous dress of the Inquisition over the wretched girl, and fixed a black cap on her head, on which was written the words, "Heretic, Relapsed, Apostate, Idolator." All the monkish hypocrisies and mummeries being over, the maid was delivered to the executioner, who bound her to the stake, and applied a torch to the heap of faggots around the victim. A cloud of smoke and flame rose into the air, through which Joan could be seen embracing a crucifix. To the last she continued to utter the name of Jesus—sobs and groans of anguish alone interrupting her ejaculations. When both faggots and stake were reduced to a heap of smouldering embers, the remains of the heroine were collected and thrown into the river Seine. The vengeance of a usurping English government, and a malignant and ignorant French priesthood, was complete. Thus perished this noble, enthusiastic woman, "to whom," says an elegant writer, "the more generous superstition of the ancients would have erected altars."

CHAPTER XXXVI.

CONTINUATION OF THE REIGN OF HENRY THE SIXTH.—A.D. 1430—1450.

SOON after the murder of the Maid of Orleans —for her execution deserves no milder name —the young English sovereign was taken over to France. He arrived at Calais on the 23rd of April, 1430. There he remained till after the capture of Joan of Arc, as the English army appeared powerless while she was in the field. On the 17th of December, his public entry into Paris took place, and he was crowned in the cathedral of Notre Dame as King of France. The object of this ceremony was to counterpoise the coronation of Charles at Rheims; but it had no effect in arresting the decline of the English power. King Henry was still a child, being but nine years old; and what was worse, he was a feeble, spiritless child, who gave no promise of ever possessing any lofty qualities. He was taken back to England in February, 1431.

Four years passed away: in England they were occupied by petty dissensions between the Duke of Gloucester, the king's uncle, and Bishop Beaufort, the king's guardian and tutor, who had been made a cardinal: in France they were spent by the factious nobles in intrigues, and by the ruined people in suffering. At the end of that period, the wavering Duke of Burgundy deserted the English cause, and formed an alliance with King Charles, the murderer of his father. The reconciliation took place at a congress of prelates and princes, held at Arras, in the year 1435. The object of the congress was also to settle the dispute between France and England, and restore peace and harmony between those two great nations. The demands of the English were, notwithstanding their late reverses, too great to be yielded by the French. The latter offered to give up the duchy of Normandy and the province of Guienne; but on the old vexatious condition that the English sovereign should do homage for them to the French crown. This offer Cardinal Beaufort, who represented the English interest, treated with contempt, and then disowned the authority of the congress, and retired in disgust.

Before the solemn reconciliation between King Charles and his powerful kinsman, Burgundy, was quite completed, the Duke of Bedford died. For thirteen years he had governed France as the English regent of that country. It was not through any error or negligence on his part that the conquests of Henry V. were slipping from the grasp of the English. Though his character was stained with some cruelties, he was a prince of great talents, both as a statesman and warrior; but the government at home sent him scarcely any reinforcements, and he could not maintain conquests without troops. It was some months before a successor was appointed; and during that time the citizens of Paris opened their gates to King Charles and the Duke of Burgundy, and the English garrison was compelled to retire from the capital of France.

Then the Duke of York was sent into France as regent, with a small body of fresh English troops, and the war was again renewed. Sir John Talbot, created Earl of Shrewsbury, sustained the military reputation of his countrymen by many brilliant successes. The Duke of Burgundy, also, after having resolved to retake the famous city of Calais, and collecting an army of 30,000 men for that purpose, fled before the Duke of Gloucester, who had come from England to meet him, without striking a blow. For five years a petty war was carried on between the English regent and the French king; then the Duke of York was called home again, his vacant office being assigned to the Earl of Warwick. In two years Warwick died, and York was reappointed. France was rendered desolate by the protracted war, and England was heartily tired of it: it was no longer popular in the latter country; and the parliament grudgingly bestowed the small sums of money they granted for carrying it on. Under these circumstances peace was again proposed. Charles consented to resign Normandy, Guienne, and Calais; but the English, who could scarcely be brought to the surrender of their claim to the crown of that country, insisted on all the provinces ceded to the conqueror, Edward III., by the treaty of Bretigny. As the two nations could not agree, it was found impossible to arrange a permanent peace; but in the year 1444, a truce for twenty-two months was entered into.

The English sovereign was now three-and-twenty, and his advisers wished him to marry. His mind was feeble, and his manners exceedingly gentle and inoffensive. He was amiable, religious, and submissive, and willing to do what was best for the prosperity and happiness of his people; but he had not sufficient judgment to enable him to decide what was best, or the energy to enforce any decisions at which he might arrive. He was misplaced in life; and would no doubt have been more happy, and a thousand times more useful, as a village priest, than as a monarch of a great and turbulent people. His half-uncle, Cardinal Beaufort, imagined that his character would be strengthened by marrying him to a princess of talents and spirit; and for this reason he and his friends selected Margaret of Anjou, the daughter of Regnier, titular King of Sicily, Naples, and Jerusalem. That nobleman enjoyed those titles without the possessions that should have accompanied them, and was, therefore, exceedingly poor. In one respect the match was a very disadvantageous one; the lady had no provinces to bring with her as a dower, and no powerful connections which could strengthen England. But she was not only handsome and graceful in person, but one of the most accomplished and talented women of the age. She was of a masculine turn of mind, and possessed great courage and decision of character; mingled with which were also some unamiable qualities, such as pride, envy, passion, and an unforgiving bitterness; but these darker traits had not yet shown themselves.

The Earl of Suffolk negotiated the marriage; and, instead of requiring any portion with the lady, he agreed, on behalf of his sovereign, to give up the states of Anjou and Maine to her father—a concession which the English people considered very disgraceful. The Earl was suspected of entertaining an improper attachment for the princess: and this may have influenced him in the liberal arrangement he had made with her father. Henry and Margaret were married on the 22nd of April, 1445; and the queen and the Earl of Suffolk soon contrived to divide the royal power between them. As to the king himself, he spent most of his time in prayer and religious exercises; and paid so little attention to his queen, that she soon began to despise him. But while her husband was losing her affection, she was gradually becoming disliked by the English people. They had not been attached to her from the first; but her imperiousness of temper, and the despotic principles of government which she had learned in France, and attempted to practise in England, soon made her generally disliked.

The bitterness of feeling which existed between the Duke of Gloucester and Cardinal Beaufort has been already mentioned. A few years before the marriage of Henry (in 1441), the cardinal and his supporters contrived to inflict a disgrace upon the duke; which, though he bore it with silent grief, he could, in those times, scarcely be expected to forgive. The duke was a great patron of literary and scientific men; and he kept in his house a learned man, named Roger Bolingbroke, as his chaplain. This Roger was an astronomer; and, like most astronomers of that time, an astrologer also, and pretended to foretel what would come to pass by observing the disposition of the stars. As Henry was not married, and therefore had no children, the Duke of Gloucester would have been his successor in the event of his death. It seems that the duchess, who was a very ambitious woman, longed to know if her husband would ever ascend the throne, and consulted the astrologer as to how long the king would live. Probably spies had been placed near her; for after a quarrel, which took place between her husband and the cardinal, she was accused of treason and witchcraft. It was pretended, that she and her associates, consisting of Roger Bolingbroke and two other priests, named Southwell and John Hum, together with Margery Jourdayn, a sort of female conjuror, who was called the Witch of Eye, had leagued together to destroy the life of the king by enchantment, for the purpose of making a path for the duke to the throne. To accomplish this object, it was said they had made a wax figure resembling Henry, which they melted before a slow fire; and as the image wasted away, so the body of the king, by magical sympathy, would also dwindle and decay.

In that age of superstition this nonsense was readily believed, and the duchess and her confederates were placed upon their trial. They were all found guilty of a crime which it is not very probable they attempted, and which it is impossible they could have committed. On account of her high rank, the life of the duchess was spared; but she was sentenced to do penance by walking bare-footed through the city enveloped in a sheet, and holding a lighted taper in her hand; after which, she was to suffer perpetual imprisonment in the Isle of Man. The fate of the poor wretches who had endeavoured to assist her in her enquiries into the mysteries of the future, was severe and terrible. Roger Bolingbroke was hanged and quartered at Tyburn; Southwell would have perished in the same manner, but he died in prison before the day appointed for his execution. Margery Jourdayn, the supposed witch, was burnt to death in Smithfield; and John Hum, who probably was a spy, was pardoned.

The duke was much respected by the people, who called him "the good Duke Humphrey;" and many of them believed that this strange accusation was got up by his enemies. Nearly six years had passed since the disgrace of his wife; but Gloucester still stood high in the affections of the people; and his enemies, who had so much cause to fear his resentment, determined upon his ruin and death. The principals in the dark cabal against him were the cardinal, the Earl of Suffolk, and the queen. The latter hated him, because he had been opposed to her marriage with the king, and because she was allied so closely with the earl and cardinal.

Early in the year 1447, a parliament was summoned to meet at Bury St. Edmund's, a place filled with the friends and followers of the Earl of Suffolk. Gloucester, who suspected no treachery, went with but few attendants to this parliament, and was arrested there on the 11th of February, charged with high treason, and sent to prison. He was not brought to trial; and in seventeen days after his arrest was found dead in bed. It was asserted that he died of apoplexy, or of a broken heart; but the whole nation believed that he had been murdered. There can scarcely be any doubt that this was the case; though how that secret murder was accomplished is one of the dark mysteries of the past, known only to God. The body of the duke was exposed to public view, that it might be seen there were no marks of violence upon it; but men remembered that the same thing had been done in the cases of Edward II. and Richard II. This shameful murder was followed by an act of still greater barbarity and wickedness. Five gentlemen of the duke's retinue were tried as accomplices of his imputed treasons, and condemned to death. It was said that they intended to release the duchess from imprisonment, murder the king, and proclaim the duke sovereign in his stead. They were sentenced to be hanged and quartered; but it is evident that even their judges believed them to be innocent; for when they were just turned off the scaffold, their pardons were produced, and the half-strangled men were restored to animation.

The murdered duke was a man of superior attainments; he was very liberal to learned men, and founded one of the first public libraries in England. He appears to have been very little influenced by the superstitious credulity which was almost universal in his time. A curious instance of the clearness of his judgment in this respect is related by Sir Thomas More. Passing through the town of St. Alban's, he beheld a number of people crowding round a man, and shouting, "A miracle! a miracle!" On stopping and inquiring the particulars, the duke was informed, that the man, who had been blind from his birth, had his sight suddenly restored on touching the shrine of the patron saint of the town. Suspecting that the fellow was an impostor, endeavouring to extort money from the sympathy of the spectators, the duke addressed him, and said he doubted even then that he could see well. "Quite well," answered the man. The duke then inquired the colours of several of the cloaks worn by his attendants, and received a correct answer to each of his interrogatories. Convinced that the man was an impostor, he exclaimed —"You are a knave; for had you been born blind, you could as easily have known our different names as have been able at once to distinguish colours;" and he ordered the deceiver to be set in the stocks.

Cardinal Beaufort, who was suspected of the murder of his nephew, the duke, was called to his account soon after that crime was committed, dying on the 11th of April. Though eighty years of age, he still clung to life, and cherished dreams of ambition to the last. The old chronicler, Hall, says of him—"His insatiable covetousness and hope of long life made him both to forget God, his prince, and himself, in his latter days; for Dr. John Baker, his privy councillor and chaplain, wrote that, lying on his death-bed, he said these words —'Why should I die, having so much riches? If the whole realm would save my life, I am able, either by policy to get it, or by riches to buy it. Fye! will not death be hired, and will money do nothing? When my nephew of Bedford died, I thought myself half up the wheel; but when I saw mine other nephew of Gloucester deceased, then I thought myself able to be equal to kings—and so to increase my treasure, in hope to have worn a triple crown; but I see now the world faileth me, and I am deceived; praying you all to pray for me.'" Greatness and political contests harden the heart: the cardinal was a striking instance of this; for though he removed his opponents by wicked plots, and had consented to the assassination of the duke, he yet bequeathed the mass of his property to the noble cause of charity. He seems to have been a good, though weak man, corrupted and depraved by the temptations of public life. He was buried at Winchester cathedral.

The truce with France had now expired; and King

Charles, who was acquiring strength, wanted some excuse to renew the war with England. He knew the weakness of Henry, and the distraction of his council, and desired to take advantage of them to drive the English utterly from his kingdom. He could not have chosen a better time in which to accomplish his purpose; for, while France was rising from the miserable condition in which it had been struggling for so long, England was sinking into discord and weakness. The court was divided into contending parties; the people were discontented with the government; and French conquests were scarcely regarded amidst the turmoil of home troubles. In this state of things the English fortifications in Normandy were suffered to fall into ruin for want of repairs; and all the representations of the Duke of Somerset, who had succeeded to the command in France, were unable to induce the government at home to grant him the money necessary for that purpose.

When kings are resolved on war, they soon find or make a reason for justifying their resolve; and King Charles was not long in getting up a grievance. An adventurer, named Surienne, who commanded a body of 2,500 English soldiers, seized the town of Fougeres, in Brittany, and, dispossessing its inhabitants, lived by plundering the surrounding country. These ruffians were not in the service of the English, but constituted what was called a free company, and hired themselves out to fight to whoever would employ them. Their services had been declined by the Duke of Somerset, and that accounted for their violent conduct. The Duke of Brittany complained to the French king; and Charles insisted that the Duke of Somerset, as the representative of England, should make reparation to the sufferers for the losses they had sustained. Although that nobleman declared that he had no authority over Surienne and his followers, and that the wrongs they had committed had been done without his knowledge or sanction, yet he consented to pay a sum of money to settle the matter. The crafty Charles estimated the damages at the enormous sum of 1,600,000 crowns—a sum which he knew it was impossible for the duke to pay; and as the money was not forthcoming, he at once invaded the English possession of Normandy.

The people of Normandy, tired of the English rule, opened the gates of many of their towns, and admitted Charles as their king. Verneuil, Nugent, Château Geillaid, Ponteau de Mer, Gisors, Mante, Vernon, Argentau, Pont de l'Arche, and other towns almost instantly surrendered. The astonished Somerset, unable to relieve them, and almost without an army, took refuge in the strong city of Rouen, the capital of Normandy. He hoped, at least, to hold that important place until the arrival of succours from England; but, in a little while, the French king, with an army of 50,000 men, appeared before its walls. This was not the only difficulty; for the French had secret agents and friends within the city, and treachery was at work. The result was, that the citizens were induced to rise against the English, and open their gates to the besiegers. Somerset was obliged to surrender, and to deliver up several other fortresses, besides paying a large sum of money for permission to retreat with his soldiers to Caen.

The English government then sent over a paltry force of 4,000 men, under the command of Sir Thomas Kyriel. He was a brave officer, and had followed the late king, Henry V., in his career of conquest in France; but he was too late, and it was impossible for him to make a stand against the immense forces of the enemy. His little body of troops was attacked at Fourmigni by two French armies of far superior numbers, and completely defeated. The bulk of his men perished on the field; the rest fled; and the hope of relief from England vanished. The Earl of Suffolk, who managed the affairs of the incapable Henry, did no more to defend those dominions in France which had been acquired with so great a destruction of human life, and so much expenditure of treasure. Immediately after the defeat of Sir Thomas Kyriel, other towns surrendered to the French: the Duke of Somerset was compelled to capitulate and retire from Caen; and Cherbourg, the last place in Normandy which remained in the hands of the English, being assailed at once both by sea and land, was lost. Thus, in the August of 1450, the whole of Normandy was wrested from the grasp of England.

In Guienne the arms of France were equally victorious; though many towns and castles were surrendered to them without fighting. For three centuries Guienne had acknowledged the sway of the English; the red cross of the brave islanders had waved over its towns and seaports since the time of Henry II., and the people themselves had grown attached to their governors, and were almost as much English as French; but now the star of English supremacy was sinking beneath the deadening influence of an imbecile king and a factious council, and Guienne was swallowed up in the French monarchy. The ambitious dream of conquest was over, and the English expelled from the land they had so long afflicted by their aggressions. One solitary town upon the sea-coast remained to them: their banner still floated over the fortifications of Calais. All else was gone, and the pride of England was humbled.

No peace was concluded between the two nations, but the war was at an end. The English were too sick of the struggle, and too much occupied by troubles at home, to renew the contest; and the French wisely busied themselves in building up their shattered towns and cultivating their desolated lands, instead of attempting to punish their enemies by an invasion of England. The people were furious at the disgrace they had experienced in France; and they attributed all their disasters to the late Earl (but then Duke) of Suffolk, whom they accused of betraying the English interests to the King of France. He was hated, also, because it was believed he was an accomplice in the murder of the Duke of Gloucester, and because he was immensely rich, while the king was reduced to a state of extreme poverty. Henry was in debt to a fearful extent, and could only support his household by numerous acts of petty tyranny, which alienated the affections of his subjects. This, also, was attributed to Suffolk, and the nation clamoured for the punishment, and thirsted for the life, of that odious minister. When the parliament met, in January, 1450, Suffolk, suspecting that some attack would be made upon him, boldly rose in the House of Peers, and spoke of the clamours propagated against him. He complained, that after serving the crown in thirty-four campaigns; after living abroad seventeen years without once returning to his native country; after losing a father and three brothers in the war with France; after being himself a prisoner and purchasing his liberty by a great ransom, it should yet be suspected that he had been won from his allegiance by that enemy whom he had ever opposed with zeal and fortitude, and that he had betrayed his prince who had rewarded his services by the highest honours and greatest offices that it was in his power to bestow.

This speech had no effect in subduing the popular hatred against the duke; and two days afterwards the House of Commons impeached him of high treason. They accused him of persuading the French monarch to invade England, to depose the king and queen, and to place his own son on the throne in their stead; of liberating the Duke d'Orleans, in order to assist the French king in driving the English from France; of encouraging that monarch to make war upon Normandy and Guienne; of betraying to him the secrets of the English council; of obstructing the succours intended to be sent to France; and of having, without any authority, given up the provinces of Maine and Anjou to the father of the queen.

These charges, with the exception of the last, were unjust and ridiculous. The Commons seem to have been aware that they would not endure investigation, so some other accusations were added. They taxed him with wasting the public money; with diverting the supplies voted by parliament to other purposes than those for which they were granted; with giving evil advice to the king; with granting pardons to notorious criminals; and with other matters, of which he was probably guilty, but none of which amounted to treason. Of his great crime, the murder of the Duke of Gloucester, they said not a word. Probably they forbore to enter into an enquiry for fear of implicating the queen, who was also suspected of being concerned in that deed of horror; and Margaret had already shown so resolute and vindictive a disposition, that few cared to offend her.

Henry, or rather the queen, made an effort to save Suffolk; but the people clamoured so violently for the death of that corrupt minister, that the king dared not pardon him. He was brought before Henry at Westminster, on the 17th of March, many of his brother peers being present. He vehemently denied his guilt, and threw himself upon the will of his sovereign, who compromised the matter by pronouncing against him a sentence of banishment for a period of five years. The fallen minister, having narrowly escaped being murdered by an infuriated mob, embarked in a vessel for the continent. His enemies were far from being satisfied with this proceeding; and they believed that, on the first opportunity, the queen would obtain a reversal of his sentence, and restore him to favour. It was popularly supposed that an improper affection existed between Margaret and the duke, whom the people sneeringly called the "queen's darling;" and this circumstance added to the hatred with which he was already regarded. He remained in the county from which he took his title till the end of April, when he embarked at Ipswich for Calais. On the 2nd of May, the vessel in which he sailed was overtaken, when not far from Dover, by a great ship of war, called the Nicholas of the Tower. The captain, a rude stern man, ordered the duke on board his vessel, and then hailed him with the ominous words of "Welcome traitor!" Suffolk guessed the fate that hovered over him, and for two days he prayed with his confessor, and endeavoured to prepare himself to meet his Omnipotent Judge. The third day a boat rowed up to the side of the Nicholas, and in it stood a block and an executioner, armed with a rusty sword. The duke was compelled to descend into the boat; and there, on that vast expanse of waters, he was struck from the number of the living. It took no less than six blows, from the awkward and improper weapon used for the occasion, to sever the duke's head from his body. His corpse was conveyed to the shore, and left exposed upon the sands near Dover, where it was guarded by the sheriff of Kent until an order came from the king that it should be delivered to his widow. That unhappy lady received the body, and buried it in the collegiate church of Wingfield, in Suffolk. No inquiry was made into this atrocity, which would have been unjustifiable even had the duke been the greatest miscreant that ever lived; and there is no doubt it was done at the command of those in power. Let us be thankful that we live in a time when, and in a country where, all men must be legally tried and found guilty of an offence before they can be punished for it.

The fate of Suffolk was soon forgotten in the excitement caused by a circumstance of a very different nature. An insurrection took place among the peasantry and labouring men of Kent, who rose in great numbers, headed by a fearless, desperate Irishman, called John, or, more popularly, Jack Cade. This man assumed the name of Mortimer, and passed himself off as an illegitimate relation of the Duke of York, who, in the previous year (1449), had been appointed lord-lieutenant of Ireland. That prince was of royal blood, and had a claim upon the English crown; and he was suspected of having been the secret instigator of Cade's insurrection, for the purpose of overturning the government of the weak Henry, and clearing a path to the throne for himself. This treasonous act has not been proved against him; but he was a turbulent and intriguing man, and quite likely to have adopted that, or any other means, which he thought would advance his personal interests.

Popular insurrections are usually the result of bad government: a thriving people seldom engage in dangerous tumults. They are cheerful and industrious, and have no wish to cast aside their prosperity to embrace a shadow. Want and ignorance are the parents of discord: a wise government will fear these as much as the invasion of a foreign enemy, and make as great efforts to subdue and banish them. But Henry was a royal cipher; and his ministers had neglected the happiness of the people, humbled their pride by foreign defeats, and oppressed them by taxes and an excessive use of the royal privilege of purveyance. Cade, therefore, no sooner raised the banner of rebellion, than 20,000 discontented brawny Kentish men flocked around it. This was in the month of June, 1450; and Cade and his following proceeded to Blackheath, where they encamped. From there they sent a paper to the court, which bore the title of "The Complaint of the Commons of Kent." It stated there was a rumour that Kent was to be devastated, and turned into a royal hunting forest, to punish its inhabitants for the share they were supposed to have taken in the death of the Duke of Suffolk; that the king permitted his favourites to fatten on the revenues and lands of the crown, while he himself was obliged to extort a living from the substance of his people, who were not paid for purveyance or provisions forcibly taken from them for the use of the sovereign; that princes of the royal blood were excluded from offices of trust and honour, which were bestowed instead on mean and corrupt persons, who plundered and oppressed the people; that the men of Kent had been especially ill-treated and over-taxed; that their sheriffs and collectors had been guilty of shameful extortion; and that free election had been improperly interfered with.

No immediate answer was returned to this list of grievances, which was no doubt true enough in the main, although the mode of presenting it was a wrong one. Cade then sent another memorial to the government, called "The Requests by the Captain of the Great Assembly in Kent." In it the king was desired to resume all the grants of the crown which had been bestowed upon unworthy persons, so that he might reign like an independent sovereign; to dismiss the relations of the late Duke of Suffolk, and take for his counsellors the true lords of the royal blood—namely, that high and mighty prince the Duke of York, and the Dukes of Exeter, Buckingham, and Norfolk; and, finally, that he should punish the great extortioners who oppressed the people, and the traitors who were concerned in the death of the good Duke of Gloucester, and who had caused the loss of Anjou, Maine, Normandy, and the other possessions which, until lately, the English had held in France.

The court regarded these requests as mere vulgar insolence, and collected an army to chastise those who presented them. The counsellors of the king never reflected, that if the people were rebellious, their rulers were tyrannical—that, in fact, they were the original aggressors, and that a little lenity, and consideration for the wants of the nation, would have dispersed the rebels far more readily than an armed force could do.

Cade retired with his undisciplined followers as far as Sevenoaks, where he chose an admirable position, and very prudently awaited the approach of the king's troops. He was attacked, on the 25th of June, by a detachment of the royal army, under the command of Sir Humphrey Stafford. The rebels defended themselves bravely; and the soldiers, who had a secret sympathy with their opponents, fought without heart. They did not like to slay their own countrymen for insisting on measures for the general good of the nation. The result was, that they were defeated, and their commander killed. A spirit of disaffection then arose in the main body of the army; the government found it would be necessary to make the concessions called for; and thus, after much blood was shed, began to do ungracefully that which before might have obtained thanks and credit. Cade and his Kentish followers were still moderate in their demands, only insisting on the redress of the grievances they had formerly mentioned, and on the punishment of Lord Say, a minister who was much disliked; and his son-in-law, Sir J. Cromer, the sheriff of Kent. Lord Say was placed for security in the Tower; and the custody of that place, which was both a fortress and a royal palace, committed to Lord Scales. The king himself, fully aroused to a sense of danger, took refuge in Kenilworth Castle, and the army was disbanded, in the hope that this pacific measure would appease the insurgents, and induce them to return to their homes.

Cade was not disposed to lay down his arms so readily, and he led his thousands into London, where the citizens regarded his proceedings with a favourable eye. He had previously requested and obtained the permission of the Lord Mayor to enter the city. At first he preserved a remarkable degree of order and discipline amongst his rude followers; published severe edicts against theft and violence; and led his men at night out of the city into the neighbouring fields, where, as it was warm summer weather, they slept in the open air. This good order lasted for a few days; but, during that time, they had contrived to get Lord Say out of the Tower; and, after forcing the mayor and judges to pass sentence upon him in Guildhall, they cut off the head of that unfortunate nobleman. Cromer shared the same fate.

There were many turbulent spirits among Cade's followers, who disliked the good order which had been hitherto kept; and these men, encouraged by the murder of Lord Say and his son-in-law, broke into the house of a rich citizen, and plundered it. Some say that Cade himself, forgetting the edicts against theft which he had issued so lately, set the example of violence by robbing the owner of the house where he had dined. The alarmed citizens determined that the next day they would draw up the end of London Bridge, which resembled a modern drawbridge, and not permit the rebels to re-enter the metropolis. During the night of Sunday, the 5th of July, Cade became acquainted with this intention, and, arousing his followers, made an attack upon the bridge before it could be raised, for some of the works were injured. The citizens, who had obtained a body of soldiers from the Tower, fought with great bravery; and, after a conflict which was carried on for six hours by the light of the stars, the rebels were driven back into the fields of Southwark, and the Londoners remained the victors.

The Bishop of Winchester then went to them with promises of a redress of grievances and a general pardon. Many of the rebels were so discouraged by the check they had received, that they accepted the pardon, and returned to their homes. Cade, and a large body of them, however, distrusted the promises of the government, and said it would be absurd to lay down their arms till they had obtained some security for their performance. They were quite right; their rulers were merely deceiving them; and they proved this by afterwards annulling the pardons they had granted. Fearing the Londoners, who had armed themselves, the insurgents abandoned the suburbs, and marched to Rochester; but Cade could no longer preserve his authority over them; and they quarrelled so bitterly amongst themselves, that he feared he should be betrayed by them. He had reason for this fear, for he was proclaimed a traitor, and 1,000 marks were offered for him, alive or dead. This was a great temptation to many of the most dissolute and worthless among his followers, especially as they no longer experienced that attachment for him which they had at first shown. Having procured a horse, he fled from them secretly, and rode towards the Sussex coast, no doubt with the intention of escaping into France, which country he had previously visited as a soldier or an outlaw. He was not so fortunate as to accomplish his purpose; for he was discovered in a garden at Nolkfield, Sussex, by a gentleman of that county, named Alexander Eden, and killed by him after a desperate fight. Cade was a man of great size and strength, and fell a victim as much to want and fatigue as to the sword of his adversary. Eden cut off the head of the defeated rebel, and rode with it to the king, who commanded it to be placed on a pole on London Bridge, with the glazed sightless eyes turned in the direction of the Kentish hills. The reward of 1,000 marks was given to Eden. Many of Cade's followers were then taken and executed as traitors; and thus ended this ill-conducted effort to correct the abuses of a corrupt government, and to extend the liberties of a people.

CHAPTER XXXVII.

CONCLUSION OF THE REIGN OF HENRY THE SIXTH.—A.D. 1451—1461.

ENEALOGIES are the least interesting parts of history, and cannot be clearly comprehended without considerable attention. That attention it is necessary to give to the descent of the Duke of York, in order to understand the origin of those fierce dissensions, celebrated as the Wars of the White and Red Roses.

When Henry IV., the grandfather of Henry VI., usurped the throne, the true heir to it was Edmund Mortimer, the Earl of March; who, as already explained, was the grandson of Lionel, Duke of Clarence, an elder brother of John of Gaunt, the father of Henry IV. The earl died in the year 1424, after having lived all his life a faithful subject to the House of Lancaster, and never troubling himself about a right which was nearly forgotten, or which, at least, no one cared to revive. In doing so he acted wisely; but his claim was yet to be the means of sending, according to one calculation, as many as 90,000 Englishmen to premature and blood-stained graves. As he left no children, his sister Anne succeeded to his right; and that sister was married to the Earl of Cambridge, who was beheaded, during the early part of the reign of Henry V., for a vile attempt to assassinate that monarch. The traitor left a son, Richard, the Duke of York, who, his followers contended, had, on account of this descent from an elder branch of Edward III., a better right to occupy the throne than the present sovereign; which, as the Salic law is not in force in England, he certainly had: for the right of the Earl of March, on his dying without issue, went to his sister, and, on her death, passed to her son. Probably, however, as the House of Lancaster was established on the throne, the claim of the House of York would never have been put forward—especially after the treasonable conduct of Richard's father—but for the miserable weakness and incapacity of Henry. The disgust which the nation felt for his feebleness of character made it look with favour upon the claims of any one who had a reasonable pretence to occupy the throne: it also aroused the ambition of the duke, and encouraged him to aspire to the honours of royalty.

The duke was a man of considerable talents, of enormous wealth, and connected by marriage with the great family of the Nevilles. That family was the most powerful and wealthy in England, and included the Earls of Westmoreland, Salisbury, and Warwick, and Lords Latimer, Falconberg, and Abergavenny. Their united influence was sufficient to shake the throne, especially when it was filled by an irresolute and feeble monarch. The wealth and magnificence of the Earl of Warwick alone resembled that of a king. His retainers were so numerous, and his hospitality so great, that no less than 30,000 persons are said to have lived at his expense at his different manors and castles. He was distinguished for his spirit and bravery in the field, and for his frankness and generosity towards his friends. An elegant writer observes, "That he was the greatest, as well as the last, of those mighty barons who formerly overawed the crown, and rendered the people incapable of any regular system of civil government."

The insurrection of Cade and the Kentish men was no sooner quelled, than the Duke of York left his command in Ireland, and hurried over to his own country. His name had been connected with that popular outbreak, as the supposed secret author of it, and he might have been anxious to appear and disclaim any connection with a plot which had so thoroughly failed of its object. The court suspected that his motives were not so innocent, and feared that he intended to bring an army of Irishmen with him, to assist in wresting the sceptre from the grasp of the feeble king, and orders were sent forbidding him to land in England. He disarmed these suspicions, and disobeyed the order sent him, by arriving with only his ordinary personal retinue; then, after paying a visit of respect to Henry at London, he went to his own castle at Fotheringay. The court and the duke both regarded each other with distrust; the partisans of the latter talked everywhere of his claim to the crown; and in this way all was gloom and uncertainty.

The country now became divided into two great parties—that of York, which chose a white rose as its emblem, and that of Lancaster, which chose a red one. The Lancastrians supported the reigning king, and said that, although the elevation of his ancestor, Henry IV., to the crown was rather irregular, still it had taken place by the general consent of the nation, which gratefully gave the sceptre into the hands of a prince who had effected a liberation from the tyranny of the preceding government. They urged, also, that the Duke of York himself had often done homage to the king as his lawful sovereign, and had therefore made an indirect renunciation of the claim he now put forward. That a free people could not be transferred from one sovereign to another like a troop of slaves, merely to support the niceties of the law of succession; and that, although that law had to some extent been violated, it was now too late to remedy the mischief. They added, that the father of the present sovereign was a hero, who had rendered the name of England illustrious; and his grandfather was a wise and prudent monarch; and that though, unfortunately, Henry VI. did not possess their great talents, he might have a son similarly gifted. That he himself was not only unstained by vice, but of a simple, kindly nature; and that if active princes were dethroned for tyranny, and indolent ones for incapacity, there would be no order or tranquillity remaining in the state.

These strong reasons were fiercely opposed by the Yorkists. They said it was never too late to correct any error, or abolish a mischievous precedent; and that, unless the rule of succession was strictly observed, it would lead to endless confusion. That the liberty of the nation was not injured, but supported, by the rigid observance of the laws. That although the lapse of time would eventually strengthen a government whose foundation was questionable, yet that a long period must elapse ere this would be accomplished, or the claims of the aspirants to the throne extinguished. They said, also, that the deposition of Richard II. was not a deliberate national act, but the result of popular violence; and that, although Earl Mortimer, as well as the Duke of York, had sworn homage to the reigning sovereigns, that act implied no renunciation of their claims, because it was wrung from them by the necessity of their position. Finally, they urged, that if it was justifiable, on the score of convenience, to place an able monarch like Henry IV. upon the throne, instead of a weak one like Richard II., the same principle should hold good now, as there could be no comparison between the capabilities of the present king and those of the Duke of York, the former being a prince utterly unequal to the duties of government, and blindly led by corrupt ministers and an imperious queen; the latter a prince of wisdom, valour, and activity, in addition to being the lineal heir to the throne.

During this state of affairs, the House of Commons presented a petition to the king, begging him to dismiss his new minister, the Duke of Somerset, together with the Duchess of Suffolk, the Bishop of Chester, and several other persons of inferior rank. The weak monarch was annoyed at this request; and although he did not refuse it, he sent an equivocating answer. To another demand, that he should attaint the late Duke of Suffolk as a traitor, and thus confiscate his property, he very honourably gave a direct refusal.

The Duke of York, encouraged by these dissensions between the king and his parliament, publicly declared that his life was not safe; and that members of the court were plotting his arrest and assassination; which they very probably were. He made this state of things a plea for raising an army of 10,000 men, at the head of which, in February, 1452, he marched towards London, demanding a re-formation of the government, and the removal of Somerset from the councils of the king. The Londoners closed their gates against him; and York then marched into Kent, hoping that he should be joined by large numbers of the discontented peasants who had been concerned in the late insurrection with Cade. But these poor people remembered the fatal termination of that outbreak; the bodies of many of their friends had not long been removed from the gibbets, and they preferred therefore to remain quietly at home. At Dartford, York was overtaken by the king, at the head of a superior army. Henry, who always entertained a horror of war and slaughter, sent two bishops to the duke to enquire why he was in arms. York replied, it was in consequence of the attempts that had been made to ruin him, and because he was desirous of ensuring his own safety. Henry admitted that he had been regarded with a jealous eye, on account of the treasonable pretensions of his partizans; but, he added, he acquitted him of all participation in them, and regarded him as a loyal subject and his well-beloved cousin.

The duke, however, was very haughty in his behaviour, and insisted that Somerset should be arrested, and tried for giving treasonable advice to the king. This was promised, an order was given for the confinement of that minister, and Duke Richard disbanded his army, and trusted himself in the tent of his sovereign. There he found that he had acted unadvisedly in trusting to the good faith of the court. He was faced by Somerset, who called him a traitor and felon, and told him that he was the king's prisoner. The royal party sent the duke to London, where they kept him in confinement; but they liberated him on hearing that his son was advancing with a considerable army. Before releasing him, however, they compelled him to take an oath to be a true, faithful, and obedient subject to King Henry. York took the oath, and then went to his castle of Wigmore, with no more intention of keeping it, probably, than Henry and his ministers had of keeping faith with him when they induced him to disband his army.

The same year [1452], the people of Guienne revolted against the dominion of the French, and sent ambassadors to England to beg the assistance of a small army, and to say how glad they should be to return to the English rule. Their request was granted, and 5,000 soldiers were sent to them, under the command of the venerable Earl of Shrewsbury, once the famous Sir John Talbot; who, though nearly eighty years of age, was still willing to go and fight his old enemies, the French. The brave old man led his troops to Bordeaux, made the French garrison there prisoners of war, and planted the flag of England on the walls of the city. The King of France, surprised at this renewal of hostilities on the part of the English, marched into Gûienne with an army of 22,000 men, and besieged the town of Castillon. This was a very important place, and Shrewsbury determined to relieve it. He attacked the French with success, and had nearly retaken the town, when another army came up and assailed him. Overpowered by numbers, the English broke and fled, leaving their brave old commander, the last hero of Agincourt, dead upon the field. Bordeaux was shortly after taken, and Guienne obliged again to submit to the sovereignty of the French.—This incident, by heaping another disgrace on the English, served still further to weaken King Henry in their respect, and made them turn their eyes to the more capable Richard, Duke of York.

Soon after the death of the brave Shrewsbury—on the 14th of October, 1453—Queen Margaret was delivered of a son, who was christened Edward, and made Prince of Wales and Earl of Chester. The birth of the royal infant, Henry's first and only child, was hailed with no joy: on the contrary, a gloom spread over a great part of the nation, who regarded it only as an obstacle to the peaceable succession of the Duke of York. Thus the prospects of this unhappy young prince were clouded even in his cradle.

The king was now carefully concealed from his subjects; he never appeared in public, and access could not be obtained to him by his nobility. There was a terrible reason for this seclusion; his weakness of intellect had assumed a more serious form; he was suffering from mental derangement; the period of the birth of his son coinciding with that of his incapacity to take any part in the duties of a sovereign. Profiting by the consequent weakness of the court party, the Yorkists, at the end of the year, contrived to get the Duke of Somerset, whom they bitterly hated, committed a prisoner to the Tower. When the parliament assembled in February, 1454, it sent a deputation of twelve noblemen to Windsor Castle, to demand an interview with the sovereign, on pretence of asking his advice about appointing a successor to the Archbishop of Canterbury, who had just died; but, in reality, to ascertain what was the nature of his malady. As they would take no denial, they were admitted to his presence, and they found Henry in a state resembling idiotcy. He took no notice of their greetings, gave no answer to their repeated questions, and, indeed, seemed insensible of their presence. His dull, spiritless eyes and vacant countenance proclaimed, but too plainly, that the delicate and mysterious machinery of the mind had for a time stopped, and that the spirit-flame of intellect was almost extinguished.

In these days, the insanity or idiotcy of a king, though it would grieve the people, would not, in this country, interfere with the proper discharge of the duties of government. A long experience of the errors of the past has enabled our statesmen to form a science of government, which, though far from perfect, makes the happiness of the people independent of the personal character or deficiencies of the monarch. It was otherwise in the fifteenth century; then the welfare or misery of a nation depended largely upon the personal qualities of its sovereign. The parliament, therefore—which met on the 14th of February, 1454—to obviate the inconveniences which might result from the malady of the king, elected Richard, Duke of York, to be PROTECTOR and DEFENDER of the realm of England.

This ambitious noble might now have grasped the golden sceptre and globe of royalty. Had he proceeded carefully, it is probable that but little opposition would have been offered him. Instead of pressing his claim and extending his power, he became diffident and timid. He made no mention of his hereditary rights; and even desired that it might be recorded, in the archives of parliament, that he had only accepted the authority conferred upon him at the desire and command of his fellow nobles. At that time he evidently doubted the justice of his claim, or wanted the courage to enforce it. The peers agreed that he should retain his position as protector until the recovery of the king; or, if Henry's derangement was found to be incurable, until the Prince of Wales should be of age.

The queen and her party profited by this irresolution on the part of the duke; and nine months after his appointment as protector, they declared that Henry was restored to consciousness and the perfect use of his reason, and claimed for him a restitution of the sovereign power. York resigned his lofty title and authority, but he did not do so very willingly; and, as the first act of the king was to release the Duke of Somerset from the Tower, he went to Ludlow, and calling his followers to arms, was immediately joined by several noblemen; amongst whom were the famous Earls of Warwick and Salisbury, and the Duke of Norfolk.

The king and his court led a royal army to oppose York and his confederate peers, and the two forces met at St. Alban's. Neither of them were very numerous; but York had a slight advantage in this respect. Before commencing the horrors of civil war, the duke sent a herald to the king, with a message professing a great respect and loyalty for his person; but demanding that his minister, the Duke of Somerset, should be surrendered to him. This demand was refused; Henry saying that he would rather die than abandon his faithful servants. The Yorkists then attacked the king's army in the streets, and an irregular battle was fought, in which the latter was soon thrown into confusion and fled. The Duke of Somerset, who had been the cause of so much jealousy, was killed, and the Earl of Northumberland, the Earl of Stafford, and Lord Clifford shared his fate. The unfortunate Henry, wounded in the neck by an arrow, was found hiding in the house of a tanner, and taken prisoner. Thus, on the 22nd of May, 1455, ended the first of that fatal series of wars, the Battles of the Roses. Very different estimates have been made of the number that perished on this occasion: it is commonly reckoned at more than 5,000; but other writers deny that even a fifth of that number fell.

This action, though unimportant in itself, is memorable as being the first of a series of sixteen battles, extending over a period of more than thirty years of civil war—a war which cost the lives of eighty princes of the royal blood, and almost annihilated the ancient barons of England.

The Duke of York treated the captive king with great respect; and the parliament, which met in July, again appointed him protector, deciding that he should exercise that authority until it pleased the parliament to release him from it, or until the Prince of Wales should come of age: at the same time the legislators renewed their allegiance to the king and his son, and by that act indirectly condemned the claim of the duke to the crown as illegal. York, though now possessed of sovereign power, acted with moderation; his natural irresolution induced him to do that; but he bestowed the great places of honour and profit in the state upon his partisans. Amongst other appointments he made the Earl of Salisbury chancellor; and to the brave and generous Warwick he committed the command of the strong town of Calais, which afterwards served as a refuge to the Yorkists in the time of their reverses.

Queen Margaret was a woman of great activity and decision, and she soon devised a plan for recovering the authority of the king. When parliament again met, in February, 1456, she induced her husband to attend and demand a restoration of his royal power. He obeyed her instructions, and took the parliament by surprise: it thought him plunged in imbecility, but found him for the moment acting with vigour. Unprepared with any opposition, the house consented to his demand; not a word was spoken about the state of his mind, and his disappointed rival resigned the protectorate on the 25th of February.

The Yorkists were immediately removed by the queen from the offices to which they had been appointed, and the duke and the great nobles who adhered to his cause retired to their castles, and began quietly collecting their retainers. At this point the Archbishop of Canterbury, like a true Christian priest, interposed and endeavoured to bring about a general reconciliation. He thought it was not too late to prevent the confusion and horror with which the nation was threatened; and it was at length agreed that all the great leaders of both parties should meet in London, enter into a bond of friendship, forget past injuries, and resolve on future peace. The meeting took place in 1458. The Yorkists, with a great body of retainers, lodged within the city, and the Lancastrians were accommodated outside its walls; while the mayor, with a body of 5,000 armed men, was on the alert to prevent any collision between them. Though the king was one of the principals in the quarrel, yet he became a sort of umpire, and proposed that York, with his friends, Salisbury and Warwick, should build a chapel for the good of the souls of those they had caused to be slain at St. Alban's; that all who were killed there, and those who killed them, should be considered as guiltless and loyal subjects; that Duke Richard should present a large sum of money to the widow and children of the late Duke of Somerset, and that the Earl of Warwick should perform some similar obligations. These terms were acquiesced in, and a hollow reconciliation took place. The king, queen, and courtiers of the royal party entered the city, and walked in procession hand-in-hand with the Duke of York and his party towards St. Paul's cathedral.

In spite of all these peaceful appearances the cause of the quarrel remained untouched, and angry feelings were ready to break forth at the least provocation. That provocation soon occurred. In November, 1458, the Earl of Warwick was summoned to Westminster to explain some illegal act which he had committed, as governor of Calais, on a foreign fleet. He attended; but as he was leaving the court, one of his followers was struck at by a servant of the king's. A violent commotion followed; and the earl, who was alarmed for his life, fled to Calais, and declared that a malicious attempt had been made by the royal party to murder him. This led to the issue of a writ of privy seal, superseding him, as governor of Calais, by the young Duke of Somerset. He refused to resign; alleging that the appointment was vested in the parliament, not in the privy council.

The Yorkists were incensed at this treatment of Warwick. They began to collect troops; the Lancastrians did the same; and it was certain that more blood would be shed. In the month of September, 1459, the Earl of Salisbury led his forces from Middleham Castle, in Yorkshire, to unite them with those of the Duke of York. It was important to the Lancastrians to prevent this junction of their enemies, and they sent Lord Audley with 10,000 soldiers in pursuit of the earl. The two armies met at a place called Blore Heath, on the borders of Staffordshire, on the 23rd of September; and Salisbury, whose force was inferior in numbers to that of his opponent, gained the victory by a stratagem. He feigned a retreat, and thus induced his antagonist to follow hurriedly, whereby Audley's army fell into confusion. While it was divided by crossing a rivulet in the neighbourhood, Salisbury suddenly turned round, and, by a severe and unexpected attack, killed upwards of 2,000 royalists, and put the rest to flight. Lord Audley himself was one of the victims of his imprudence.—Thus ended the second of the Wars of the Roses.

After this victory, Salisbury and his forces marched to Ludlow Castle, and joined those of the Duke of York; Warwick also arrived there with a body of veteran troops from Calais—old soldiers who had been inured to war by fighting against the French. The presence of this force caused the hopes of the York faction to stand high.

The Lancastrians were now thoroughly aroused to the danger. Their preparations had hitherto been comparatively small, and their efforts trifling; they now collected an army at Winchester of 60,000 men, and placed the king at the head of it. With this imposing force, nearly double in number to that with which the warlike father of Henry had subdued France, they advanced upon their foes. The two armies met on the 13th of October; and the Yorkists stood firm, notwithstanding the immense superiority of their antagonists. It was late in the day when the armies came in sight of each other, and the battle was postponed until the following morning; but, in the course of the night, Sir Andrew Trollope deserted from the side of the Duke of York, and led a great number of the soldiers who had come from Calais over to the king. The duke was distracted: to fight under such circumstances was to court defeat: a hurried council was held; and it was agreed to break up the camp and take to flight. Had Henry followed them instantly he might have destroyed the York faction utterly, and sat upon his throne without a rival claimant; but he was incapable of any decisive measure, and his enemies were permitted to escape, and again concentrate their forces for another struggle. York fled to Ireland; while Warwick and Salisbury went over to Calais, and took refuge within the strong fortifications of that town.—On the 20th of November a parliament met at Coventry, by which all the Yorkist lords who refused to surrender to the king's officers were declared traitors, and their possessions forfeited.

Warwick was very popular at Calais; and a royal fleet, sent to dispossess him from that strong place, deserted and joined him. With the naval force thus acquired, he was able to obtain some other maritime successes, and in the month of June, 1460, he ventured to cross the sea and land on the coast of Kent. He brought but a very small force with him; but he was welcomed by the Archbishop of Canterbury, and joined by so many knights and their retainers, that, by the time he reached London, he was followed by an army of 30,000 men. He had brought with him York's eldest son, Edward, a young man of a remarkably handsome and graceful appearance; and both he and the earl were received with loud welcomes by the citizens.

The king had collected an army in the midland counties, and there Warwick marched without further delay. The opposing forces met at Northampton on the 10th of July, and a battle was fought, in which Warwick was victorious. It was somewhat remarkable, that as he had lately been for a time ruined by the treachery of one of his own leaders, so he now triumphed in consequence of the treachery of one of Henry's officers, Lord Grey de Ruthyn, who deserted to the enemy during the battle. The number of the slain, on the part of the vanquished sovereign, was little more than 1,000; but most of them were knights and gentlemen; for Warwick gave a merciful order to spare the common soldiers as much as possible, and kill those only of higher rank. The former were influenced by no angry feeling against him; but the nobles and gentry chose their party, and were his enemies on principle. King Henry was again taken prisoner; but he was regarded with pity, and treated with respect. Margaret and her son escaped and fled to Scotland.

A parliament assembled at Westminster on the 7th of October; at which, on the 16th, the Duke of York, who had been summoned from Ireland, made his appearance. Entering the House of Lords, he advanced towards the throne, and laid his hand upon the golden-worked drapery that covered it. All eyes were fixed upon him, and an impressive silence prevailed. No voice was raised in approval, and the ambitious noble hesitated. Then the Archbishop of Canterbury asked him if he would pay his respects to the king, who was in the neighbouring palace? Duke Richard answered, that he owed the title of king to none but God, and that it was rather Henry's duty to wait upon him.

Then, still standing by the throne, he traced his descent from Edmund Mortimer, the Earl of March, and insisted on the justice of his title to the royalty of England. He alluded to the cruelties by which the House of Lancaster had won its way to sovereign power; spoke of the misery which had resulted from the reign of the incapable Henry; and urged the peers to do him justice, as the lineal successor of their ancient line of monarchs. He evidently expected that they would have at once requested him to seat himself on the throne, and assume the sovereign power; but in this he was mistaken: they shrank from so great a responsibility, and returned no answer. Mortified by their silence, the duke left the building, and retired to the royal palace.

A few days afterwards, York sent a written document demanding the crown, and a message requiring an immediate answer. The lords were perplexed, and they resolved to wait on the king, and receive his commands. When the object of their visit was made known to Henry, he said—"My father was king; his father was also king. I have worn the crown nearly forty years, from my cradle; you have all sworn fealty to me as your sovereign, and your fathers did the like to my fathers. How, then, can my right be disputed?" A change of feeling had taken place; not only did many nobles pity the now helpless king, but numbers of them trembled for the estates which they had received as gifts from the Lancastrian sovereigns. They would willingly have decided against the claim of the duke; but his friend, the Earl of Warwick, was near at hand, with a numerous and victorious army, and they dared not act with freedom. Still they would not altogether stifle their convictions; and, after some discussion, they presented to the duke a paper containing their objections to his title. The chief of these were the oaths of fealty, which both he and they had taken to Henry; the many acts of parliament passed since the accession of the House of Lancaster; that entails had been made of the crown on the male line only, whereas he claimed through a female; that he had always borne the arms of York, not those of Clarence, and that, therefore, he could not claim as successor to the latter family; and, finally, that Henry IV. had declared that he had ascended the throne as the true heir of Henry III. The duke replied to these objections; and, in the end, the peers proposed a compromise of the question, which he thought it prudent to accept. They admitted that Duke Richard's title was a just one; but urged, that as Henry had worn the crown for nearly forty years, it was better to permit him to continue to wear it during his life, after which it should descend to Richard and his heirs for ever.

The news that her young son was excluded from inheriting his father's crown, soon reached Queen Margaret at her retreat in Scotland. She instantly returned to England, and, by her powers of insinuation and address, and her great talents, soon prevailed upon some of the northern barons to take up her cause. Her enemies, who thought her ruined and powerless, were astonished at the rapidity with which she collected an army of 20,000 men—an army which ranked among its leaders the Duke of Somerset (the son of that noble who was slain at St. Alban's), the Earls of Northumberland and Devon, and the Lords Clifford, Dacres, and Nevil. York had gone to his castle of Sandal, in Yorkshire, to spend his Christmas; but when he heard of Margaret's return to England, and that she was advancing to the south at the head of a large force, he determined, contrary to the advice of his friends, to leave Sandal, and meet her. They met on the 31st of December, near Wakefield, where a battle took place. The conflict was a furious one: but the great superiority of numbers on Margaret's side won her the victory: the duke's army had consisted of only 5,000 men; and of these, 2,000 lay dead upon the field. But the circumstance that rendered this victory more welcome to the queen, was the death of the arch-enemy of her house, the Duke of York himself. The fierce Margaret had the head struck from his corpse; and after crowning it in contempt with a diadem of paper, ordered it to be set on the gates of the city from which the vanquished noble derived his title.—The second son of the Duke of York, the young Earl of Rutland, was in his father's camp, and, after the battle, fled for safety, in company with his tutor. He had not reached his eighteenth year, and was a boy of singular beauty and mental promise. At a bridge which spanned a little stream in the neighbourhood he was stopped by the fierce Lord Clifford. The father of this nobleman had been slain at St. Alban's by the Yorkists, and he had consequently sworn a fearful oath that he would never spare any of the hated family of York that fell into his power. The young earl fell upon his knees, and prayed for mercy; but happening, by accident, to reveal who he was, Clifford plunged his sword into the bosom of his defenceless victim, and laid him dead upon the spot. He then bid the tutor go and tell the duchess the fate of her son. The people were shocked at this atrocity: but they soon became familiar with such sad and revolting acts; for cruelty is the natural result of civil war, and arises from it as spontaneously as weeds and poppies spring up in ill-tended corn-fields or deserted gardens.

Queen Margaret was intoxicated with her triumph, and thirsted for the blood of those who had caused her and her family so much anxiety and misery. In the night following the battle the old Earl of Salisbury fell into her hands. She ordered him, and some knights and gentlemen who were also taken prisoners, to be immediately beheaded; and that harsh sentence was put in execution at Pomfret Castle, on the 1st of January, 1461.

Though Richard, Duke of York, was dead, yet both his claim and his party survived. He left behind him three sons, Edward, George, and Richard, two of whom afterwards wore the English crown. Edward, Earl of March, who succeeded to his father's title, was but twenty years of age; but he was a prince of great spirit, courage, and activity: and, confident in his right, he resolved to war unflinchingly with the partisans of the House of Lancaster, and not to sheathe the sword till he was crowned with victory.

The queen, after her victory at Wakefield, divided her army into two parts: one she sent, under the command of Jasper Tudor, the Earl of Pembroke, against Edward, the new Duke of York, who was at Gloucester with a great body of troops; and the other she led in person against the famous Warwick, who lay at London with an army of Yorkists. Edward's power was very considerable; for great numbers of people from the Welsh marshes flocked to his standard directly they heard of the death of his father. Thus encouraged, he determined to march against Margaret, and endeavour to punish her for the insult she had wreaked upon the corpse of his parent. When he arrived at Mortimer's Cross, in Herefordshire, he was opposed by Jasper Tudor, and a desperate battle took place on the 2nd of February, 1461. The victory fell to the lot of Edward, and nearly 4,000 of his opponents were slaughtered. Jasper, the Earl of Pembroke, escaped; but his father, Owen Tudor, the handsome Welshman who married the widow of Henry V., was taken prisoner, and, with eight other Lancastrians of rank, beheaded on the field of battle. This was done as a retaliation for the fate of those whom Queen Margaret had caused to be executed after the battle of Wakefield; but it was an act of great inhumanity, not sanctioned by the rules of war; and it is to be regretted that Edward sullied his character by allowing it.

Though the division of Margaret's army which she had confided to the Earl of Pembroke was defeated by Edward at Mortimer's Cross, yet the army under her own discretion gained, on the 19th of February, a victory over the Earl of Warwick at St. Alban's. Warwick marched from London, bearing with him the passive and captive King Henry: he stopped the progress of Margaret just by the town of St. Alban's, which had before been the scene of one of those dark contests in which Englishmen dyed their hands in each other's blood with a fury and bitterness exceeding that which they exhibited towards foreign foes. The queen and her troops fell upon Warwick with tremendous fury, and the battle extended, in a straggling manner, from St. Alban's to Barnet Common. The earl was defeated, and fled, after losing about 2,000 men. In the hurry of flight he left the king behind him, and the passive monarch was discovered in his tent by Margaret, and thus restored to liberty. Lord Bouvile, to whose custody he had been entrusted by the Yorkists, was taken with him; and although Henry had assured that noble of his pardon, yet Margaret gave him over to the hands of the executioner. He was beheaded, together with Thomas Kyriel, a brave soldier, who had won some distinction in the wars of France. This was done in return for Edward's barbarity at Mortimer's Cross: thus, on each side, war was made more terrible by the bitter spirit of private vengeance.

A proclamation was then issued by the active queen in the name of her husband, Henry, withdrawing his consent to the late arrangement respecting the succession of the crown. It was said that this promise, being extorted from him, could not be considered a binding one, and was therefore invalid. The proclamation also denounced Edward, the new Duke of York, as a traitor, and offered a reward for his apprehension.

This proclamation was, however, but little better than waste parchment, for the queen had no power to enforce it. The star of the House of Lancaster was setting before the rising of the sun of York. The power of Edward was rapidly increasing; and Margaret's troops, who lived by plunder, incurred for her the disgust and hatred of the districts through which she passed. Edward, having collected the defeated troops of the Earl of Warwick, marched to London; and the united forces entered in triumph, and were received by the people with tumultuous joy. The duke rode through the streets like a conqueror; and his manly figure, handsome countenance, and courtesy of manner, won him general admiration. Tired of the war, and fearful for the safety of their property, the Londoners no doubt thought that by declaring for Edward, who now seemed the strongest, they would be able to terminate the dark struggle which had continued so long. That young prince, seeing the general favour with which he was regarded, determined at once to assume the name and dignity of king; to insist openly on his claim; and to treat, in future, the opposite party as traitors and rebels to his royal authority.

Still, it was necessary to obtain something like a national assent for such a measure, and this he managed to get, though in an irregular manner. A review of the army was held in St. John's Fields, on the 28th of February, and was deemed a fitting opportunity to propose the subject. An immense concourse of people, amongst whom were many of the wealthiest of the citizens, assembled to witness the sight. Before the multitude dispersed, they were addressed by Lord Falconberg and the Bishop of Exeter. The peer and prelate both spoke against what they called the tyranny and usurpation of the feeble king; and alluding to his long-proved imbecility, demanded of the assembled people, if they would have Henry of Lancaster any longer for their sovereign? Loud shouts of "No, no!" rose up from the excited crowd. The title of Edward was then dwelt upon; and, after a flattering account had been given of his youth, bravery, and abilities, the question was put as to whether they would love, serve, and obey him as their lawful sovereign? Again a loud shout rose into the air; but it was a shout of "Yes, yes! King Edward! Long live King Edward!" The assent of the people was willing and hearty enough; but the momentary enthusiasm of a mob is not an expression of the deliberate will of a great nation.

Edward knew this very well; therefore, the next day, a great meeting of bishops and nobles was held at Baynard's Castle, on the banks of the Thames; which, after some deliberation, confirmed the choice of the people at St. John's Fields, by declaring that Henry of Lancaster, in joining the queen's forces, had broken his faith, and violated the award of the preceding year; thereby forfeiting the crown to the heir of the late Duke of York, whose rights by birth had been proved and established. Two days afterwards, on the 3rd of March, Edward proceeded to Westminster Abbey, attended by a vast procession, and was there proclaimed King of England. He had not completed his 20th year; but he seems to have possessed as much coolness and self-possession before a concourse of his nobles and people, as he had showed courage upon the battle-field. He explained the claims of his family to the throne on which he then sat; and said that he received the crown as the true heir of the monarchy, and the descendant of an illustrious line of kings. When he had concluded his address, the old abbey rang with shouts of "God bless King Edward! Long live King Edward!"

Thus ended the reign of Henry VI., after he had worn a tottering crown for nine-and-thirty years. He had been a king from his cradle; and at the time of his illustrious father's death, his prospects were as brilliant as those enjoyed by any prince in Europe. The people of England regarded the only son of the hero of Agincourt with a feeling approaching to idolatry, and in his person was centred the sovereignty of both France and England. At the age of forty, the unoffending, monk-like monarch was an uncrowned fugitive, who had forfeited his people's love, his royal possessions, his kingly authority, and scarcely knew where to rest his head in safety. Gentleness, apathy, and superstition were the leading points of his character: indeed, so passive was he, that the revolution which tore the sceptre from his grasp, and took the crown from his brow, afflicted him far less than it did many of his subjects. If he had been permitted to live in peace, it is probable he would almost have forgotten that he ever wore a crown. A story is related of him which shows at once his merciful nature and the weakness of his character. He abhorred the revolting punishment inflicted in cases of high treason, but never had the resolution to abolish it. One day, on beholding the quarter of a person who had been executed for treason fixed on the walls of the Tower, he cried, "Take it away! take it away! it is a shame to use any Christian so cruelly on my account."

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

THE REIGN OF EDWARD THE FOURTH.—A.D. 1461—1470.

EDWARD, even before there was time for his coronation, had to fight for the sceptre he had so suddenly acquired. The Lancastrians, under the command of Queen Margaret and the Duke of Somerset, collected an army in Yorkshire, consisting of 60,000 men. Such a power was indeed formidable; and the new king and the Earl of Warwick marched to the north, with nearly 50,000 men to meet it.

When they reached Pontefract, a slight engagement took place between some advanced troops of the two armies, which ended in the defeat of the Yorkists. The Earl of Warwick immediately exerted himself to do away with the evil impression which such an accident was likely to produce upon King Edward's troops. Calling for his horse, he plunged his sword into the body of the unfortunate animal, and then, kissing the hilt of the reeking weapon, declared that he had killed his steed to render flight impossible, and swore that he was resolved to share the fate of the meanest of his soldiers. To produce a feeling of confidence in the minds of his men, he declared that every one who wished to retire from the field might do so: he wanted no enforced service—no hands without hearts; and at the same time he threatened the severest punishments to those who should be convicted of cowardice in the ensuing battle.

The two armies met at Towton, near Tadcaster; and there, on Palm Sunday, the 29th of March, was fought the fiercest and most fatal battle that had yet occurred between the conflicting factions. Each side strove with a blind fury, and with such a savage zeal, that it might have been supposed that every man was encountering a personal enemy, who had inflicted on him an irreparable wrong. The Yorkists first advanced to the charge amidst a thick snow-storm, and the broad, white flakes beat furiously into the faces of their antagonists. One of Edward's nobles had the ingenuity to turn this circumstance to great account: he ordered some archers to advance before the army, and then, having shot a volley of arrows, immediately to retire. The Lancastrian archers, who were half blinded by the snow, and unable to see their foes, supposed that they were within bow-shot of the opposite army, and shot flight after flight of their arrows, which, as there was no enemy within reach, spent their force upon the air, and then fell harmless to the ground. When the quivers of these mistaken men were empty, and they had no more arrows, Edward ordered his soldiers to advance. They did so, and committed fearful slaughter upon the surprised Lancastrians, who looked in vain for the heaps of dead which they supposed their thick flight of arrows had sent to rest for ever. But the bow was soon laid aside, and the infuriated soldiers fought hand to hand and foot to foot. The carnage was horrible, for Edward had issued orders that no quarter should be given, and no prostrate foe spared. With a severity ill-suited to his youth, he wished to strike such a blow as should inspire his opponents with fear, and terrify them into a passive submission to his rule. The horrible conflict lasted for six hours, and then the Lancastrians broke and fled; seven northern barons, who had espoused that fated cause, perished with their weapons in their hands. Two others, the Earls of Devonshire and Wiltshire, were taken prisoners, and, with an insolent exercise of power, beheaded as traitors. Queen Margaret, her husband and son, fled to Scotland, accompanied by the Duke of Somerset, who had commanded in this fatal battle. The defeated army was pursued as far as Tadcaster; and in the white sheet of snow which covered the roads lay the rigid corpse of many a victim of this wild contest.

This fierce fighting and indiscriminate slaughter between the people of the same country, was wild and fiendish work for a day which the Holy One had set apart for rest and peace. The number of the killed, in that desperate conflict, was far greater than had occurred in any of the contests that had preceded it. It is estimated that 36,000 were killed in the battle and in the flight, and that 28,000 were Lancastrians. The result of the battle was almost to annihilate the partisans of the Red Rose, to weave the White Rose in the jewelled diadem of royalty, and to place Edward, for a time at least, firmly upon the throne.

Hurrying from the field of battle, Edward returned to London, and prepared for his coronation. The ceremony was conducted with the usual magnificence and solemnity at Westminster Abbey, on the 29th of June, and the new king afterwards bestowed upon his brother George the title of Duke of Clarence, and upon Richard that of Duke of Gloucester.

On the 4th of November of the same year (1461), the parliament met and confirmed Edward's title. It declared him to be the sovereign by hereditary descent, through the family of Edmund Mortimer, Earl of March, and dated the commencement of his reign from the day when he assumed the government. It then pronounced the three kings of the Lancastrian line, the Fourth, Fifth, and Sixth Henry, to have been tyrants and usurpers, and resumed all the royal grants which those sovereigns had bestowed upon their adherents. Here at least the parliament might have paused; but the spirit of faction and revenge was not yet satisfied, and sentence of attainder and forfeiture of their estates was passed upon the fugitive ex-king, his queen, and his son, Prince Edward. This sentence also included all the great Lancastrian nobles, and 150 knights, priests, and gentlemen.

Before Edward dissolved the parliament, he delivered the following address to the representatives of the people. Turning to the Speaker, he said, "James Strangeways, and ye that be come for the Commons of this land, for the true hearts and tender considerations that ye have had to my right and title, I thank you as heartily as I can. Also for the tender and true hearts that ye have showed unto me, in that ye have tenderly had in remembrance the correction of the horrible murder and cruel death of my lord my father, my brother Rutland, and my cousin of Salisbury, and others, I thank you right heartily; and I shall be unto you, with the grace of Almighty God, as good and gracious sovereign lord as ever was any of my noble progenitors to their subjects and liegemen. And for the faithful and loving hearts, and also the great labours that ye have borne and sustained toward me in the recovering my said right and title which I now possess, I thank you with all my heart; and if I had any better good to reward you withal than my body, ye should have it, the which shall always be ready for your defence, never sparing nor letting for no jeopardy, praying you all of your hearty assistance and good countenance, as I shall be with you a very rightwise, and loving liege lord."

No mercy was shown to any one who retained an attachment to the ruined king and his family; and to accuse a man of being a Lancastrian, was almost the same as sending him to the scaffold. Loyalty to the expelled Henry was regarded as the most monstrous of crimes; and the Yorkists employed the axe and the rope of the executioner to extirpate all such of their opponents as the sword had spared upon the battle-field.

A remarkable instance of Edward's hardness of heart and mercilessness of character was shown at the very commencement of his reign. A London tradesman, who had more wit than wisdom, was condemned and executed as a traitor merely for having uttered a harmless joke. Shops of all kinds then exhibited some sort of sign, and his was distinguished by that of "the Crown." The man boasted that he would make his son heir to the crown; and as this poor pun was supposed to be spoken in derision of Edward's ambiguous title, he was put to death in consequence. No act of tyranny so wanton as this had been perpetrated in England since the time of the infamous King John. But the early reign of Edward was a reign of terror, and the flourishing White Rose was daily watered with the blood of his subjects.

Queen Margaret and her family, as previously stated, had fled for safety to Scotland after the fatal battle of Towton. She bribed the Scottish sovereign to undertake her cause, by promising him the important town and fortress of Berwick in return for his services. The Scots accordingly laid siege to Carlisle, but were defeated with great loss by Lord Montague, the brother of the famous Earl of Warwick. They also made an inroad into the county of Durham, but were again beaten back by King Edward's troops; and as the Scotch sovereign had troubles and factions at home to contend with, he left Margaret and her husband to do the best they could for themselves.

Bad as her position was, Margaret was not the woman to despair; she knew that it never yet helped any one. She travelled rapidly from Scotland to the court of France, and begged the assistance of Louis XI. to enable her husband to regain his throne. France had been rising in prosperity as England had been falling; and Louis was an able-minded, crafty monarch, who was not disposed to fight other people's quarrels for nothing. He expressed a great deal of sympathy for Margaret, but feared that he could not assist her. He was poor, he said, and it was necessary to bestow all his attention upon his own kingdom. When, however, she promised to deliver up Calais if her family were restored to their royalty through his means, he changed his mind, and presented her with 20,000 crowns and 2,000 men-at-arms.

This was but a small force, and very unequal to the purpose for which it was intended; but the dauntless queen resolved again to try her fortune with it. Proceeding to England, she landed on the coast of Northumberland in October, 1462, where she was joined by some of her ruined followers and some Scotch borderers. With them she attacked and took possession of the castles of Alnwick, Bamborough, and Dunstable. This gleam of prosperity was soon extinguished by the approach of Warwick with an army of 20,000 men. The castles were retaken, and Margaret and her troops fled to their ships for safety. Even then the wind and the waves seemed adverse to her doomed cause: the little fleet was separated by a storm; the vessels that bore her stores and treasures were driven back, shattered wrecks, upon the coast; and the wretched queen escaped to Berwick, almost alone, in a fishing-boat.

For two years the horrors of civil war were stayed, and Edward reigned in peace. During that time the ever-active Margaret had gone from court to court to solicit foreign assistance; and in the April of 1464 she again made her appearance in England, and raised the Lancastrian banner. The Duke of Somerset, together with the Lords De Roos and Hungerford, Sir Ralph Percy, and many knights and gentlemen, immediately took up arms, and prepared to join her. They were not fortunate enough to accomplish their intention. Percy, Roos, and Hungerford were met at Hedgeley Moor by Lord Montague; and after a skirmish on the 25th of April, which has been dignified with the name of a battle, they were defeated. Only 108 men perished on the field; but Sir Ralph Percy was among them. The Lords de Roos and Hungerford were not so fortunate as to die in honourable freedom with their swords in their hands; they were taken prisoners and beheaded as traitors.

This blow to the cause of the faded Red Rose was rapidly followed by another. On the 15th of May the Lancastrians sustained a reverse of fortune at Hexham. The army under Somerset and the queen was attacked by the victorious Montague, and utterly routed. Many gentlemen perished on the field of battle, and many others on the scaffold.

The unfortunate King Henry had been brought by his queen into her camp, that she might have the advantage of what authority still attached to his name as king; and after the battle he concealed himself among the moors of Lancashire and Westmoreland. In this manner he lived for about a year upon the hospitality of such as were secretly attached to his cause; then he was recognised by some Yorkists, who seized and carried him to London as a prisoner. Edward sent him to the Tower; but that triumphant prince spared the life of his captive, as much, it is thought, from contempt of his feeble mind and character as from a feeling of compassion. The indefatigable Margaret preserved her liberty, but she experienced adventures and hardships which bear more resemblance to those of a heroine of romance, than to the vicissitudes of an unhappy queen. She fled from the battle-field with her son, and took refuge in the intricacies of a neighbouring forest, where she attempted to conceal herself. In this forlorn condition she was discovered by a band of robbers, who took away her rings and jewels, and treated her with ruffianly insolence. Margaret, however, wisely concealed her rank; and while they were quarrelling over the division of their plunder, she and her son contrived to crawl unobserved away. At length she became entangled in the thickest part of the forest, where, having wandered about until exhaustion and fatigue overpowered her, she sank down a prey to grief and terror. What a situation for an English queen!—for one whose position had commanded the extreme of luxury and deference, and whose personal beauty and talents had won admiration from all around her!

While in this pitiable condition she was threatened by another danger. A robber approached her with harsh looks and a drawn sword. Violence or death seemed unavoidable; but the quick mind of Margaret extricated her from this perilous state. She rightly guessed that many are driven to a life of crime by misfortune—not led to it as the willing choice of a depraved nature. Though a robber, this man might have some touches of generous sympathy yet left in his mind. Margaret suddenly resolved to reveal her rank to him, and trust to his better qualities for her protection. Advancing towards him, she presented the young prince, and exclaimed, "Here, my friend, I commit to your care the safety of your king's son!" The queen was correct in her estimate of the man's character. Awed by her majestic demeanour, and captivated by the confidence bestowed on him, he not only promised to do her no harm, but vowed that he would devote himself entirely to her service. True to his word, he hid her in the forest until he found means of conveying her in safety to some friends of the Lancastrian cause, who provided her with the means of escaping into Flanders. On parting from the robber, she assured him, that what she most regretted in her unhappy fortune was, her inability to properly reward his generous fidelity.

Edward had conquered all opposition. Henry was a prisoner in the Tower; Margaret and her son, Prince Edward, were exiles in a foreign land; and the principal nobles and gentry who had upheld the House of Lancaster had perished by the sword or axe. Not only were the enemies of the young king at home thus crushed beneath his power, but he had the wisdom to enter into foreign treaties, which saved him from fear of any invasion from abroad. One of these treaties was concluded with Scotland. It bound the two governments to a truce of fifteen years; and the King of Scotland engaged to give neither shelter nor aid to Edward's foes.—The king was exceedingly accessible to his subjects, and treated them with a familiar condescension which won for him their attachment. All things smiled upon him, and the security of his throne seemed unassailable. He therefore abandoned himself to pleasure; and hunting, feasting, music, the society of gay young courtiers, and the most beautiful and elegant of the daughters of his nobles, occupied his time almost to the entire exclusion of more tranquil and serious pursuits. He soon, however, entered into the bonds of marriage with the daughter of a Lancastrian.*

The Duke of Bedford, brother of Henry V., and regent of France after the death of that monarch, at his death, in 1434, left a widow, Jacquetta, who afterwards married a gentleman of much lower rank, of the name of Sir Richard Woodville. By this marriage she had several children, and among them a very graceful and beautiful daughter, called Elizabeth. This young lady was married, at a very early age, to Sir John Grey, of Groby, a gentleman who was attached to the House of Lancaster, and who perished in its cause at the second battle of St. Alban's. His estate was, in consequence, confiscated by King Edward; and the youthful widow, deprived at once of her husband and her fortune, returned with her children in sorrow to the house of her father.

Though Lady Woodville, the late Duchess of Bedford, was of Lancastrian family, yet, it seems, she enjoyed the acquaintance and friendly regard of Edward; for one day, while on a hunting party, he paid her a visit at her manor of Grafton, near Stoney Stratford. Desirous of turning this visit to good account, Jacquetta introduced her beautiful widowed daughter to the notice of the youthful sovereign. Lady Grey threw herself at the feet of Edward, and, with many tears, implored him to pity her ruined and distressed children, and restore to them the estate of their dead father. The king gazed with admiration upon the prostrate beauty before him, and, raising her from the ground, assured her that her suit was granted. The cause of this generosity was, that he had conceived a sudden and extreme attachment for her. Her fascinating conversation, and numerous accomplishments, soon strongly fastened the chain of roses with which the young beauty had so quickly fettered her king. Edward declared his love, and made proposals to her, which were instantly rejected as dishonourable. Finding that all entreaties of that nature were useless, and unable to conquer his passion, he imprudently offered to share his throne with her as well as his heart. This proposal was readily accepted, and, on the 1st of May, 1464, Edward and Elizabeth were privately married at Grafton, near Stoney Stratford. This alliance with the widow of a private gentleman, the king knew would provoke the jealousy and anger of his nobles, who all expected that their sovereign would have matched himself with some princess of illustrious descent and powerful connections; and some of whom, perhaps, had looked upon one of their own daughters as the probable future Queen of England. Edward, therefore, kept his secret for several months.

At length, he summoned a council of prelates and nobles, to whom he avowed his marriage; and the great Warwick, although by no means pleased with the occurrence, took Elizabeth by the hand, and introduced her to the assembly as their queen. Soon afterwards another council settled upon her an annual allowance of 4,000 marks. On the 26th of May, in the following year (1465), she was crowned with great magnificence at Westminster; and the gorgeous ceremony was followed by pageants, tournaments, and other festivities.

Elizabeth showed a greater attachment for her family than was consistent with her exalted position. Every member of it flocked around her, in order to be provided for, and she induced the king to gratify them to an extent which roused the jealousy of the princes and nobles of the court. Her father was created Earl Rivers, and made treasurer and lord high constable. Her brother received the title and estates of Lord Scales, by marrying the heiress of that deceased nobleman; and her five sisters were married to the heirs of five dukes or earls. The daughter and heiress of the Duke of Exeter was also contracted to Thomas Grey, a son of the queen by her first husband. This circumstance greatly annoyed the Earl of Warwick, who had asked the hand of the wealthy young lady for his own nephew; and some other matters of the same trifling character followed, which all tended to create a coolness between that nobleman and the king. Hitherto, Warwick and his family, whose services had placed Edward upon the throne, had enjoyed the full sunshine of royal favour and rewards; but now most of the desirable things in the gift of the sovereign were scrambled for and obtained by the relations of the queen.

Louis IX. of France was desirous that Edward's sister, the Princess Margaret of York, should be married to one of his sons. The lady's hand was also solicited by another French prince, Charles the Rash, the wealthy and powerful son of the late Duke of Burgundy. Warwick, who was Edward's chief minister, said it would be most advantageous to marry the princess to a son of the French king. Edward thought differently, and was inclined to favour the pretensions of Charles; but he yielded his opinion in favour of that of the earl—or, at any rate, pretended to do so, for he was not acting very sincerely. He even sent Warwick as an ambassador to the court of France, to treat with Louis upon the subject; but during his absence he received a messenger from Charles of Burgundy, and agreed to give his sister in marriage to that wealthy prince. Warwick considered himself trifled with and insulted by this duplicity—as, indeed, he was; and on his return to England, great coolness existed between him and the king. Edward was too proud to apologise for the slight he had put upon the earl: he did not even condescend to take any notice of the occurrence; and Warwick soon left the court; retiring, in a moody fit, to his strong castle of Middleham.

The queen and her relations feared Warwick, whom they knew disliked them, and they represented to Edward that the Earl was a dangerous person. The king now desired to be rid of the man whose influence over him had been so considerable, and whose power was too great for a subject. He spread a report, therefore, that Warwick was engaged in treasonable plots against him, appointed a strong guard to protect his person, and banished all the Nevilles from court.

For some years we have very imperfect records of the historical events in England. Many of the chronicles appear to have been destroyed during the civil wars which followed, when the monasteries which contained them were burnt. Strange things were done, the motives for which it is difficult to guess at; and circumstances are related by some writers which are altogether discredited by others. One thing, however, is certain—that Warwick or the king, or perhaps both of them, were tainted by gross treachery and dishonesty. Indeed, most of the public men of that time, in England, were unprincipled and changeable; each appeared to be striving for supremacy, and exclaiming on the faithlessness of the others. Heartlessness and perfidy in a prince are contagious, and not only infect his whole court, but contaminate his people. Thus it was in the reign of Edward IV.: the fountain of honour was corrupt; and the stream, which should have been as pure as snow and clear as crystal, was tainted and muddy.

The year following the banishment of the Nevilles, the great Warwick, whose popularity with the nation was immense, reappeared at court, and was reconciled to the king. In June, 1468, when the sister of Edward was about to embark for Flanders, to be married to the Duke of Burgundy, Warwick conducted her through the streets of London. New jealousies, however, soon arose. Edward had as yet no male children; therefore his brother George, the Duke of Clarence, had some expectation of succeeding to the crown. The ambitious Warwick had two beautiful daughters, either of whom he longed to see Queen of England. Clarence formed an attachment to the eldest, the Lady Isabella. Warwick desired a marriage to take place, but the king and court strongly opposed it. They thought, that as Warwick had raised Edward to the throne, so, in a fit of ill-temper, he might endeavour to depose him, and place Clarence and Isabella in the regal chair instead. For this reason, they were averse to the match; but the influence of Warwick and the charms of the lady prevailed, and, in the month of July, 1469, Clarence was married to Isabella, at Calais.

Edward's indignation at this circumstance was succeeded by alarm, in consequence of a formidable insurrection which broke out at the same time among the people of Yorkshire. The origin of the disturbance was the exaction of some contributions from the farmers and others by the clergy, which were collected, ostensibly, for charitable purposes, but were applied to their own use. The men of Yorkshire said they would not encourage idle priests to fatten on what was intended for the poor; and neither clerical censure nor imprisonment could drive them from that determination. When the collectors forcibly entered their dwellings, and took away their goods for payment, the spirit of Englishmen was aroused; and the farmers and peasants rose in a great body, and put the meddling intruders to death. Once in arms, they resolved on the reformation of other abuses; and a cry arose for the banishment of the queen's relations from the council of the king. These mushroom courtiers, who, to speak metaphorically, had risen from commoners to the rank of nobility in a single night, were regarded as the very locusts of taxation, and the oppressors of the poor. "Away with them!" said the men of Yorkshire, "for they corrupt the king, and cause all our distresses."

Edward hastily gathered a small army and marched against the rebels. But the latter were so formidable that he retired rapidly to Nottingham, where he wrote to Warwick and his brother Clarence, who were still at Calais, to come and help him. Warwick made no haste to appear; and, before his arrival, a royal army, under the command of the Earl of Pembroke, had been defeated by the insurgents at Edgecote. The earl, and 5,000 of his men, perished in the conflict. The men of Yorkshire fiercely pursued the flying troops; and having seized Earl Rivers, the father of the queen, and Sir John Woodville, one of her brothers, they beheaded them both at Northampton.

It was suspected, by the court, that these cruelties proceeded from the influence of the Earl of Warwick, who, it was thought, secretly fomented the insurrection. Whether he did so is one of the dark mysteries with which history, before the invention and general use of printing, abounds. The earl bitterly hated the relations of the queen, who fell victims to the fury of the men with whom it was supposed he had some secret connection. This leads to a suspicion of his guilt. On the other hand, as soon as he returned to England, he went in a friendly manner to Edward and undertook his cause. This looks like innocence. Warwick persuaded the king to grant a general pardon to the rebels, who were so attached to the earl, that they instantly returned to their homes.

Having delivered Edward from danger, some historians say that Warwick and the Duke of Clarence, who acted with him, carried the king as a prisoner to the earl's castle of Middleham; others deny that this was the case. As a former historian remarks, "All that we can distinguish with certainty through the deep cloud which covers that period, is a scene of horror and bloodshed, savage manners, arbitrary executions, and treacherous, dishonourable conduct in all parties." Certainly, if Edward ever were a prisoner, he was soon released, and an exchange of friendly protestation took place between himself, Warwick, and his brother Clarence, Warwick's son-in-law and faithful ally.

The following year (1470), there was another quarrel between the king and Warwick, another hollow reconciliation, and another insurrection of the people (in Lincolnshire), which the earl was suspected of having secretly excited. As before, Warwick and Clarence marched against the rebels; but Edward distrusted his brother and his warlike minister, and, gathering another and a larger army, also took the field. He was the first to meet the insurgents, who amounted to about 30,000 men, and a battle was fought between them and his troops at Stamford. The king was victorious, and, after a great slaughter, all the leaders of the revolt who escaped death by the sword, perished on the scaffold.

Edward was then so convinced of the perfidy of Warwick and Clarence, who had been raising troops in their own names, and issuing declarations against the government, complaining of grievances and oppressions, that he turned his triumphant arms against them; and it is possible that a battle would have taken place, but that Warwick was disappointed in some of his friends, whose allegiance to Edward he was unable to corrupt. In this difficulty the earl and his son-in-law disbanded their forces, embarked in a vessel with their families and friends, and sailed to Calais.

To Warwick's astonishment, the guns of the fortress were pointed against his ship, and he was refused admission into the town, of which he was the governor. The deputy, whom he had left in command, a Gascon, named Vaucler, resolved to keep the place for the king, and could scarcely be prevailed upon to send a few flagons of wine on board, for the use of the Duchess of Clarence, who had been confined but a few days before, and was suffering severely from sea-sickness. However, he sent a secret apology for his conduct to Warwick, and told him that he was merely acting from a zeal for his service. He assured him that the fortress was ill-supplied with provisions; that he could not depend on the attachment of the soldiers in it; that the place was unable to resist the power of Edward; and that the inhabitants, who lived by commerce with the people of England, would certainly declare in favour of the king. Thus, he urged, by seeming to be attached to the service of that sovereign, he would obtain his confidence, and keep possession of the fortress until it was safe to restore it to its ancient governor. It is difficult to say whether Vaucler was honest in this expression of attachment, or whether he was a traitor to Warwick on one side, and to the king on the other. He certainly possessed more cunning than is usually found in plain, honest men; but the earl accepted his apology, and proceeded with his family and friends to the court of the French king, where he was received with great hospitality and respect.

CHAPTER XXXIX.

CONTINUATION OF THE REIGN OF EDWARD THE FOURTH.—A D. 1470—1472.

CHARLES THE RASH, Duke of Burgundy, was a nominal vassal of the French king; but, in reality, he was nearly, if not quite, as powerful as that sovereign, and altogether independent of him. Charles, by his marriage with Margaret of York, King Edward's sister, had contracted a close alliance with the English king; indeed, so close a one, that the year before Warwick's flight, it was intended they should unite their forces, and make war on France, and that the warlike earl should have the command of the English army.

For this reason the French king was glad to widen the quarrel between Edward and Warwick, and to make a friend of the latter, who was considered a general of great ability. But Louis had a further and a deeper motive: the exiled Queen Margaret and her son were residing at his court, and he wished to reconcile them and Warwick, and induce the latter to adopt the cause of the imprisoned Henry, and drive Edward from the throne.

Louis brought about a meeting between Margaret and the earl, and those two pillars of the opposing factions, who had for so long distracted England, again met face to face. The interview must have been a remarkable one. Each had, for years, regarded the other with the bitterest animosity, for each had inflicted upon the other wrongs which seemed beyond the pale of forgiveness. Warwick had been the chief cause of all the misfortunes of Margaret and her family: he had hurled her husband from a throne, and consigned him to a prison; he had driven Margaret herself into exile, and put to death all her most active friends, either in battle or on the scaffold. On her side, Margaret had, with a feeling of wild triumph, given Warwick's father, the old Earl of Salisbury, over to the hands of the headsman, together with a number of others who were united to him by the bonds of friendship; and he himself had suspected her of a design to assassinate him. A river of blood flowed between them, and reconciliation seemed impossible. But hatred is sometimes as powerful as love: each of them now hated Edward, and they resolved to join their influence in order to be revenged upon him.

It was agreed between them that Warwick should abandon the Yorkist cause, and endeavour to restore the captive Henry to his throne; that Margaret's son, Prince Edward, should marry the Lady Anne, Warwick's second daughter; that during the minority of the prince, the government should be entrusted conjointly to the Earl of Warwick and the Duke of Clarence; and that, if the prince died without leaving a son behind him, Clarence should succeed to the throne, from which King Edward and his children were to be utterly excluded. To show that both parties were thoroughly in earnest, Prince Edward, who was in his seventeenth year, was immediately married to Lady Anne.

The Duke of Clarence was in a singular position. Not only was he allied with Warwick against his brother, whom he had hopes of succeeding as king, but he was also, by this strange reconciliation, engaged in an intrigue to restore the House of Lancaster, and thus not only ruin his brother's prosperity, but extinguish all chance of his ever succeeding him. This was more then he intended; and he was very dissatisfied with his false position. His brother, Edward, suspected the state of his feelings, and sent a lady to him, under pretence of joining the train of his duchess, but, in reality, to persuade him not to become the instrument of Warwick's vengeance, and ruin at once his family and himself. The fair ambassadress was successful, and Clarence promised to desert the cause of his father-in-law, and be reconciled to his brother, as soon as he could do so with safety.

Louis of France prepared a fleet to take Warwick and his followers to England; and Charles, Duke of Burgundy, put to sea with a much larger one, to intercept the earl on his passage. He also sent word to Edward to prepare for the danger that threatened him, and collect an army to drive back Warwick, in case he should escape his vigilance and effect a landing. Edward laughed at these fears, and continued the round of pleasures in which he was almost constantly engaged; saying that he wished for nothing better than to see Warwick land in England, that he might have the pleasure of driving him back into the sea. He was very soon to be punished for this careless and presumptuous confidence.

A sudden storm dispersed the Duke of Burgundy's fleet; and, as soon as the weather was calm again, Warwick started, and, sailing over in safety, landed at Dartmouth on the 13th of September, 1470. He was accompanied by the Duke of Clarence, the Earls of Oxford and Pembroke, and a considerable body of French and English troops. No one was there to oppose him; Edward having gone to the north to put down a sham insurrection, which had been got up by some of Warwick's friends, on purpose to occupy his attention. Such was the popularity of the earl, and such the zeal of the Lancastrians when they heard that he had embraced their cause, that multitudes flocked to his standard every hour; and in a few days he commanded an army of more than 60,000 men. Edward marched southwards to meet him, but his ranks were daily thinned by desertion, and the men he had summoned to assist him did not make their appearance. Warwick's brother, the bold Lord Montague, was in Edward's army, but he would not fight against his own kindred. After having lulled the king's suspicion of him by an appearance of zealous loyalty, he one day caused his soldiers to toss their caps into the air, and cry, "God bless King Harry!" and then led them to join his brother. His example was followed by other nobles and officers; and Edward, alarmed at this wholesale desertion, mounted his horse, and fled with a small retinue of faithful followers to the sea-shore, where they embarked in three vessels that lay ready. Their ships were chased by pirates; and the royal fugitive only saved himself and his party from captivity by running his vessels aground on the coast of Friesland, near the town of Alkmaar, the governor of which place afforded them protection. Edward had no money, and was obliged to give the master of his ship a gown lined with fur in recompense for his services, and to promise to do something more for him another time. Such a sudden reverse of fortune as this, resembles the incidents of a fairy tale or wild romance, rather than the serious events of history. It shows, also, how narrow is the span between prosperity and ruin: the king of to-day may be the fugitive and beggar of to-morrow. Edward afterwards took refuge in the court of his brother-in-law, the Duke of Burgundy, who did not receive him very graciously.

The power of the great Earl of Warwick was now supreme in England; and he entered the City of London in triumph on the 6th of October, 1470. He was accompanied by the Duke of Clarence, who, though very discontented at all that was passing, had not seen any favourable opportunity of deserting him. Going with a great guard to the Tower, Warwick released King Henry, who had been a captive in that fortress for five years. He had sent the mild and feeble monarch to prison, and he now restored him to the throne. This was the second sovereign on whose head Warwick had placed the crown; he had deposed Henry and raised Edward, and then, as his mind changed, he had driven Edward into exile and made Henry a king. His singular gifts of the royalty of England gained for him the distinction of "The King-maker." Edward's queen was also residing in the Tower, which she left on hearing of Warwick's progress, and took refuge in the sanctuary of Westminster. There, on the 4th of November, the first son of Edward IV.—afterwards the unfortunate Edward V.—was born.

Though Henry was in the autumn of life, and fast "falling into the sear and yellow leaf," he was just as incapable of governing a great nation as he was during his youth. Time and adversity had taught him patience and resignation, but they had not given him strength. He knew his want of ability; and while he retained the name of king, he surrendered the power of his exalted office into the hands of Warwick and Clarence. Henry's son, Prince Edward, was declared his successor; and, in the event of his death without children, the crown was to descend to the Duke of Clarence. The Lancastrian nobles were restored to their estates, but only one Yorkist was sent to the scaffold. That was John Tibetot, Earl of Worcester, who, though a man of remarkable learning and talents, had, by his great cruelty, earned for himself the infamous title of "The Butcher!" Other nobles, who adhered to the cause of Edward, fled for sanctuary to religious houses, where they were permitted to remain unmolested. Queen Margaret was still abroad; but, on hearing of the success of Warwick, she prepared to come to England, accompanied by a great number of banished Lancastrians, among whom were the Dukes of Somerset and Exeter, who had been living abroad in such extreme poverty as to be scarcely better off than common beggars.

King Henry did not long enjoy the dignity which had been so unexpectedly restored to him. The Duke of Burgundy, unable to make his peace with Warwick, which he was very willing to do, turned round and assisted the fugitive Edward to regain his crown. He secretly gave him a sum of money and four large vessels, and also engaged for him fourteen well-armed pirate ships. Edward's own followers did not amount to more than 1,200 men; but with this force he sailed to England, and endeavoured to land at the Wash, between Norfolk and Lincolnshire. A Lancastrian army was ready upon the shore to receive him; therefore he prudently sailed away, and, four days afterwards, landed at Ravenspur, in Yorkshire. This was on the 16th of March, 1471, only about five months after his sudden flight. The people in the north regarded him with indifference, and did not rise in his favour. Still he marched on to York, and, on the 17th, demanded admission into that city. The mayor and citizens hesitated: till lately he was their sovereign, but now they owed allegiance to his rival. Upon this, according to some authorities, Edward took an oath before them, that he did not return to England to claim the crown, but only as Duke of York, and that he would make no effort to reinstate himself on the throne. A servant of Edward, who was with him, and wrote a Historie of the Arrival of King Edward IV., says nothing of the oath, but states, that the leaders of his small force set forth, that he was not come to claim the kingdom, but only the inheritance of his father, the Duke of York.

Edward was soon joined by great numbers of people; and he then resolved to march on to London. Near Coventry, he was met by the Earl of Warwick and the Duke of Clarence, with a numerous Lancastrian army. A battle would have taken place; but the treacherous Clarence, suddenly deserting Warwick, went over with his troops to the side of his brother. Warwick was so weakened by this defection in his army, that he retired, fearing that a battle would end in his defeat; and Edward continued his march towards London. If the citizens of the metropolis had been adverse to his cause, and closed their gates against him, he would very likely soon have fallen a victim to his audacity; but they received him, when he entered the city on the 11th of April, with favour, and even with enthusiasm. Strange as this changeable behaviour was, there were several reasons for it: a great number of his followers suddenly issued from sanctuary, and welcomed him as a deliverer; Edward also owed large sums of money to many of the principal merchants, which they would be sure to lose if he were not restored; and the wives and daughters of the citizens had been so delighted with the familiar condescension of their handsome young king, that they persuaded their husbands and fathers to take up his cause. The unhappy King Henry, who was residing at London, fell once more into the hands of his rival, and was sent back again to his old prison, the Tower. An evil destiny was supposed to hang over him; and at last his own followers had begun to fear his presence on the battle-field as auguring misfortune and defeat. An old poet thus alludes to the superstition prevalent upon this subject:—

" For with the worse that side went still away,
Which had King Henry with them when they fought;
Upon his birth so sad a curse there lay,
As that he never prosperéd in aught."

Queen Margaret and her son escaped the fate of the king, as they had not yet arrived in England. While expecting their arrival, Warwick was actively at work strengthening his army; and, in two days after Edward's entry into the metropolis, he also was marching towards the great city. Edward never was deficient in courage, and he led his troops from London to meet the earl. The two armies faced each other on Barnet Common; the forces were nearly equal, each side numbering about 20,000 men. The conflict promised to be a savage one; but the shades of night were rapidly descending, and the battle was deferred until the next day. In the interim, Clarence, moved by the tears of his wife, sent a message to the earl, and offered to act as mediator to reconcile him with his brother. The eyes of the stern earl flashed with contempt and passion as he replied haughtily—" Go, tell your master, that Warwick, true to his oath, is a better man than false perjured Clarence, and will settle this quarrel with the sword to which he has appealed."

The night passed; and when the morning of the 14th of April (Easter Sunday) broke, a thick mist covered the earth, so that it was scarcely possible for men to distinguish their friends from their foes. Edward's cognizance was a sun; and an old chronicler relates, that the prince saw three suns struggling to break through the thick clouds. This he took for a prosperous omen; and it gave him great confidence.

Edward's device of a sun, as a mark by which his followers might recognise each other, certainly proved very fortunate to him; for Warwick had adopted a star with rays darting from it, and the mistiness of the morning rendered it so difficult to distinguish between the two emblems, that the Earl of Oxford and his troops, who fought upon the Lancastrian side, were mistaken for the enemy, attacked by their own friends, and beaten off the field. During the battle, Edward fought with great bravery, and was several times in extreme danger. But this engagement was Warwick's last: the king-maker, after fighting desperately on foot, was slain; and his brother, Lord Montague, shared his fate. The Lancastrians then fell into confusion, and, after a six hours' conflict, were utterly defeated. Edward commanded that no quarter should be given; and a terrible slaughter followed. The dead were buried where they fell; and a chapel was built upon the spot for the good of their souls. The chapel fell to ruins, and was removed more than two centuries and a-half ago; but a comparatively modern stone column still points out the place where the brave, powerful, and changeable Warwick perished. Our great poet, Shakspeare, has finely represented the dying earl exclaiming, as he might have done with great truth:—

"The wrinkles in my brows, now filled with blood,
Were likened oft to kingly sepulchres;
For who lived king but I could dig his grave?
And who durst smile when Warwick bent his brow?"

The very day that Warwick breathed his last, and the Lancastrians were routed at Barnet, Queen Margaret and her son, Prince Edward, landed at Plymouth with a small army, composed chiefly of French, with which she had embarked at Honfleur on the 24th of March; but had been repeatedly driven back by contrary winds. On hearing the sad news, she was seized with despair; her great spirit utterly forsook her, and she fled for sanctuary to the abbey of Beaulieu. It would have been well for this unhappy woman had she taken to her ships, and returned to France; but it seems as if she was destined to drain the cup of sorrow to the dregs, in expiation of the misdeeds of her early life. Several Lancastrian nobles and gentlemen, who had escaped from the slaughter of Barnet, presented themselves at the abbey, and induced her to hazard another struggle for the supremacy of her family. Advancing through the counties of Devon, Somerset, and Gloucester, she was at length opposed by Edward and his army on the banks of the river Severn, near Tewkesbury, where a battle was fought on the 4th of May. Some of her officers were rash, and others timid; contrary orders were given; the men doubted their leaders—as, after so much treachery as had been shown, they had good cause to do; and the result was confusion, slaughter, and defeat. Numbers of her troops were slain; Margaret, with the residue of her army, fled; and Prince Edward, who was now eighteen, was, according to some writers, taken prisoner by the victors.

The royal captive was carried to the tent of King Edward, who sternly inquired of the prince what brought him to England? The noble youth seems to have possessed something of the spirit of his brave grandfather, Henry V., for he replied boldly, "My father's crown and my own inheritance!" The incensed Edward struck the prince a violent blow on the face with his iron gauntlet, and then his brothers, Clarence and Gloucester, plunged their swords into the bosom of the ill-fated youth, and put an end for ever to his career. Some writers deny that Clarence and Gloucester were the murderers, and say that the royal boy was despatched by the king's attendants; whilst King Edward's servant, already alluded to, and Warkworth, a Lancastrian historian, assert that the young prince was slain on the field of battle.—The Duke of Somerset and other Lancastrian gentlemen, took refuge, after the battle, in a church at Towkesbury: Edward violated the sanctuary, had them dragged from the altar's foot, and after a trial before the king's brother, Richard, Duke of Gloucester, constable of England, and the Duke of Norfolk, the marshal, they were beheaded. Margaret, who took refuge in a religious house at Coventry, was soon discovered and taken to the Tower.

One other dark act yet remained, and then the tragedy of the House of Lancaster was complete. That act was soon accomplished; for, on the morning of the 22nd of May, 1471, scarcely three weeks after the battle of Tewkesbury, the poor, despised, ruined King Henry was found dead in his apartment in the Tower. This sudden death might have been a natural one; but, all the circumstances considered, it is not probable that it was so. It was generally supposed that he was murdered; and many whispered reports were circulated as to how the mysterious deed was done—the common belief being that he was stabbed by the king's younger brother, Richard, Duke of Gloucester. His body, surrounded by guards, was shown to the people in St. Paul's by torchlight; but this equivocal action did not diminish the general suspicion. He perished in his fiftieth year, and was buried at Chertsey Abbey. The people entertained such an opinion of his sanctity, that many declared miracles were wrought over his grave. Margaret survived her husband about eleven years, five of which she passed a captive in the Tower: she was then ransomed by Louis XI., and ultimately died in France. She was very far from being a spotless character; but her sorrows were heavier than her sins. It is impossible to read the records of her stormy life without emotions of pity and regret.

CHAPTER XL.

CONCLUSION OF THE REIGN OF EDWARD THE FOURTH.—A.D. 1472—1482.

THE House of Lancaster was destroyed—no direct member of it remained alive; all the great nobles who had adhered to the unhappy cause had perished on the scaffold or the battle-field, and the leafless Red Rose was trampled in the dust. Edward's triumph was complete; he now reigned without a rival, and, at length, his blood-bespattered diadem sat securely upon his head. His infant son was created Prince of Wales; and he had every reason to believe that he was but the first of a long line of kings. He was deceived; treachery and ambition won him the crown; but the treachery and ambition of another member of his family tore that crown from the possession of his offspring.

Three years were spent by Edward in sports and revelry; and this man, who—as, indeed, were most of the great commanders of those days—was so pitiless in war, won greatly upon the affections of his people by his condescension and apparent amiability in peace. He then aroused himself to undertake another ambitious project, which, had it been fulfilled, would have sent thousands more of his fellow-creatures to hurried and blood-stained graves. This project was the revival of the old claim of the English king to the crown of France.

To aid him in enforcing that claim, Edward entered into an alliance with the powerful Duke of Burgundy, who, besides hating the French king, Louis, was very anxious to free his dominions from the burden of homage to that monarch; and they agreed to unite their armies, and invade France together. The English king wrote to Louis, defying him as a usurper, and demanding his crown. After that, he applied to his parliament for the necessary funds for the war which he expected his aggressive conduct must naturally lead to. The parliament recollected the military successes which the English arms had achieved in France during the reigns of Henry V. and his predecessors; and its members, and the nation generally, longed to wipe away the remembrance of the disgraces they had sustained there during the time of the monk-like sovereign, who had so recently been laid in his obscure grave at Chertsey. They therefore acted with great liberality towards their gay and ambitious sovereign, granting him two shillings in the pound upon all the rents in the kingdom. Still this was not sufficient; and Edward raised another large sum by forcing loans or gifts from his wealthy subjects, under the title of benevolences—loans which were seldom repaid. No word less applicable than that of benevolence could have been found to describe sums thus illegally wrung from subjects who surrendered their money through fear alone. Such enforced loans or gifts, instead of being bestowed with any feeling of benevolence, were, in most cases, yielded with suppressed emotions of bitterness, anger, and hatred. Henry III. and Richard II. had previously practised this method of raising supplies; but Edward carried it to an extent never employed before.

Edward spent the greater part of 1473 and 1474 in his preparations for the invasion of France. Having collected an army of 16,000 men, composed chiefly of the stout archers of England, in company with his principal nobility he sailed from Sandwich on the 20th of June, 1475, and landed at Calais. The King of France was averse to war; he was a crafty politician, but no soldier. When Edward's herald entered his presence with a demand for his crown, Louis received that messenger with respectful politeness, and made him some handsome presents: he urged the herald to persuade his master to a pacific accommodation, and promised him a further present of 1,000 crowns when peace should be concluded. That officer suggested to Louis, that he should write to certain English noblemen who had the confidence of Edward, and whom he knew were averse to war.

This advice Louis followed: he sent large bribes to many of the English courtiers, who, as Edward had been disappointed by the Duke of Burgundy, had no great difficulty in persuading him to abandon the enterprise of invasion. After two months passed in negotiation, a truce was entered into. On the 22nd of August, 1475, the two sovereigns had a personal interview upon a bridge across the river Somme, at Picquiny, near Amiens; on which occasion they had so little confidence in each other's sense of honour, that a great wooden barrier was erected between them on the bridge. In the middle of this barrier was a strong iron grating, through which the two kings talked to each other. An old chronicler, who was present, has given a minute account of the meeting: he says—"The king of England advanced along the causeway very nobly attended; there being in his train his brother, the Duke of Clarence, the Earl of Northumberland, Lord Hastings, his chamberlain, his chancellor, and other peers. He was dressed in cloth of gold, and he wore upon his head a black velvet cap, with a large fleur-de-lis made of precious stones. In truth, he was a prince of a most noble, majestic presence; his person graceful and erect, but now a little inclining to fat. When he came within a short distance of the railing, he pulled off his cap, and bowed to within a foot of the ground; and Louis, who was leaning against the barrier on the other side, bowed in the like manner. They embraced through the holes in the grating; and the King of England, making another low bow, the King of France said, 'Cousin, you are right welcome; there is no person living I was so ambitious of seeing, and God be thanked that this interview is upon so good an occasion.'"

After an exchange of insincere compliments, the treaty of Picquiny was concluded. By it Louis agreed immediately to pay Edward 75,000 crowns, on condition that he should withdraw his army from France, and also to give him an annual sum of 50,000 crowns for the sake of peace. To make this peace the more durable, it was also arranged that Louis's eldest son, the Prince Dauphin, should marry Edward's eldest daughter, the Princess Elizabeth; the marriage to take place as soon as the parties were old enough to enter into so serious an obligation. Both the kings solemnly swore to observe these conditions; and to make their oaths the more binding, they took them upon a crucifix, which was said to contain some of the wood of the true cross. This strange treaty was considered disgraceful both by the French and English people: the former thought Louis prudent even to cowardice; and the latter thought that Edward had sold the honour of his nation for money. When this business was concluded, Louis told Edward, in a pleasant way, that he should be right glad to see him come and divert himself with the gay ladies of Paris. Much to his annoyance, the invitation was accepted. "Certes," said he to a confidential attendant, "our brother of England is a very fine king, and a warm admirer of the ladies; he might chance to find some dame at Paris so much to his taste as to tempt him to return; his predecessors have been too often in Paris and Normandy already, and I have no great affection for his company on this side of the Channel, though ready to hold him as friend and brother on the other side of the water."

A serious difference between Edward and one of his brothers soon after arose. He had, for some time, entertained a jealousy of his brother Clarence; and he was not able to forget that the duke had once been leagued with Warwick, the king-maker, to exclude him and his children from the throne. Clarence was justly regarded as a fickle and dangerous man; few people were attached to him; and he had many secret enemies at the court, amongst whom were the queen and his crafty, talented, and ambitious brother, the Duke of Gloucester. Clarence seems to have been as unamiable as he was unprincipled and capricious; and vices of this character are sure to bring down their proper punishment upon those who possess them. The duke's punishment was as unnatural—for it came from the hand of his brother—as it was severe and disproportionate to his offence.

In the year 1476, Clarence lost his wife Isabella, the daughter of the Earl of Warwick. It was suspected that she was poisoned; and one of her female attendants was tried and executed for the supposed crime. Clarence did not greatly regret the unfortunate duchess, and very soon afterwards proposed to marry again. Probably he would have done so, but for the jealous interference of King Edward, who strongly objected to it. Clarence was enraged, spoke very bitterly upon the subject, and completely estranged himself from his brother: then the long-concealed animosity of the court displayed itself without restraint.

The ruin of Clarence being determined upon, the court began by attacking his friends. His enemies calculated, that if he endured injuries of that character with patience, he would soon be despised by the people for cowardice; and if he resented them, his temper would lead him into actions which could be twisted into bearing a treasonable appearance. There was a dependent of the duke's named Thomas Burdett, to whom he was much attached. King Edward, while hunting one day in the park belonging to this gentleman, killed a beautiful white buck, which was a great favourite with its owner. Burdett, on hearing of the loss, broke into a fit of passion, and wished the horns of the deer in the belly of the person who advised the king to commit that injury upon him. At the worst, this was but a rude speech, very natural in an irritable man, and one which would have been passed by without any notice if spoken by another person. But the unfortunate gentleman was a friend of the duke's, and these few words sealed his doom. He was tried for treasonable language; a judge and jury were found mean, slavish, and wicked enough to condemn him; and Thomas Burdett was, in consequence, beheaded at Tyburn as a traitor. This was not all: one John Stacy, a priest in the service of Clarence, and a man whose knowledge of mathematics and astronomy exposed him to the vulgar imputation of being a magician, was accused of having attempted to destroy the life of a certain nobleman by charms and sorcery. The very nature of the charge proves his innocence; but the wretched man was racked into a confession of what was impossible; and although he afterwards vehemently protested his guiltlessness, he was condemned and executed.

The Duke of Clarence was both alarmed and incensed at these wanton atrocities.* He feared they were omens of his own approaching downfall, and he knew not how to act. Wisdom would have dictated silence and retirement until the storm of angry feeling which raged against him had blown over. Clarence had far less wisdom than impetuosity, and he presented himself before the council, and vehemently declared that his dependents had met an unjust doom. King Edward, who was present, pronounced this to be a gross interference with the execution of justice, and instantly committed his brother to the Tower.

For some time Clarence remained a prisoner. On the 16th of January, 1478, a parliament was assembled: to the bar of that parliament the captive duke was summoned, and King Edward himself became the public accuser of his own brother. The heartless sovereign charged him with treason, and also accused him of having dealt with the devil by means of conjurors and necromancers; of plotting to dethrone the king and disinherit his children; of encouraging his servants to declare that Thomas Burdett and John Stacy had been illegally executed; of circulating rumours that the king himself was guilty of sorcery and secret poisoning; and that he was illegitimate, and therefore possessed no right to the throne; of causing many of the king's subjects to be sworn to be true to him and his heirs; and with having ordered his servants to keep themselves ready to take up arms for him and his rights at an hour's notice. The duke declared his innocence of all these charges, and vehemently defended himself; but his defence was of little service when addressed to peers who had, there is little doubt, resolved on his condemnation; as they would sooner shed his blood, than run the risk of encountering a frown from their king. On the 7th of February, Clarence was found guilty of treason, and received sentence of death.

Edward was averse to the public execution of his brother, but he was resolved that he should perish. It is said that he offered him the choice of the means by which he should die; that the duke desired to be drowned in a butt of Malmsey wine, and that this singular desire was accordingly executed. So whimsical an incident has a doubtful appearance; but there is no evidence to disprove it. Our great poet Shakspeare represents the duke as being first assassinated by ruffians and then hurled into the wine-butt—an account which is probably the correct one. At any rate, soon after the condemnation of Clarence, it was reported that he had died suddenly in the Tower; and the general belief was that he had been murdered. There is a tradition, that one cause of the unjust prosecution and death of Clarence, whose name was George, was in consequence of a prophecy, then current, which declared that the king's son should be murdered by some one, the initial letter of whose name was G. It is most likely that this prophecy, as it is called, was invented long afterwards, when it was fulfilled by the murder of Edward's children by their uncle, the Duke of Gloucester.—The Duke of Clarence left two children, a boy and a girl, who both of them ultimately perished on the scaffold, after the accession of the Tudors, only because they had the misfortune to be connected with the royal family of York! Truly, much of the history of our country is written, not with ink, but with blood. In the savage and turbulent time at which we have now arrived, princes lived continually within the shadow of the scaffold.

During the latter part of Edward's reign, his tranquillity was disturbed by a war with Scotland. There had been, after the death of the Duchess of Clarence, negotiations between the two courts, in which James III., of Scotland, proposed two matrimonial alliances to strengthen the bonds of unity: one between the Princess Margaret of Scotland and the Duke of Clarence; the other between his brother, the Duke of Albany, and Edward's sister, Dowager-Duchess of Burgundy. The intrigues of France caused an interruption to the good understanding with England; and finally, Louis—who had no wish to carry out the provision of the treaty of Picquiny, by which the dauphin was to marry the Princess Elizabeth—instigated James to break the truce, and invade the border. This he did in 1481, when the Earl of Angus, with a small army, crossed the borders, burnt Bamborough, ravaged Northumberland during three days, and then returned to Scotland with a great amount of plunder and many prisoners. To retaliate upon the Scots, the Duke of Gloucester and a small army were sent into their country; and, although the English failed in an attack upon Berwick, they devastated the finest districts of the south.

Affairs were in this condition when the Scottish king's brother, the Duke of Albany, laid claim to the throne, and solicited Edward's assistance to place him upon it. If Edward would grant him the use of an English army, he, in return, offered to surrender the rich town of Berwick, together with the castle of Lochmaben, and the lands of Liddesdale, Eskdale, and Annandale; acknowledge himself the vassal of England, and give up his connection with the French king. Edward consented, and a treaty to this effect was entered into between him and the Scottish traitor, during the month of June, 1482, at Fotheringay.

In consequence of this treaty, the Duke of Gloucester led 20,000 men into Scotland, and joined the Duke of Albany. Having taken Berwick, they advanced upon Edinburgh. The reason they were able to do so without opposition was in consequence of another conspiracy against the unfortunate King of Scotland. That monarch had summoned his nobles to his assistance, and they attended with a singular readiness. They did so, however, for no patriotic purpose, but from a selfish motive. James III. was a man with tastes unsuited for a sovereign who had to rule over so warlike and turbulent a race of people as the Scots then were. He preferred literature and the arts to war; and the society of men of letters, artists, and musicians, to that of his haughty and warlike, but chiefly illiterate, nobles. He was surrounded by the former class of men; and even skilful artisans were admitted to his presence and shared his smiles. His chief favourite was an architect, of the name of Cochrane, upon whom he bestowed the earldom of Mar. This man was intoxicated with his good fortune, and behaved with haughtiness and even insolence to the old nobility, who, in return, treated him as a vulgar upstart. His ostentation also excited their envy and hatred: he rode about attended by a body-guard of 300 persons, dressed in gorgeous uniforms, and armed with light battle-axes. His helmet of polished steel, richly inlaid with gold, was borne before him, in the same manner as the regal diadem is carried before a crowned prince. When not armed for the battle-field, his usual costume was a riding-suit of black velvet; while a massive gold chain hung around his neck, and a hunting-horn, studded with jewels, was slung across his shoulder.

The object of the Scottish nobles was to revenge themselves upon Cochrane and the other royal favourites, and then to seize the person of their king. They were encamped at Lauder; and there they held a secret meeting in the church, to decide upon the manner in which they should accomplish their sinister purposes. They determined to wreak their vengeance upon Cochrane; but he was always so numerously attended, that it would be a difficult matter to proceed against him. Lord Grey, one of those noble conspirators, related to his associates the fable of the mice, who decided that the best way to escape from the claws of the cat would be to tie a bell round the neck of the animal, the ringing of which would give notice of its approach. The mice declared the proposition to be admirable; but there was one difficulty—who was to fasten the bell round the neck of the cat? None of them were brave enough to undertake this dangerous task, and the scheme consequently fell to the ground. The Earl of Angus, stepping forward, exclaimed, "If that is all, I will bell the cat!" This speech, and the savage act which soon followed it, gained for that noble the popular surname of Archibald Bell-the-Cat. While this debate was going on, Cochrane himself entered the church: he had heard of the meeting, and, supposing it to be a council of war, came to join it. The Earl of Angus was as good as his word; he was the first to raise his hand against the favourite. Snatching from Cochrane the gold collar which he wore around his neck, he exclaimed, "This is not fit for thee to wear; a rope would suit thee better!" Other insults followed, and the savage nobles then bound the favourite, and dragged him away to the bridge of Lauder to be hanged. When Cochrane saw that his fate was certain, he, with a contemptible ostentation, almost incredible in a man in such a position, implored to be hanged with a silken cord; and told his assassins that they would find one among the hangings of his tent. This singular request was denied, and he was hanged with a rope made of horse-hair, which was considered a more than usually degrading mode of execution. His murder was followed by that of several other of the king's favourites, whose only crime appears to have been, that, being men of humble extraction, they had contrived to win the smiles of their sovereign.

King James was then carried by his nobles as a prisoner to Edinburgh Castle, the royal army disbanded, and the Duke of Gloucester and the traitor Albany were on the eve of accomplishing their purpose. However, when the design of Albany and his English compeer began to be understood by the Scottish nobles, they trembled for the independence of their country. They then collected an army in earnest, and eventually a treaty was entered into, by which it was arranged that the Duke of Albany should lay down his arms, and become a true and faithful subject to his brother, and that he and all his followers should receive the royal pardon for their past treason. The king was then restored to liberty; and the Duke of Gloucester, finding that peace reigned again among the Scots themselves, thought it prudent to retire with his army to England. King Edward was conciliated by a present of the town and castle of Berwick; and thus this quarrel between England and Scotland, which had promised a long and savage war, ended in nothing, except that the English had acquired that town. It is probable that the contest would have been renewed, but the career of Edward was now drawing to a close.

Recollecting the indirect way in which he obtained the English crown, Edward was anxious to strengthen the position of his offspring by marrying his children into the great royal families of Europe. Each one of his five daughters was contracted to a foreign prince, an heir to royalty; but such is the uncertainty of human intentions, that none of these marriages ever took place. By the treaty of Picquiny it was arranged that the Prince Dauphin, the eldest son of Louis of France, was to marry the Princess Elizabeth, the eldest daughter of King Edward. This was the alliance upon which the latter sovereign had most set his heart, and it was now time that it should be carried into effect. Louis, however, had no intention that such an event should ever take place: he had consented to it to win the favour of Edward and avert a war with England; but he hated the English king, and he no longer feared a war. It was more to his interest to marry his son to the daughter of Maximilian, the Duke of Austria; and although the young lady was but three years old, she was contracted to the French prince.

When this news reached the ears of King Edward he felt himself tricked and insulted, and he was seized with a fit of the most violent passion. He swore that he would punish the old traitor, and carry such a war into France as should exceed all the horrors ever felt by that country. He began to collect troops to carry this fierce intention into practice, but his preparations were interrupted by severe illness. He was but in the flower of manhood; but his constitution had been ruined by dissipation. The progress of his disorder was rapid, and, in a few weeks after his first attack, he breathed his last. He died on the 9th of April, 1483, in the forty-second year of his age, and the twenty-second of his reign. Although his life had been chiefly passed amidst scenes of bloodshed and treachery, he became very devout at last, and even ordered that all persons from whom he had unjustly extorted money should be repaid out of the royal treasury. Notwithstanding his magnificence and luxury he died poor, and his desire was never fulfilled by his successor; indeed, his extortions had been so numerous that its perfect execution was impossible. He was buried in the new chapel at Windsor.

Edward was gifted with considerable talents; but he was a cold-hearted, merciless man. He never forgave an enemy, and his revenge was bitter and deadly: he was brave in war, and not without military skill; but his bravery and skill were far surpassed by his cruelty. His throne was built upon the bones of his people, and cemented with the blood of his nobles. His iron heel crushed the Lancastrian party into the dust; and many of its adherents who escaped the sword upon the field of battle, were consigned by him to the axe of the headsman. During the early part of his reign, he was treacherous, extortionate, and arbitrary; but, as opposition disappeared, and he felt himself firmly seated in the regal chair, he relaxed into a pleasure-loving, indolent, and seemingly amiable man. When pleased, his manners were affable and attractive, and his condescension and openness won the attachment of all he conversed with. He was considered the handsomest man of his age; but during the latter part of his life he got exceedingly corpulent. A curious anecdote is related about his good looks and graceful manners. On some occasions, he appealed personally to his wealthy subjects for money, under the title of benevolences. An elderly widow, to whom he had applied in this manner, was so charmed with his appearance, that she told him he should have £20 for the sake of his handsome face. Pleased with the compliment, the king kissed the old lady, upon which she doubled her donation. Besides his five daughters, Edward left two sons —Edward, Prince of Wales, his successor, then in his thirteenth year; and Richard, Duke of York, in his ninth.

During the reign of Edward IV. an event occurred which will ever be remembered with grateful joy by all reflecting minds—an event which, though scarcely noticed at the time, amid the subsiding roar of political contention and civil war, was eventually to change the face of society, and to elevate the character of our race. That event was the introduction of THE ART OF PRINTING into England.

Printing was not invented in England; and it is difficult to say exactly where it was invented, or to whose talents we owe that wonderful and creative art. As the Grecian cities contended for the honour of having given birth to Homer, so do those of Germany for that of being the birthplace of the inventor of printing; and with reason, for that glorious art is worth all the epic poems that ever were written. Indeed, it is itself a noble poetical fact, that the wise thoughts which great men write in solitude to exalt the virtue or add to the comforts of their fellow-creatures, should be multiplied by the natural magic of that winged machine, the printing-press, a thousand thousand times, and read at the same moment by the inhabitants of different continents, between whom roll almost measureless tracts of ocean.

It is said that the first idea of this surprising art, so simple in itself, but so sublime in its results, came from the East, and that the Chinese practised a rude kind of printing as early as the year 930. But it consisted merely in obtaining impressions from letters carved on wooden blocks, and bore scarcely any resemblance to the mode first practised in Europe during the fifteenth century. Printing, as now used, seems to be a German invention; though the town of Haarlem, in Holland, as well as those of Mentz and Strasburg, in Germany, lay claim to have been the birthplace of its originator. The people of Haarlem say, that, before the year 1441, one of their citizens, named Lawrence Coster, invented the art, and brought it to perfection by using cast-metal types; and that one of his servants robbed him of his materials and his secret, and having escaped to Mentz, there assumed the merit of the invention, and revealed it to John Guttenberg. This account is not certain, and some writers state it to be a fiction. However that may be, to Guttenberg is generally ascribed the merit of being the inventor of the art of printing. In 1443, he, together with John Fust, or Faust, a rich citizen of Mentz, and Peter Schœffer, a poor scholar, first put it into practice. Guttenberg invented the mode of printing with letters or type carved out of wood. This was a troublesome and expensive process, and Schœffer had the ingenuity to devise the means of casting type in a mould. Fust, or Faust, was so delighted with this improvement, that he gave the scholar his daughter for a wife. Like most of the benefactors of the world, Guttenberg met with ingratitude. He was persecuted by the priests, who suspected him of magic, and by those who had hitherto lived by copying books, because they trembled for their trade. For some reason, with which we are unacquainted, his own partners turned against him; he was deprived of his property by litigation, and compelled to abandon his native city. After many years of exile he returned to Mentz, and died there in 1468. Posterity has done him that justice which was denied by his contemporaries. During the present century, a magnificent statue, by the sculptor Thorwaldsen, has been erected at Mentz, in honour of his memory.—The connection of Guttenberg, as well as Schœffer and Faust, with Mentz, and not with Strasburg, is well established: but the people of the latter city declare that the art was first practised there, and not at Mentz.

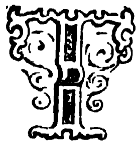
Thirty years after printing had been in use in Germany, it was brought into England by William Caxton. A few biographical facts respecting a man who rendered so vast a service to his country, will be interesting to the reader. Not that he was a man of gigantic powers of mind or dazzling talents; for those he certainly did not possess; but because good fortune, added to a sound judgment and remarkable industry, enabled him to render an incalculable and imperishable service to his country.

Caxton was born in the Weald of Kent, about the year 1412; and, after receiving the usual scanty education bestowed upon lads in that distracted and unlettered time, was apprenticed to an eminent mercer, named Robert Large. He won the confidence of his master, who, at his death, left him a legacy of thirty-four marks—a considerable sum at that period. His sobriety and intelligence induced the Mercers' Company to appoint him as their agent in Holland, Zealand, and Brabant; and he passed twenty-three years of his life in this responsible employment. During that time he rose to some distinction; for in the year 1464, he was joined in a commission with a person named Robert Whetehill, to arrange a treaty of commerce between King Edward and the Duke of Burgundy. Shortly afterwards, the Princess Margaret of York, Edward's sister, was married to the duke, and Caxton received some appointment in the household. While in her service he translated a French book, called the History of Troy, for which the duchess handsomely rewarded him, though she blamed him for his inaccurate English, and undertook to correct it for him. Caxton excused himself for not writing his native language with precision because he had been so long abroad. In the introduction to this work, he says, that at the time of finishing it, his eyes "were dimmed with over-much looking on the white paper; that his courage was not so prone and ready to labour as it had been; and that age was creeping on him daily, and enfeebling all his body. That he had practised and learnt, at his great charge and expense, to ordain this said book in print, after the manner and form as we there see it; and that it was not written with pen and ink as other books be."

Very little is known of Caxton; his biography is rather a skeleton than a living portrait; the dry bones are there, but not the form and roundness of the limbs, with the glow of life and vital fire of thought. Even the period at which he returned to his native country cannot be ascertained with any certainty; but it is supposed that he came back in 1474, and brought with him the art of printing. How he became acquainted with it is also a mystery, for it was carried on in secret, and guarded with a rigid jealousy. But we know that he did learn the secret, that he did bring it home with him, and that he set up a printing-press in the Almonry, near Westminster Abbey. During the remainder of his life he continued translating foreign works into English, and printing them with great rapidity. His death is supposed to have occurred in the year 1491 or 1492.—Peace be to the ashes, and honour to the memory, of that worthy old citizen



CHAPTER XLI.

THE REIGN OF EDWARD THE FIFTH.—A.D. 1483.

HE jealousy which many of the old nobility bore to the queen of Edward IV. and her relations had never been forgotten; and feelings of opposition were entertained on each side. On his death-bed the late king had summoned the leaders of both parties to his presence, and implored them to be reconciled, and to unite their efforts to sustain the government, and promote the prosperity of his son. The promise was readily given; but after the death of the king it was just as readily broken; and these feuds, as Edward had feared, led to the ruin of his family.

Edward V., though ranked among the kings of England, was not, strictly speaking, one of its sovereigns, because he never went through the ceremony of coronation, or possessed a vestige of the royal power. This unfortunate young prince, who was only twelve years and a-half old at the time of his father's death, retained the shadow of royalty for scarcely three months, and was then set aside by his ambitious and treacherous uncle, Richard, Duke of Gloucester. It may rather be said that the crown hovered over the head of young Edward than that he wore it; and happier would it have been for him had he been the son of a citizen, and not the heir of a monarch.

At the time of Edward's death the young prince was residing with his uncle, Earl Rivers, at Ludlow Castle, and the Duke of Gloucester was, with his army, still in the marches of Scotland. The duke was a wicked, designing, ambitious man, possessed of great talents, but crafty and cruel, and one who feared neither God nor man. He had all the vices of his family, with some additional ones of his own. Yet he concealed them beneath a grave, quiet deportment, and made great pretences to morality and religion. From the moment that he heard of the death of his brother, he cast his eyes upon the crown, and resolved that no obstacle which could be subdued by craft or violence should keep it from him. His design was not only difficult, but seemed to be impossible, for four lives stood between the throne and him—the two sons of the late king, and the son and daughter of the murdered Duke of Clarence. But Richard was not a man to be deterred by obstacles such as these.

At first, however, he proceeded with great caution, and with his customary duplicity. On receiving the news of his brother's death, he rode to York, accompanied by 600 knights and esquires in mourning, where he induced all the nobles and gentry to swear fealty to his nephew, Edward V. He also wrote a letter to the widowed queen, assuring her of his affection to herself, and his loyalty to her son. The motherly anxiety of Elizabeth made her, notwithstanding, take every precaution for the safety of the young king; and she wrote to her brother, Earl Rivers, to bring him up to London with an escort of 2,000 horse soldiers. This measure was vehemently opposed by those members of the council who disliked the queen: the chief among them being the Duke of Buckingham and Lord Hastings. They feared that such a force would give too much authority to their rivals, and said that it would probably lead to a renewal of the civil war. Lord Hastings threatened to leave the council, and depart to his government at Calais; other noblemen were equally violent. The Duke of Gloucester was applied to; and as he represented that an armed force might create a spirit of distrust and promote disturbances, the queen-mother was reluctantly compelled to abandon her intention. She then sent another message to her brother, desiring him to bring the young king to London with no further retinue than was necessary for the support of his dignity. So attended, Edward, with his uncle, Earl Rivers, his half-brother, Sir Richard Grey, and Sir Thomas Vaughan, left Ludlow on the 24th of April.

Gloucester rode with his followers from York to Northampton, where he waited for the arrival of his nephew, with the assumed intention of himself following him to London. Earl Rivers, however, to prevent confusion by the meeting of the two trains, sent the young king on by another road through Stoney-Stratford, a town about ten miles distant, and nearer the metropolis. Still, to prevent any misunderstanding, the earl, accompanied by Lord Grey, rode back and apologised to the Duke of Gloucester. He received them with great politeness, and insisted that both of them should sup with him. They consented to do so, and, shortly afterwards, the party received an addition in the person the Duke of Buckingham, who arrived at Northam attended by 300 armed horsemen. The nobles the evening of the 29th of April together in a manner: Gloucester was all smiles, wit, and for that subtle man had a singular charm the tion whenever he pleased to exert it: li terrible creation of fiction, he could innocent flower, and be the serpent under it." That night he had a serpent's part to act; for long after Earl Rivers and Lord Grey, the brother and son of the queen-mother, had retired unsuspectingly to rest, he sat up with his accomplice, Buckingham, plotting their destruction.

The next morning the whole party set out to join the young king at Stoney-Stratford; Gloucester and Buckingham riding side by side with Rivers and Grey, and wearing false smiles upon their crafty faces. The instant they entered the town, and the young king was within their power, they changed their manner; and Gloucester abruptly charging Rivers and Grey with estranging the affections of his nephew, caused them, together with Sir Thomas Vaughan and Sir Richard Hawse, to be arrested and sent in custody to Pontefract Castle. Gloucester, after this unjust and treacherous act, presented himself before his nephew with every demonstration of respect and affection, and tried to satisfy him about the arrest of his uncle and half-brother. Although much grieved, the young king was helpless, and could not resist, especially as Gloucester had discharged all his other attendants; indeed, from this hour until that of his death, the unhappy prince was in reality a prisoner in the hands of his subtle uncle.

When the queen-mother received news of these strange proceedings, she fled in great alarm to the sanctuary at Westminster, taking her second son, the little Duke of York, and her five daughters, with her. She was filled with alarm for her family, and with suspicion of Gloucester and his associates. The Archbishop of York went to comfort and advise her; and he delivered a kindly letter from Lord Hastings. Elizabeth had not forgotten the recent quarrel she had with that nobleman, and she bitterly exclaimed—"A woe worth him, for he is one of them that goeth about to destroy me and my blood!" The perplexed archbishop, who knew not what to do, and who shared too much in the fears of the queen to be able to allay them, rather strangely answered, "Madam, be of good cheer; for I promise you that if they crown any other king than your son, whom they have now with them, we shall, on the morrow, crown his brother, whom you have here with you."

But though Elizabeth and her party were alarmed at the arrest of Earl Rivers and the others, the people generally were greatly pleased at it; and Gloucester was received with loud acclamations when he entered the city of London with the young king. Indeed, many of the most worthy and wealthy citizens looked up to him as the only man who was able, by his counsels, to preserve the tranquillity of the kingdom. When he and the young king approached, the mayor, the sheriffs and the aldermen, arrayed in scarlet, together with 500 other citizens, dressed in violet, and all of them mounted on horseback, rode forth to meet them. They entered London on the 4th of May. Edward was conducted to the Tower, as the place where he would be the safest; and the 22nd of June was fixed for his coronation. The Tower was not, as it afterwards became, a fortress and prison only; at that time it was also used as a royal palace.

A great council was assembled; and as the king was not of age, it was necessary to appoint a regent or guardian to carry on the business of the government. Everything seemed to point to the able Duke of Gloucester as the fittest person to fulfil this office, and he was accordingly chosen protector of the kingdom. His activity in this position was remarkable; and he attended to business from early till late. For some reason the council was divided, and the greater part met at Richard's house, in Crosby Place, while the others assembled at the Tower; amongst the latter was the accomplished, but bitter-minded Lord Hastings. Richard was very desirous to win this nobleman over to assist him in his design upon the crown; and he set a lawyer, named Catesby, to sound him on the subject. Though Hastings disliked the queen, and triumphed in the arrest of Earl Rivers and Lord Grey, yet he was true to the children of the late king, with whom he had lived on terms of friendly confidence. Finding that he could not win the powerful Hastings to his purpose, Richard instantly resolved upon his ruin, which he soon accomplished in the following startling and romantic way.

On the 13th of June, the protector, as Gloucester was now called, unexpectedly entered the chamber in the Tower, where Hastings and the minority of the council were sitting, and took his seat amongst them. He was such a master of deceit that he could conceal the most murderous design under a smiling face and an appearance of gaiety. On the present occasion he was not only cheerful but merry; and, after talking mirthfully with the grave men assembled there, he turned to the venerable Bishop of Ely, and exclaimed, "My lord, you have very good strawberries in your garden in Holborn; I request you let us have a mess of them." "Very gladly, my lord," answered the bishop; "would to God I had some better thing as ready to your pleasure as that!" The strawberries were sent for, and the protector, excusing himself for awhile, left the chamber, still apparently in the cheerful state of mind in which he entered it.

After an hour or so he returned with a clouded and anxious face, and sat down frowning and biting his lips. Suddenly he asked what those persons deserved who had been plotting against his life? The council was astonished; but, after a momentary pause, Lord

Hastings replied, that they deserved to be put to death as traitors.

"Those traitors," answered the protector, "are that sorceress, my brother's wife, and Jane Shore, his mistress, with others their associates; see how they have wasted my body by their incantations and witchcraft!" As he said this, the cunning duke bared his left arm to the elbow, and showed it all shrunk and withered. This was not the result of witchcraft, as he impudently pretended, but a natural imperfection with which he had been always afflicted, as his auditors very well knew. Every one was aware that this strange accusation was merely an excuse for some quarrel, and the members of the council scarcely knew what to say.

Hastings again broke the silence, and said, doubtingly, "Certainly, my lord, if they have so heinously done, they be worthy heinous punishment."—"What!" cried the protector in a furious passion, "do you reply to me with your ifs and your ands! I tell thee that they have done so; and that I will make good upon thy body, traitor!" Then striking the table with his fist, the chamber was instantly filled with armed men. All was consternation, and the duke, raising his voice and fixing his keen glance on the astonished Hastings, continued—"I arrest thee, traitor!" "What, me, my lord?" exclaimed that nobleman, who believed himself to stand high in the estimation of Gloucester. "Yes, thee, traitor!" was the answer; and Hastings was instantly seized by the guards. "Away with him!" said Gloucester; "for, by St. Paul, I will not to dinner until I see his head off!"

The unfortunate nobleman was dragged into the Tower Green, and instantly beheaded on a log of wood which chanced to lay there. During the confusion which ensued when the guards first rushed into the chamber, one of them, as if by mistake, aimed a blow at Lord Stanley with a battle-axe, which would have killed him instantly had he not shrunk from it and fallen beneath the table. Quick as he was, however, he was slightly wounded. It was not struck in error; Stanley was suspected by the Duke of Gloucester of being no friend to him, and he therefore would willingly have had him despatched. But Stanley was a cunning man, and he contrived afterwards even to deceive the acute Gloucester, and obtain his confidence; but, for the present, he, together with the Bishop of Ely and the Archbishop of York, was arrested and confined in a dungeon in the Tower.

Ten days after Lord Hastings had been thus shamefully and illegally executed, another tragedy took place at Pontefract Castle. Lord Rivers, the queen's brother, Lord Grey, her son, Sir Thomas Vaughan and Sir Richard Hawse, favourite attendants of the young king, were taken from confinement and publicly beheaded; or, to speak more justly, murdered in the broad light of day. Gloucester had accused them of plotting to effect his death; but he knew his accusation to be so infamous and unfounded, that he did not even dare to bring them to trial. Unheard and uncondemned, these unfortunate men were sent to ignominious, blood-stained graves, because the ambitious duke knew them to be loyal to their young sovereign. This execution was conducted by a villanous partisan of Gloucester's, Sir Richard Ratcliffe, a man whom a writer living near that period described as being "short and rude in speech, and as far from pity as from all fear of God."

To give a colour to his accusation of Hastings, Gloucester ordered the goods of Jane Shore to be seized, and she herself to be summoned before the council to answer a charge of sorcery and witchcraft. Jane Shore was a beautiful, intelligent, and amiable, though erring woman. She had been married, while very young, to a wealthy citizen, whom she accepted from no feeling of love, but to gratify the wishes of her parents. Unhappily for her peace and good name, she attracted the notice of the wanton King Edward. He was struck with her grace and accomplishments, and she was dazzled by the attentions of the handsome monarch; the result was, that she deserted the home of her husband to become the mistress of her king. Conduct like this admits of no apology; but still, Jane was liked and respected in spite of her sinful connection. She was loved by the king, and employed her influence to soften his fierce temper, and induced him to pardon many whom he had resolved to punish. She was ever ready to protect the oppressed and to relieve the poor; and her benevolence and generosity won for her the attachment of the people. She had one great fault and many virtues; and might be compared to a lovely garden, full of rare flowers, rich fruit, and grateful fountains, but in the midst of which stood the death-distilling poison-tree of the desert.

The unscrupulous members who formed Gloucester's council did not require much evidence on which to condemn an accused person to severe punishment, or even to death; but they could find no evidence at all against Jane Shore, and they were just enough to say so. The protector was, however, determined to punish her, and he directed the Bishop of London to make her do penance for her immoral life. Jane was therefore compelled to walk barefooted through the city, wrapped in a white sheet, and carrying a lighted taper to denote her shame.

Gloucester's object in this cruelty was to parade his own pretended morality, and drag to light the vices of his buried brother, whom it suited his dark schemes to calumniate and revile. All Jane's property had been seized by the hypocritical protector; and there is an old story, that he caused her to be thrust out into the streets, and forbade any one, on pain of death, to relieve her wants, until at length she died in a ditch in the suburbs of the city, from hunger and sickness; hence, we are told by some writers, arose the name of that part of the east of London we now call Shoreditch. This is a traditional error. Stow, writing about 1596 or 1598, says, "Soersditch was so called more than 400 years ago, as I can prove by record." Jane Shore attained a great age; being alive in the reign of Henry VIII., when Sir Thomas More mentioned her in terms of high commendation. It is not known when or where she died.

The protector desired to get the young Duke of York, as well as his royal brother, into his power; and he represented to the council that the queen's fears were an insult to him, and it was necessary the young prince should attend the ceremony of his brother's coronation. He even proposed to take the prince from his mother by force, if she would not yield him without it; and he argued, that, by doing so, he should not be violating the sanctuary of the church, as this ecclesiastical privilege was only intended to give protection to unhappy men persecuted for their debts or crimes, and was entirely useless to the young prince, who did not lie under the burden of either.

Cardinal Bourchier, the Archbishop of Canterbury, and the Archbishop of York, were shocked at this reasoning, and would not permit the sanctuary to be profaned; but they undertook to persuade the queen to deliver the young prince to them. After great hesitation, on the 16th of June she entrusted her child to their charge. She never beheld him again; and, at the moment of parting, a presentiment seemed to strike her that this would be the case. Tenderly embracing him, she burst into a passionate fit of tears, and bade him farewell for ever. The prelates were affected by the scene, but they did not share her fears; for they were good men, and quite ignorant of the murderous designs of Richard.

The Duke of York was lodged in the Tower with his brother, and then their crafty uncle played another scene in the dark tragedy he had in hand. He spread reports among the people that his nephews were illegitimate, and could not therefore legally succeed to the crown: he said that, before his late brother's marriage with Elizabeth Grey, the queen-mother, he had been privately married to another lady, Eleanor Talbot, a daughter of the Earl of Shrewsbury; in consequence, the second marriage was void, and the children not honourably born in wedlock.

This reported marriage of the late king with the Lady Eleanor Talbot was never proved, and was probably an idle invention, arising from some familiarity between them. But Gloucester went so far as to engage a popular preacher, named Dr. Shaw, to declare in a sermon, which he delivered at St. Paul's Cross on the 22nd of June, that this was the case, and that, as the children of the Duke of Clarence were excluded from the throne on account of their father's treason, the Duke of Gloucester was the only true heir of royalty remaining. The political preacher took for his text the following verse from the wisdom of Solomon:—"The multiplying brood of the ungodly shall not thrive, nor take deep rooting from bastard slips." Dr. Shaw, who was a bold, dishonest man, not only declared that the royal princes were illegitimate, but that their father, the late king, himself was so. The mother of that monarch was yet living, and known to be a princess of irreproachable character; but no calumny was too monstrous for this venal preacher. Having heaped all the odium he could upon the members of the royal family, the Duke of Gloucester excepted, he exclaimed, "Behold this excellent prince, the express image of his noble father, the genuine descendant of the House of York; bearing no less in the virtues of his mind, than in the features of his countenance, the character of the gallant Richard, once your hero and favourite; he alone is entitled to your allegiance: he must deliver you from the dominion of all intruders; he alone can restore the lost glory and honour of the nation."

It had been previously arranged between the duke and the preacher, that as the latter spoke these words, Gloucester should appear among the crowd, who it was expected would raise a shout of "Long live King Richard!" But the duke did not arrive in time; the preacher had to repeat that part of his discourse, and then the words fell tamely upon the ears of the people. Instead of the expected shout of enthusiasm, there was a perplexed silence; the citizens were amazed, and some were disgusted; and the baffled duke, pretending to be angry at what Dr. Shaw had said, rode away.

Richard, though bitterly disappointed, was not discouraged, and he employed another agent to effect his purpose. He wanted a recognition by the people of his pretended claim to the crown; and if this were given by ever so small a minority of them, he was prepared to construe it as a willing act of the whole nation. His fellow-conspirator, the Duke of Buckingham, who possessed some talent as an orator, on the 24th of June addressed the citizens at Guildhall upon Gloucester's title to the throne. He described the duke as a wise, religious prince, declared the children of the late King Edward to be illegitimate, and asked the assembled multitude, if they would not have Richard for their sovereign? Again was it expected that they would cry "God save King Richard!" but again this expectation was disappointed, and the citizens gazed at each other in silent wonder. Many of them were inclined to favour Gloucester; but they were not prepared to desert their young king, and they wanted time to consider the matter.

Buckingham turned to the Lord Mayor, and asked him the reason of the silence. The mayor, who was a brother of Dr. Shaw, the preacher, and a favourer of Richard's pretensions, answered Buckingham, that perhaps the citizens did not understand him. Then the duke repeated his discourse in different language, urged the same arguments as before, and concluded by again asking the question as to whether they would have Richard for their king? Still the citizens remained silent, or conversed together in low whispers; and the mayor told the duke that they were not used to be addressed by any one but the recorder, and did not understand how to answer a person of his high rank. The recorder was, therefore, called upon to repeat the particulars of the duke's speech; but that officer took care to express nothing of himself, and said that he merely recapitulated the observations of the Duke of Buckingham. The citizens, as before, preserved silence, and the duke then said, "This is wonderful obstinacy. Express your meaning, my friends, one way or other. When we apply to you on this occasion, it is merely from the regard which we bear to you. The Lords and Commons have sufficient authority, without your consent, to appoint a king; but I require you here to declare, in plain terms, whether or not you will have the Duke of Gloucester for your sovereign?"

After all this extreme urging, a few poor people threw up their caps and cried out, "Long live King Richard!" Buckingham, who saw that nothing more could be done, thanked them and retired.

Two days after, the Duke of Buckingham, and some other nobles who were favourable to Richard's pretensions, together with the Lord Mayor and a deputation of the citizens, waited upon him at Baynard's Castle, and entreated him to accept the crown. The wily conspirator pretended to be alarmed, and at first refused to see them. Buckingham understood this very well, and would not be satisfied with the refusal. He and the deputation were then admitted, and an address was presented to Richard, to induce him to comply with their wishes. The hypocritical Gloucester declared that he was a man of no ambition; that he was strongly attached to his nephews, and determined to preserve the crown for them. This opposition had been arranged between him and Buckingham beforehand, as it was thought it would give a better appearance if the protector did not yield too suddenly. The former then, addressing Richard, said, "The free people of England will never be ruled by a base-born prince; and if you, the lawful heir, refuse the crown, they know where to find another who will gladly accept it." Gloucester pretended to be convinced: under such circumstances, he said it was his duty to submit to the will of the people, and to accept the crown; and as they would have him to be their sovereign, he would take upon himself the duties of that elevated office.

This strange scene occurred on the 26th of June, 1483, and the brief reign, as it is called, of Edward V. was over.

CHAPTER XLII.

THE REIGN OF RICHARD THE THIRD.—A.D. 1483—1485.

N the 6th of July, the crafty Duke of Gloucester was crowned at Westminster as King Richard III. No one opposed the ceremony—a great body of prelates and nobles attended—the people cheered their new king, and the princes in the Tower seemed to be forgotten. If their just claim were mentioned, it was in whispers and retired places, not in the open streets or in the presence of strangers. Richard's queen, Anne, was crowned with him. This lady was the second daughter of the great Earl of Warwick, and the widow of Queen Margaret's son, Prince Edward of Lancaster, of whose death, as we have shown, different accounts are given. It would have been most strange and unnatural if Anne had accepted for her second husband a man whose hands were reputed to have been stained with the blood of her first; and this marriage renders it more probable, therefore, that the statement that the unfortunate prince was killed on the field of battle, was the true one.

After the coronation, Richard showered rewards and honours upon his partisans. To the Duke of Buckingham he gave the princely estate belonging to the earldom of Hereford, made him constable of the kingdom, and governor of all the royal castles in Wales. Lord Howard was created Duke of Norfolk; and his son, Sir Thomas Howard, Earl of Surrey; Lord Lovel was advanced to the dignity of viscount; and even Lord Stanley, who had so lately been confined in the Tower, was not only set at liberty, but received into favour, and made steward of the royal household. Richard then charged his nobles to preserve peace and justice in their several counties, and to punish crime and disorder. Though he had obtained the regal power unjustly enough, it seemed as if he intended to use it with wisdom and moderation. Soon after his coronation he began a royal progress through the country, everywhere graciously receiving petitions and remedying abuses. The people were pleased with this attention on the part of their king, and cheered him as a friend and benefactor; indeed, so much enthusiasm was excited at York, that, to gratify the inhabitants of that city, Richard had his coronation performed over again. Apart from the cruelties to which ambition led him, Richard was not a bad ruler; but usurpers have generally tried, by a just and moderate government, to obtain popularity among their people. Nor was he in all things a bad man. He was grateful and true to those who served him; and, having punished those who sought to drive him from his high position, he did not evince any feelings of revenge towards their representatives: in several instances, on the contrary, his conduct to those persons was characterised by great generosity. Had he been a private man, there is reason to believe that Richard would have been just and generous; and, as a sovereign, his acute intellect and resolute will enabled him to rule wisely; but he hesitated at no crime, however heinous, if necessary to maintain his regality.

Though crowned king, and though apparently in high favour with the people, he was uneasy about the rights of the princes he had deposed. They were helpless and passive enough then; but it would probably be otherwise as they approached towards manhood. Besides, the queen-mother had numerous friends; and many parties were organised to restore her sons to liberty, and place Prince Edward on the throne. Richard soon obtained information of the secret plottings, and he resolved to frustrate them by putting the unhappy boys to death. For this purpose he sent a message to Sir Robert Brackenbury, the governor of the Tower, commanding him, in some manner, to execute the shocking design. Brackenbury was a man of too much humanity and honour, and he refused obedience to the murderous mandate. The usurper soon found some more complying person; and Sir James Tyrrel, his Master of the Horse, undertook to deprive Edward and his brother of life. Richard sent Tyrrel to the Tower with a commission, by which Brackenbury was to deliver to him the keys and command of that fortress for the space of four-and-twenty hours. The governor understood the meaning of this dark order; but he had no power to refuse obedience, or to interfere in what he guessed would follow.

Much mystery hangs over this gloomy transaction; but it is supposed that one night, in the August following Richard's coronation, Tyrrel arrived at the Tower, bringing with him two strong ruffians, named Miles Forrest and John Dighton. Tyrrel stood at the door while the two latter stealthily entered the chamber where the two princes slept, and smothered them with the pillow and bed-clothes. No noise accompanied this midnight atrocity—the hapless sufferers were unable to call for assistance; a few brief struggles, and the subtle spirit of life was extinguished. The ruffians then beckoned in their employer. Tyrrel entered the chamber, and gazed for a few moments upon the lifeless bodies of those who, but a few months before, had been the cherished and happy children of a king. He then commanded his villanous attendants to carry the dead princes to the bottom of a flight of steps, and bury them deep in the ground, under a heap of stones. Richard rewarded the murderers, and Tyrrel became a great favourite with him; but there is a more powerful and awful judge of the deeds of men than the kings whose sceptres are so often dipped in the blood of the innocent; and in the next reign Tyrrel perished upon the scaffold. Retribution commonly waits upon crime, as does the shadow upon the dial.

The Duke of Buckingham, lately so warm in the service of Richard, had turned against him, and joined a secret conspiracy for restoring the young king, Edward V., to the throne. The reasons for this conduct are not very clear; but Buckingham seems to have been dissatisfied with the rewards Richard had bestowed upon him. The king had been liberal: it is difficult for princes, however, to satisfy those powerful subjects who have helped to place them on their thrones. Still Buckingham's sudden change is unaccountable, unless we suppose him to have been a man of a capricious temper. Whatever were his motives, he joined a conspiracy against Richard; and called upon all Englishmen to aid him in restoring the rightful prince to the throne.

It is very likely that Richard would have kept the murder of the princes a secret; but when he heard of these attempts to restore Edward, he proclaimed that the unhappy lad and his brother were dead, and left people to think what they pleased. He knew that men's opinions could not raise the dead; and he trusted that the dark rumours which were circulated respecting the young princes would soon be forgotten. He was mistaken; the conspirators were, indeed, baffled for a time; but the disgust of the nation was excited, and a feeling of extreme dislike arose against him in the minds of the people. Defeated in the object of restoring the murdered Edward, the conspirators cast their eyes upon a person distantly connected with the royal family, and offered him the crown if he could succeed in expelling Richard.

This person was Henry, Earl of Richmond, then living as an exile in the court of Brittany. He was regarded as a sort of representative of the ruined House of Lancaster, being a grandson of Sir Owen Tudor and the Princess Catherine, the widow of Henry V.; and his mother was a great-grand-daughter of John of Gaunt. His descent from Catherine would give him no title to the crown; nor, strictly speaking, could he make any such claim, in consequence of his far-off relationship to John of Gaunt; for he was descended from an illegitimate branch of that nobleman's family. But a strong feeling existed against Richard; and the nobles who were opposed to him had resolved, under any circumstances, to have another king, either with a just title or without one. They therefore proposed to Henry that he should marry the Princess Elizabeth, the eldest daughter of King Edward IV. (who, after the death of her brothers in the Tower, was the next heir to the crown), and thus unite the two Houses of York and Lancaster. He consented to this arrangement; and it was agreed that he should land with an army in England, when he was to be joined by the Duke of Buckingham, the Marquis of Dorset, Lord Stanley, and other nobles and gentry, with their forces. Elizabeth, the widow of Edward IV., who still resided in the sanctuary at Westminster, greatly approved of the scheme, and sent a sum of money to the Earl of Richmond to forward his purpose.

These movements took place in September and October, 1483; and the conspiracy was carried on with so much secrecy, that the acute Richard only discovered it a few days before it was arranged that a general insurrection should take place. With that vigour and decision which he always showed, he summoned a royal army to meet him at Leicester; and on the 22nd of October, issued a proclamation, denouncing Buckingham, Dorset, and the rest as traitors, and setting a price upon their heads. Buckingham had collected an army in Wales, but he was unable to cross the river Severn on account of its being flooded by long-continued rains; for the inhabitants of the neighbouring English counties, who disliked the Welsh soldiers he brought with him, broke down all the bridges. The result was, that, in a little time, the army of the duke was in want of food, and the Welshmen, of whom it was composed, deserted, and fled to their native mountains. Buckingham put on a disguise, and hid himself, intending to remain concealed until the arrival of the Earl of Richmond. Having taken refuge in the house of an old servant, of the name of Banister, he was detected, and sent a prisoner to King Richard at Salisbury. Richard ordered him to be instantly beheaded: the duke implored for an interview, but Richard would not grant it; and the sentence was executed at Salisbury on the 2nd of November.

Richard then marched into Devonshire against the Marquis of Dorset and his associates; who did not wait for his approach, but fled for safety, and joined the Earl of Richmond in Brittany. Some few fell into the hands of the king, who sent several of them to the scaffold; but his conduct was not marked by great severity. One remarkable exception, however, must be mentioned: a gentleman of the name of William Collingbourne was executed under a sentence of being concerned in this rebellion—but, in reality, for having written the following sarcastic lines upon the king and some of his new councillors. The cat refers to Catesby, a man who had considerable influence with the king; the rat is Sir Richard Ratcliffe, who conducted the executions of Lords Rivers and Grey at Pontefract. The crook-backed boar designates Richard himself, as that prince was slightly deformed, and he bore the device of a boar upon his arms.

> "The cat, the rat, and Lovel, our dog,
> Do rule all England under a hog.
> The crook-back'd boar the way hath found
> To root our roses from our ground.
> Both flower and bud will he confound,
> Till king of beasts the swine be crown'd:
> And then the dog, the cat, and rat,
> Shall in his trough feed and be fat."

It is strange that Richard, who feared neither the power of God or man, should have been stung by such feeble lines as these; but the power of the pen has frequently made tyrants tremble, when they have laughed contemptuously at the glittering swords of hostile armies.

Richard, having crushed the conspiracy, assembled a parliament in the next month, November. It was evident that his energy in meeting his enemies had revived his reputation in the minds of its members. The parliament passed a bill of attainder against all who had been concerned in the late rebellion; declared Richard the lawful sovereign by birth, inheritance, free election, consecration, and coronation; and entailed the crown upon his children. An act was passed, by which benevolences, and all such exactions, were abolished for ever; and several others, having for their object the repression of the privileges of the nobles, and the raising the masses of the people to a position of greater independence.

Knowing that the pretender, Richmond, aimed at marrying the Princess Elizabeth, daughter of Edward IV., and the real heir to the crown, Richard resolved to defeat that scheme by proposing an alliance between that young lady and his own son, the Prince of Wales, who was but eleven years old. It seemed scarcely possible that the widowed queen should consent to ally her daughter with the son of the murderer of her children, and the despoiler of her own dignity and grandeur; especially as she was engaged in a conspiracy against him. But she was a vain, ambitious woman, and Richard was a crafty, able man, who was exceedingly expert in removing all obstacles to his wishes. He wrote an affectionate letter to the queen-dowager, and invited her and her daughters to come to court. After a little hesitation, and the exaction of an oath that they should be in no danger, they came; and the eldest daughter, Elizabeth, would have been married to his son, had not the project been interrupted by the sudden death of that young prince.

Richard was, for a time, overpowered by the loss of his son; displaying more sorrow than seemed possible in a man supposed to be so devoid of all tender and natural feelings. When he recovered, his active mind was again at work, considering how he could defeat the plans of the Earl of Richmond. He had no other son, so he resolved to marry the young lady himself. Neither Elizabeth nor her daughter made the least objection, although his queen, Anne, was yet alive. She was ill: her death was expected, and eagerly looked forward to, by those heartless women, who seem to have been worthy members of the ambitious and grasping family of York. The queen died in the March of 1485, and it was suspected that she was poisoned by the order of her husband. No direct proofs exist of this horrible suspicion, which is not at all unlikely to have been a calumny spread by his enemies, who were every day growing more numerous.

Richard then turned his attention to marrying his niece, Elizabeth. The queen-dowager wrote to her son, the Marquis of Dorset, desiring him and his friends to withdraw from the Earl of Richmond, as she had a better match in hand for her daughter. But an obstacle arose which prevented Richard from contracting this marriage. When he mentioned it to his confidential advisers, Ratcliffe and Catesby, they strongly advised him against it. They said it would confirm the general rumour that he had poisoned his queen, Anne. Besides which, it was regarded by the English people as an improper and unnatural thing for an uncle to marry his niece. This was soon proved to be true; for when the marriage came to be talked about, the general excitement and condemnation it elicited were sufficient to alarm even the usually fearless Richard. He was never at a loss what to do: he summoned the Lord Mayor, aldermen, and citizens in the great hall of the Temple, and earnestly declared to them that he had never thought of the reported marriage, and that such a thing was very far from his intentions. Not satisfied with this gross falsehood, he desired them to seize and punish all persons whom they found propagating what he called such malicious reports.

The Earl of Richmond had passed many years in the court of Duke Francis of Brittany, in a kind of easy and honourable confinement. This duke had a talented minister, named Landois, who had been very friendly to Richmond; but the English king offered him a large sum of money to seize the earl, and send him a prisoner to England. Once in the power of King Richard, the earl's life would have been a very brief one; but by some means he discovered the intention of Landois, and fled to the court of France, where he was kindly received by the French king, who regarded Richard as a cruel usurper, and would have nothing to do with him. Charles VIII., who had just succeeded his father Louis on the throne of France, gave Richmond some ships, and 3,000 Norman soldiers. The earl resolved to land with that force upon the English shores, and trust to a rising of the people in his favour.

Richard was soon informed of this intention, and he made rapid preparations to defeat it. He issued a cleverly-written proclamation, in which he alluded to the obscure birth of his rival, on whom he would bestow no other name than that of "one Henry Tudor." He declared that this Henry Tudor had promised all the dignities and profitable places of the church and state to foreigners and traitors. That he intended to rob the nobles of their inheritance, and the people of their liberties. That the soldiers he brought with him were a band of thieves and murderers, the refuse of prisons—ruffians who would pay no respect to the property of men, or to the delicacy and honour of women. Finally, Richard called upon all his subjects to arm for the cause of their country, and promised that he himself would encounter every peril in their defence.

The king had lost what hold he might have had on the affections of the people; and they did not wish to fight for one who was regarded as the murderer of his nephews, and the poisoner of his queen. The crimes that had raised him to the throne were soon to assist in hurling him from it, for they kept back many thousands who would otherwise have flocked to his standard. Besides this, Richard was poor; and armies are not to be raised without money. Unable to obtain it in any other way—as the parliament had passed a law abolishing all benevolences—"he borrowed many notable sums of money," says the chronicler Fabyan, a contemporary, "of rich men of this realm; for surety whereof he delivered to them good and sufficient pledges." By these means he obtained a considerable sum of money, and collected an army of 12,000 men. With these he resolved to station himself in the centre of his kingdom, and leave the coasts to be defended by the great nobles near them. Very few of these nobles were faithful to him; and Richmond, who sailed from Harfleur on the 1st of August, 1485, was permitted to land his forces at Milford Haven on the 7th, without opposition. These forces seemed quite incompetent for the purpose of vanquishing the sovereign of such a country as England; for they did not consist of more than 5,000 men, of whom only 2,000 were English; but Henry Tudor expected to find more friends than enemies on the ground on which he landed.

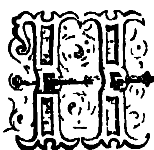
Richmond marched his small force through Wales, crossed the river Severn, and, on entering the English counties, was joined by several knights and gentlemen. By the 21st of August he had arrived at Tamworth; for Sir Rice ap Thomas and Sir Walter Herbert, who were entrusted with Richard's authority in Wales, were both false to their cause. The former deserted to Henry, and the latter offered scarcely any opposition to his advance. Richard immediately marched from Leicester to the neighbouring market-town of Bosworth, and the two armies met in a fine open plain to the south of it.

Very few of Richard's nobles had joined his army: the Earl of Northumberland, the Duke of Norfolk, his son the Earl of Surrey, and Lord Lovel, were the principal of those who were with him. Lord Stanley was absent: at first he sent word that he was ill, and then that he was coming; and, at last, he marched with his forces before the army of Richmond, as if he were retreating from it—taking good care not to come up with Richard. He intended to desert to Henry; but had Richard been victorious, he would have joined him, and invented some apology for his delay. Besides this lack of support from the nobles, Richard's army was thinned by continual desertions; every hour some of his adherents stole secretly into the camp of his rival.

Richard saw that delay was indeed dangerous to him, and that it would be best at once to risk a battle. On the morning of the 22nd of August, therefore, he gave the word, and the conflict began. The Duke of Norfolk and his troops charged the enemy with great skill and bravery; but the rest of the king's followers fought without spirit. During the battle Richard beheld Henry surrounded by his officers, and he instantly resolved to end the struggle by the death of the earl. With a cry of "Treason!" he rode violently towards him, killed his standard-bearer with one blow, cut down another gentleman with a second, and, having thus made his way towards Richmond, he aimed a thrust at him which, had it taken effect, would have ended the rebellion and the life of its leader at once. But it was not to be: Sir William Stanley (for the Stanleys had appeared upon the field and joined Henry) parried the blow, and in another moment Richard was surrounded and slain. The death of the king terminated the battle, during which about 3,000 or 4,000 men were killed: amongst them were the Duke of Norfolk, Lord Ferrers, Sir Robert Brackenbury, and the villanous Sir Richard Ratcliffe. Sir William Catesby, the other principal agent of Richard's crimes, was taken prisoner, and soon afterwards beheaded at Leicester. Lord Stanley took the blood-stained crown from the brow of the corpse of the king, and placed it on the head of the Earl of Richmond, upon which the army raised a great shout of "Long live King Henry VII.!"

The body of Richard, mangled with many wounds, and smeared with blood and dirt, was stripped naked, thrown across a horse, and taken in an insulting manner to Leicester. After being publicly exposed for several days, that all men might know the regal murderer was dead, it was buried in the church of Grey Friars of that town.



Thus, after a reign of two years and two months only, ended the ambitious career of this gifted but merciless being. A crown was the glittering phantasm that led him to destruction; able as he was, his mind was not strong enough to resist the temptation of the gaudy bauble. His exact age was not known, but it is supposed that he perished in his thirty-third year. He left no children, and with him ended the long line of kings of the House of Plantagenet. With him also ended the bitter feuds which had so long existed between the rival branches of that house, the Lancastrians and Yorkists. As Henry was regarded as the representative of the family of Lancaster, so the Princess Elizabeth was looked upon as the heiress of the family of York; and with their marriage the Red Rose and White were blended inseparably together.

Bad as Richard was, he has been represented in darker colours than are warranted by truth. He was, no doubt, to some extent hypocritical and crafty; and, when his interests required it, merciless and vindictive. Ambition appears to have led him into the commission of crimes and cruelties foreign to his nature; and, after he had obtained the crown, he governed with wisdom, moderation, and a regard for the liberties of his people. Although the darkest spot on Richard's character, the murder of his nephews, is without a parallel in the lives of his brothers, Edward and Clarence, he does not appear to have really been a worse man than either of them. He has, however, been described as the most wicked member of the House of York; and upon his memory writers have poured all their bitterness. Even Richard's personal appearance has been misrepresented; he has been described as being hump-backed, and possessing features of a harsh, disagreeable cast. This is now known to be untrue; he was rather short in stature, and slightly deformed; but his face was strikingly handsome, his carriage graceful, and his manner, when he pleased, singularly attractive and fascinating. Still, for his many crimes he will always remain classed among the tyrants who have at times disgraced the English throne, and a load of infamy rests upon his memory which will never be removed.

CHAPTER XLIII.

THE REIGN OF HENRY THE SEVENTH.—A.D. 1485—1487.

ENRY VII. was the first sovereign of the House of Tudor—a race of princes who were more powerful and despotic than any that had preceded them in this country. The causes of the great authority that they enjoyed, were chiefly that the power of the ancient nobility of England had been destroyed by the long civil war, carried on between the factions of the Red and White Roses, and that the power of the people was not yet aroused. The authority that the nobles had lost, the monarch had gained, while the voice of the people was not heard or regarded.

After the battle of Bosworth, Henry proceeded by slow journeys to London, carefully preventing his troops from exhibiting any appearance of triumph, or acting like victors, for fear of exciting the jealousy of the people. The nation had received him as its sovereign from choice, not submitted to him as a conqueror. During his progress to London the people cheered him heartily; and when he arrived there, the mayor, aldermen, and citizens received him with enthusiasm. They had some reason to do so; for sixty years the nation had been distracted by wars and convulsions; and it was naturally hoped, that now the claims of the rival factions were united in the person of a talented prince, of the manly age of thirty, it might look for peace, and its attendant, prosperity.

After Henry had offered up thanks at St. Paul's for his victory, and suspended his three banners in the cathedral, he retired to the palace at Westminster. Those three banners bore decorations which referred to his Welsh descent from Sir Owen Tudor. The first had a representation of St. George; the second a red dragon; and the third a dun cow. Indeed, Henry laid claim to being descended, through Sir Owen Tudor, from the famous ancient British hero, King Arthur, whose very existence is suspected of being only a fable. But whether Arthur really reigned, or whether he is a mere myth, he was a great hero in the popular belief; and a supposed descent from him conveyed incalculable honour in the estimation of the people.

Henry's coronation was put off for a few weeks, on account of a strange kind of plague which then was very fatal in London. It was called the sweating sickness, and great numbers perished from it. People were suddenly attacked, and in less than twenty-four hours they either died or recovered. It is rather remarkable that two successive Lord Mayors of London and six aldermen died of it within a period of eight days. But as this strange disease came in mystery, so it departed in mystery; for in about six weeks from the commencement of its outbreak it had disappeared. Then, on the 30th of October, 1485, Henry was crowned with great state and solemnity at Westminster Abbey. Previously to the ceremony he created twelve knight-bannerets, and conferred the dignity of the peerage upon three of his adherents. His uncle, Jasper, was made Duke of Bedford; Lord Stanley was made Earl of Derby; and Sir Gilbert Courtenay, Earl of Devonshire. Henry exhibited his cautious disposition very early; for at his coronation he appeared surrounded by a body-guard of fifty stout archers. The English people were unused to such a precaution, and it caused some uneasiness among them. They would have been better pleased, also, if he had at once married the Princess Elizabeth, and caused her to be crowned along with him. His natural cunning withheld him from that; he entertained a jealousy of the claim to the throne, held even by the lady who was to become his queen; he was very anxious for the people to believe that the right to the crown rested only in him; and he feared that if he married the princess before his coronation, it would imply a sort of sovereignty in her.

On the 7th of November, Henry met his parliament to settle the affairs of the country; and told the peers and commons that he had become their king "by just title of inheritance, and by the sure judgment of God, who had given him the victory over Richard in the field." The parliament settled the crown on Henry, neither recognising his right by birth or conquest, but simply declaring, "that the inheritance of the crown should rest, remain, and abide in the king."—Soon after the legislature assembled, a curious question arose. Many members of the new House of Commons had been attainted and outlawed by the late king; and Henry himself, who called the parliament, had also been attainted and declared a traitor. Could he, therefore, call a parliament—or could such attainted persons sit as members of it? This important question was referred to the judges; and they decided, that the members of the House of Commons who were attainted must not take their seats until an act should be passed to reverse their attainder. Concerning Henry himself, they said, that "the crown takes away all defects and stops in blood; and that, from the time the king assumed royal authority, the fountain was cleared, and all attainders and corruptions of blood discharged."

One of Henry's first acts was calculated to produce an unfavourable impression. He was exceedingly fond of money, and he eventually became a sort of royal miser, who used his great power chiefly for extorting wealth from the people. To gratify this love of money, when it became necessary, after parliament assembled, to fix the date of the commencement of his reign, he did so, not from his coronation, or from the day on which Richard was slain at Bosworth, but from the day before the battle; though at that time Richard was King of England, and he nothing but the Earl of Richmond. His object in this disreputable artifice was, that he might accuse all the wealthy nobles and gentry who fought against him of being traitors, and then confiscate their estates. This was shamefully unjust; for, before the battle of Bosworth, they were as much justified in fighting for Richard, who was then their king, as they would afterwards have been in taking up arms for Henry; because the duty of the subject is always due to the sovereign who then wears the crown. Henry, notwithstanding, required the parliament to pass a bill of attainder against the late king, the Duke of Norfolk, the Earl of Surrey, Lord Lovel, Lord Ferrers, and five-and-twenty other nobles and gentlemen. The parliament hesitated; but afterwards, with a disgraceful cowardice and want of self-respect, passed this infamous act. Henry then seized all the estates of the attainted nobles, who, by this arbitrary action, were reduced to beggary. He certainly did not proceed further, and deliver those unhappy gentlemen into the hands of the executioner; for it was money, not vengeance, that he wanted; and he had been perfectly successful. The people were alarmed and disgusted by this arbitrary exercise of power; and, to divert their attention, Henry issued a general pardon for all such followers of the late King Richard as would submit to his mercy, and take the oath of allegiance. Notwithstanding this amnesty, the Earl of Surrey, who came forward and submitted himself, was sent to the Tower.

Before the parliament separated it voted to the king a supply of money, consisting of a grant of tonnage and poundage, to be held during his life. At the same time the members desired him to perform his promise of marrying the Princess Elizabeth; and he assured them that he would comply with their request. Accordingly, on the 18th of January in the following year (1486), the marriage was solemnised, to the great joy of the nation. The king was displeased with this manifestation of pleasure on the part of the people, and it gave him a jealous dislike of his queen. He kept her as much as possible in seclusion; and it was a long time before he would consent to her coronation. Her mother, the widow of Edward IV., was also treated with reserve and indifference; for Henry was not the man to forget that she had consented to marry her daughter to his late rival, King Richard. After his marriage, Henry applied to the pope to confirm his title to the crown; and the pontiff, who was delighted with the chance of interfering in the worldly affairs of princes, readily consented to do so, and threatened to excommunicate any one who should presume to call it in question.

The new sovereign then made a royal progress through the kingdom, that he might show himself to the people, and gain their affection. He knew that the memory of Richard was yet respected in the north, and he remained nearly a month at York, and conferred many favours upon the inhabitants of that city. Among other things, he made an immense reduction in the town-rent to the crown, upon which the people cheered very heartily, and prayed God to bless his handsome face. They would have been still better pleased had he brought his queen with him; but the jealous monarch kept her at home, for he did not wish any one to share with him the homage of the nation.

While he was at York he received intelligence of an insurrection. The ruined Lord Lovel, with Sir Humphrey and Sir Thomas Stafford, had left the sanctuary in which they had taken refuge, and, having collected an army of near 4,000 men, were approaching with the insane intention of attacking the king. Henry was not deficient in courage and activity; and he speedily collected a small body of troops, which was sent forward under the command of the Duke of Bedford. The conduct of the rebels was as spiritless as it had been rash; for Lovel, thinking that his enterprise was hopeless, disbanded his men, and then contrived to escape into Flanders. The Staffords fled to a church for sanctuary, but they were dragged from it, and condemned to death as traitors. The elder was executed, but the younger pardoned. On the 20th of September, 1486, Henry's queen presented him with a son, who was christened Arthur, and the court flatterers declared that they were quite sure he would become very much more famous than the King Arthur of our traditional history. They were mistaken; for, although the young prince became famous in his father's court for his learning and numerous acquirements, he sickened and died before he was sixteen years old.

It will create no surprise to learn that Henry was not loved by his subjects; and he always showed so much dislike for the partisans of the York family, that most of them began to fear, if not to hate him. He particularly excited their angry feelings by two of his actions. The first was the imprisonment of the young Earl of Warwick (the son of the Duke of Clarence) in the Tower; and the second was the resumption of all grants of land made by the sovereigns of that family. Warwick had a far better claim to the crown than Henry had; and it was feared that within the gloomy walls of the Tower he might meet the same fate that had befallen his two cousins, the hapless sons of Edward IV. The fear was so common, that many people made comparisons between the conduct of Henry and that of Richard, and raised him many enemies. The taking back the lands given by former sovereigns to their friends, also created a number of beggared and desperate men, ready for rebellion or any wild exploit. Henry certainly excused himself by saying that the royal revenue had become too small for sustaining the dignity of the crown; but this was no comfort to the sufferers; neither did it prevent them from believing that he had taken away their property out of a spiteful feeling against the York party.

The dislike towards the king gave rise to a very curious circumstance. In the spring of 1487, Richard Simon, an intriguing priest, went to Dublin with a remarkably handsome boy, about the age of fifteen, whom he declared to be the young Earl of Warwick, who, he said, had escaped from the Tower, and was resolved to put forward his right to the throne. The true Earl of Warwick was still a prisoner, and the boy and his instructor, the priest, were impostors. The real name of the lad was Lambert Simnel, and he was the son of a baker. The Irish people were disaffected to Henry; they received the pretended prince with enthusiasm; and the lord-lieutenant of that country declared that the crown and sceptre of the realm belonged of right to him, as the sole heir male left of the line of Richard, Duke of York. There were many things in the young pretender to excite a feeling of sympathy and affection. Besides being attractive and graceful in appearance, he was ready and witty in speech, related his own story with much pathos, and was able to tell many anecdotes and give minute particulars of the royal family of York. Fired with enthusiasm, the people of Dublin declared that he was their true sovereign; and they crowned him in the cathedral church of that city as King Edward VI. The Bishop of Meath performed the ceremony; and, as no crown was to be readily had, a diadem was taken from the head of the statue of the Virgin Mary, and placed upon the brow of the supposed prince.

Henry was astonished and greatly vexed when the news of this new claim to the throne reached him; but he proceeded with his usual cautious prudence. He held frequent consultations on the subject with his ministers; and the result of these interviews was the arrest of his mother-in-law, the queen-dowager Elizabeth, and her committal as a prisoner to the monastery of Bermondsey. The reason assigned for her arrest was not the true one. It was said, that in spite of her secret agreement to marry her daughter Elizabeth to Henry, she had yielded to the solicitations of Richard, and placed that princess and her sisters in his hands. This was true; but it was an old and half-forgotten offence, which might admit of many excuses. The queen-dowager was a restless and bitter-minded woman; and finding that Henry had not rewarded her services in helping him to the crown, but treated her with coldness and indifference, she had conceived a strong dislike towards him. The assumed Earl of Warwick was much better informed about the habits and appearance of the late royal family than it was supposed an impostor could be; and it was suspected that the queen-dowager herself had given hints for his instruction. This, it appears, was the real cause of her arrest; but Henry was so fond of mystery that the reason was never made public.

After arresting the queen-dowager, Henry took the real Earl of Warwick from the Tower, and had him conducted, on a Sunday, through the principal streets of the city, that every one might see him. Some of the nobles, who had known the young earl while a child, also spoke to him before the multitude. This was an excellent plan, and made most of the English people believe that Lambert Simnel was an impostor. But in Ireland it had no such effect: there the people said that the king was an impostor; and that to deceive the world, he had dressed up a boy like Edward Plantagenet, and exhibited him in public, for the purpose of discrediting the true heir of the line of sovereigns.

At Henry's court there was a brave and accomplished young nobleman, known as John, Earl of Lincoln; he was a nephew of the late King Richard, who, at one time, had appointed him to be his successor on the throne. In consequence of this, he was regarded with a very jealous eye by Henry, and much looked up to by the York party. Immediately after the arrest of the queen-dowager the young earl fled to Flanders, to the court of his aunt, Margaret of York, who had married Charles the Rash, and was now the widowed Duchess of Burgundy. This lady (who was the sister of Edward IV., and the patroness of William Caxton, our first English printer) hated Henry very bitterly, and longed to see some of her own family once again upon the throne of England. Her court was accordingly the refuge of all the partisans of the York family, who fled from the tyranny of Henry; and there Lord Lovel had gone after the failure of the insurrection.

It is not at all likely that the Duchess of Burgundy really believed Lambert Simnel was her nephew; but she pretended to do so for the purpose of annoying Henry, and readily adopted his cause. Having engaged a little army of 2,000 Germans, under the command of an experienced officer, named Martin Swart, she sent them, together with the Earl of Lincoln, Lord Lovel, and some other English fugitives, to Ireland, to assist the supposed Earl of Warwick. The Irish people were delighted; and, thinking that the English were just as disaffected towards Henry as they were themselves, resolved on an invasion of England. Lambert Simnel, or Edward VI., as he was called by the Irish, embarked with his followers, and, crossing the Channel, landed at Foudray, in Lancashire. There they were joined by Sir Thomas Broughton and a small body of armed tenantry; but they received no further assistance, for the people were sick of insurrections and civil war.

In the meantime King Henry had not been idle. After resorting to several measures to restore his shattered popularity, he collected an army, and marched towards York; to which city Simnel, with the Earl of Lincoln and the insurgents, had advanced. They did not shrink from the unequal conflict, but marched to the south, with a view of meeting the royal troops. On the 16th of June, 1487, a battle took place at Stoke, in the county of Nottingham. The invaders had resolved to conquer or perish, and they fought with great bravery; but the ill-armed and half-naked Irish troops were slaughtered in a frightful manner; whilst Martin Swart and his veteran Germans, the chief hope of the insurgents, were overpowered by numbers, and almost all died fighting. After a fierce contest of three hours, Henry gained a decided victory; and the Earl of Lincoln, Sir Thomas Broughton, Martin Swart, and 4,000 of their followers, were left dead upon the field. Lord Lovel escaped; but he was never seen or heard of again. Two hundred years afterwards, a skeleton, seated on a chair, with its head resting upon a table, was discovered in a subterranean chamber in the mansion which had belonged to this unhappy nobleman. It was supposed to be that of Lord Lovel, who had concealed himself there, and died from the effects of despair or starvation.

Amongst the prisoners taken after the battle of Stoke, was the young impostor, Lambert Simnel, and his instructor, the priest. Henry would not put the lad to death; but, professing to consider him too mean and insignificant an object for such a punishment, pardoned him in contempt, and made him a turnspit in his kitchen; where, after a time, he was promoted to be one of the king's falconers. Richard Simon, the priest, was committed to prison, and probably died there; for he was heard of no more. Henry took his revenge, and gratified his love of money at the same time: he did not send his prisoners and others who favoured the insurrection to the scaffold, but he punished them by heavy fines and ransoms. Some persons had raised a report that the king had been defeated, and had fled; they also were subjected to fines, and a considerable sum was thus poured into the king's coffers.

Though the queen had been married a year and a-half, Henry had not permitted her to be crowned; but now he determined upon gratifying the people with this spectacle. The ceremony took place on the 20th of November, 1487; and the king, who, after all this delay, was ashamed to show himself at it, looked on from behind a screen. He granted Elizabeth this indulgence that he might increase his popularity with the people; but every one saw that he had consented to it to serve his own purposes, and not from good-will. Elizabeth's brother, the Marquis of Dorset, who had been sent to the Tower upon some suspicion, was set at liberty; but the queen-dowager still remained a prisoner in the monastery of Bermondsey.

CHAPTER XLIV.

CONTINUATION OF THE REIGN OF HENRY THE SEVENTH.—A.D. 1487—1499.

ENGLAND was now tranquil. Though Henry was not much respected, he was regarded as a wise and prudent monarch, and therefore submitted to. With no opposition, therefore, at home, for the next four years his attention was principally occupied by some complicated and cunning political intrigues upon the continent; which must be glanced at as briefly as possible.

For some years France had been increasing in power and greatness; all the conquests the English had made in that country had been recovered, and she was becoming the first state in Europe. The neighbouring independent principalities, with the exception of the duchy of Brittany, were subjected to her rule. The King of France, Charles VIII., was a boy; but his elder sister, Anne of Beaujeau, the regent, was a woman of great ability, and she resolved, at the close of 1488, to annex Brittany to the crown of France. For this purpose she sent an army into that duchy; and the duke, Francis II., applied to England for assistance and protection. The French government also sent ambassadors, desiring that Henry would assist it against Brittany, or, at least, would remain neutral in the matter. When Henry was an exile from England, he had been kindly treated both at the court of Brittany and the court of France, and now he offered to act as a mediator between the two countries. The French accepted this offer, but still continued their hostilities. The Duke of Brittany answered, that having, in Henry's youth, long acted as a guardian and protector to him, he had expected more effectual assistance than a barren offer of mediation. He added, that if gratitude would not induce the English king to assist him, motives of prudence ought to do so, as France was already too powerful; and that, to increase its strength by the annexation of Brittany, was to exalt a foe that might ultimately prove the ruin of England.

Though Henry was so careless concerning the fate of Brittany, his subjects viewed the matter very differently. Sir Edward Woodville, one of the queen's uncles, begged permission to go to the rescue of the unfortunate duke from the hands of the French. Henry gave an unwilling consent; and Woodville, with a band of 400 men, sailed for the coast of Brittany. He arrived in time to take part in a battle between that country and the French, in which the latter were victorious, and Woodville and most of his men perished.

A loud outcry was instantly raised in England; and Henry, who had received supplies from his parliament, in 1488, for the purpose of assisting the people of Brittany, was called upon to fulfil his promise. The crafty king had pocketed the money; and, after considerable hesitation, he again summoned his parliament at the beginning of 1489, and asked for more money to enable him to defend Brittany. That assembly granted him a tax, which, it was supposed, would amount to the sum of £75,000. But the people of Yorkshire and Durham, disgusted with Henry's equivocating conduct, refused to pay the tax levied upon them. The commissioners applied to the Earl of Northumberland, and desired his advice and assistance in the collection. The earl, in an imperious manner, insisted that the tax must be paid, upon which the irritated people rose in insurrection and put him to death. Once in arms, they chose for their leaders a violent man, named John à Chambre, and Sir John Egremont, a discontented gentleman. The insurrection assumed a formidable appearance, and Henry became alarmed. He sent a force against them, under the command of the Earl of Surrey, whom he had released from the Tower, and taken into his service; and he himself prepared to follow with a larger army. Surrey attacked the rebels, and put them to flight before the arrival of the king. Sir John Egremont escaped to Flanders, but John à Chambre and many of his associates were taken prisoners, and hanged at York. Though the people were thus punished, the collection of the tax was abandoned; for the king was wise enough not to push the matter to extremes.

The parliament of 1490, however, voted him a further supply; and, in deference to the wishes of the nation, he at last sent an army of 6,000 men into Brittany, under the command of Lord Willoughby de Broke; but he gave him directions to return at the end of six months. Lord Broke obtained some trifling successes, but the French avoided any set battle; and, before the expiration of the six months, Henry recalled him to England; for the king was much more desirous of saving his money than of assisting Brittany. The French had other wars upon their hands, and a treaty of peace was, therefore, entered into at Frankfort, by which they agreed to retire from Brittany; and also that a congress should be held for the amicable settlement of all their disputes.

Francis, the Duke of Brittany, died broken-hearted during this struggle, and left the government of the duchy to his young and beautiful daughter, Anne. Many princes were suitors for the hand of this young lady; and she at length consented to bestow it upon Maximilian, King of the Romans, from whom she had received assistance in her war with the French. That prince, fearing to make a journey to her himself, was secretly married to the young duchess by proxy. Charles, the King of France, who was now one-and-twenty years old, and had assumed the government, resolved to break this engagement, and marry the lady himself. By this means he would obtain possession of Brittany without any further fighting. There were two great obstacles to such an arrangement—first, that he was engaged to another lady, the Princess Margot, a daughter of Maximilian by a former marriage; and, secondly, Anne of Brittany considered her marriage by proxy to Maximilian binding, both by divine and human laws. But Charles cared nothing for difficulties; he advanced with an army, and threatened to besiege the young duchess in her capital unless she became his queen. The unhappy lady was driven into compliance at the point of the sword, and accepted the King of France as her husband. At the same time she signed a treaty, by which she conveyed to him her rights over Brittany, and consented that, if her husband outlived her, it should remain a part of the French kingdom; while, if she outlived him, she should leave her dominions to the reigning sovereign. This affair was carried on with cautious secrecy; and the marriage was actually celebrated before it reached the ears of Maximilian.

That sovereign was exceedingly enraged; he had been tricked out of his bride and an extensive territory; and his daughter, whom he had expected would become Queen of France, and who had for a long time lived at the court of that country, and been treated there as the future wife of its sovereign, was contemptuously returned to him. He applied to several European princes to assist him in punishing the perfidy and reducing the over-grown power of France. Henry felt himself somewhat deceived in the transaction, and he resolved to assist Maximilian. He had also other motives for declaring war against France; the most important of which was, that he hoped to make money by it. This may seem strange; war usually dissipates money rather than collects it; but the clever and parsimonious Henry had made his calculations, and contrived by trickery to realise his expectations.

He first issued a commission for levying a benevolence upon the people—a tax which had always been odious, and was now illegal; for it had been abolished by his predecessor, Richard III. But the king did not care about the lawfulness of anything, if he had the power to do it; and the citizens of London alone were compelled to pay the then great sum of £10,000. When asked to contribute to this benevolence, most people complained that they could not afford to give any direct sum to the king—they were not rich enough for that: but Archbishop Morton, the chancellor, had an answer to suit all objections of that kind. If those who complained lived in a frugal manner, they were told that their saving habits must, of course, have made them rich; if, on the contrary, they lived in a splendid and hospitable style, that, it was said, was a proof they were wealthy, and could therefore well afford to pay. Either alternative was used against the complainant; and the chancellor's retort—which some called "Chancellor Morton's fork," and others named his "crutch" —was quite successful.

Henry was not content with the amount of these extortions: he was a very horse-leech in respect of money, always crying, "Give, give, give!" and he therefore had no sooner pocketed the benevolences, than he called his parliament in October, 1491, and asked for supplies. He very well knew the warlike temper of the nation, and how anxious the people were for a war with the French, and he cunningly practised upon this inclination. He told the parliament that France, elated with her late successes, had treated England with contempt, and even refused to pay the tribute which Louis XI. had agreed to give to Edward IV.; and that it became so warlike a nation as the English to be roused by this indignity, and no longer to confine themselves to resenting the present injury. For himself, he said, he was resolved to lay claim even to the crown of France, and to maintain his title by force of arms—a title which had descended to him from his gallant ancestors, and which he would not permit to be forgotten. Crecy, Poictiers, and Agincourt were examples which would convince them of their superiority over the enemy; nor did he despair of adding new names to the glorious catalogue. He said, that the internal troubles of England had been the cause of her losing France, and that her present union would be the effectual means of recovering it. After this boastful preamble came the point the crafty king was aiming at; he said, that when such an important object was in view, it did not become brave men to complain about advancing money; and that, when the war was once begun, he was determined to make it maintain itself, and he hoped it would rather add to, than diminish, the wealth of the country.

The parliament fell into the trap laid for it by the scheming king, and voted him a considerable supply; a great military enthusiasm was excited in the nation, and an act was also passed allowing nobles and gentry to sell their lands without paying the ordinary fees to the crown for alienation. This was done to encourage warlike persons to raise troops for the war at their own expense, and to enable them to ruin themselves in the service of the king with as little trouble as possible. Such was the general excitement, that many sold their estates in the hope of acquiring military glory, and expected that, in a little time, they would be carrying their victorious banners even to the gates of Paris.

Though he had money and troops, Henry deferred his expedition to France until the autumn of 1492. This created some suspicion that he intended soon to conclude a peace, because spring or summer was the time chosen for war, and, at the fall of the year, armies generally retired into winter quarters. Some of his officers hinted this to the king; but he replied, that he should go over to make an entire conquest of France, which was not the work of one summer. It was, therefore, of no consequence at what season he began the invasion, especially as he had Calais ready for winter quarters. In October, his troops, which consisted of 25,000 foot and 1,600 horse soldiers, landed safely at Calais, and then marched to Boulogne, to which they laid siege. This attack was meant merely for show; for Henry had already secretly sold a peace to France! His double-dealing was of the most dishonest and disgraceful character: he raised money from his subjects upon the pretence of war, and from his enemies for the sake of peace. He agreed to abandon Brittany to the French king for an enormous sum of money, which Charles consented to pay, because he was very eager to obtain a settlement of the dispute. It was also arranged that peace should be maintained between France and England during the lives of Henry and Charles. The king, who thus traded in war and peace, disgracing his high office, then returned home, having incurred the disgust of his army and people; which he did not suffer to annoy him, as he had, as usual, contrived to fill his pockets. Some of the captains sneeringly referred to what the king had so boastfully said in parliament—that after the war was begun he was resolved to make it maintain itself: they said he had indeed kept his promise.

Henry was anxious to get back to England, for a new pretender had arisen, who laid claim to the throne. During the year 1492, a handsome and accomplished youth landed in Ireland, and gave out that he was Richard, Duke of York, the second son of Edward IV., who was supposed to have been murdered in the Tower. His elder brother, he said, had perished by the hands of assassins; but he had contrived to escape, and, after seven years of wandering and obscurity, had come to claim his inheritance. The story had the appearance of having been suggested by the imposition of Lambert Simnel; but the manners of this young man were so courtly and fascinating, that the Irish people readily believed him; and many of the Anglo-Irish were ready to take up his cause. Earl Kildare, the lord-lieutenant, though favourably disposed towards him, was not inclined to take any active measures; and when messengers came from the King of France, inviting the young adventurer to the court of that monarch, and promising him protection and assistance, the earl advised him to go. Charles received him with a great deal of ceremony; assigned him a guard of honour, and lodged him like a sovereign prince. His object was to frighten Henry into a peace; and when that peace was concluded, the French sovereign immediately withdrew his protection from the supposed heir of the English crown, and commanded him to leave his dominions.

From France, the young man, in 1493, went to Flanders, to the court of the Duchess of Burgundy, who had before taken up the cause of Simnel. The hatred which that lady bore to Henry has caused it to be suspected that she was the author of the plot, and had instructed the new claimant in the part he was playing. Whether that was the case or not, will now never be known; but when he first applied openly to the Duchess of Burgundy, she wore an air of distrust; said that she had already been deceived by Simnel, and was determined not to be misled again by any impostor. She asked the assumed prince a number of questions; seemed surprised at the knowledge which his answers showed that he possessed concerning the family of Edward IV.; and, after a great deal of scrutiny, declared she was convinced. Embracing him as her nephew, she said that he was the very image of her dead brother; and bestowed upon him the title of "The White Rose of England." Once convinced, or pretending to be so, the duchess heaped hospitalities upon the adventurer; appointed him a guard of thirty halberdiers, and enjoined every one about her to treat him with the respect due to his exalted rank.

The people of Flanders shared in the belief of their duchess; and in a little while the story also obtained great credit in England, especially among those nobles who were disgusted with King Henry's government. Some of them wrote to the pretender; and others secretly sent Sir Robert Clifford, a gentleman who had known the little Duke of York, to the court of the duchess, to see the young man, and send word whether he was the true prince or not. Clifford wrote back that there was no doubt as to his identity; that he was certainly the son of Edward IV., and the right heir to the throne of England. Such a representation had great influence on the nobles and people; the belief spread rapidly, and an extensive conspiracy was formed against the king.

Henry had not been idle all this time; his fears were aroused, and he proceeded with great caution and activity. He sent spies all over Flanders and England, and directed many of them to pretend that they were favourable to the cause of the prince, and thus to insinuate themselves into the confidence of his friends and associates. He even corrupted Sir Robert Clifford, and induced him to betray the secrets committed to him; and, in the end, he obtained the information he required. According to that, the supposed Duke of York was one Peterkin or Perkin Warbeck, the son of a converted Jew, of Tourney, in Flanders. The freedom with which he spoke English was accounted for by the fact of his having lived for a considerable time among the English merchants in Flanders, and his having travelled about Europe as a servant in the employ of a Lady Brompton. The whole of his history could not be ascertained, nor what it was that induced him to pretend he was the Duke of York; but it was imagined that his remarkable likeness to King Edward IV., together with his graceful manners and great intelligence, caused him to be pointed out to the Duchess of Burgundy as a fit person to act this strange part, for the purpose of troubling, and even, if possible, deposing Henry.

Having obtained this information respecting "The White Rose of England," as Warbeck was called, Henry demanded that he should be delivered up to him; and, as this was refused, he prohibited the English merchants from trading with Flanders. The faithless Sir Robert Clifford had, on the 7th of January, 1495, come to England, thrown himself at Henry's feet, and revealed to the king the names of the English nobles and gentlemen who had corresponded with Warbeck; and Lord Fitzwater, Sir Simon Mountford, Sir Thomas Thwaites, and a number of priests and gentlemen, were all arrested in one day. Three of them were beheaded, and thus this strange imposture was baptised in blood. Lord Fitzwater was sent a prisoner to Calais; but, as he attempted to escape, he also was put to death. The rest were pardoned; but the old chronicler hints that they were, before long, treacherously made away with.

Shortly afterwards, another gentleman of high rank fell a victim to the suspicions of Henry. This was Sir William Stanley, the Lord Chamberlain, the brother of that Lord Stanley who had placed the crown upon his sovereign's head after the battle of Bosworth. He had himself saved Henry's life in that battle, and it seemed incredible that he could be guilty of any treason against him: but Stanley was a rich man; and Henry, who coveted his property, is reported (it is to be hoped untruly) to have himself instigated Clifford to accuse him. The king pretended to be greatly surprised, and said that the accusation must be a false one; still, as Clifford persisted in it, he committed Sir William Stanley to the Tower. Some historians have said that the offence of the unfortunate gentleman only consisted in his having told Clifford, in confidence, that if he were sure that the young man who appeared in Flanders was really the son of King Edward, he would never bear arms against him. Others have said that he sent money to Warbeck, and promised to support his cause. He himself confessed that he was, to some extent, guilty of what was alleged against him, and submitted to the king's mercy. This was sufficient: he was sentenced, and beheaded.

The followers of Warbeck were, by these events, reduced to despair; and, in consequence of the treachery of Clifford, each man suspected his follow. In the language of that distinguished philosopher, Lord Bacon, who wrote a history of this and the following reign—"They were now, like sand without lime, ill-bound together, especially as many as were English; who were at a gaze, looking strange one upon another, not knowing who was faithful to their side; but thinking that the king, what with his baits and what with his nets, would draw all unto him that were anything worth." The people of Flanders, also, no longer regarded Warbeck with a favourable eye, because, on his account, they were great losers through their trade being stopped with England. In this condition he adopted a bold and hopeless scheme: he resolved to land in England, and trust to an insurrection of the common people in his favour: from the nobles he could not hope anything, for Henry's craft and severity had so intimidated them, that they no longer dared to correspond with Warbeck. Having collected about 600 followers (all desperate men, the majority of them being outlaws and pirates), on the 3rd of July, 1495, while the king was in the north, Perkin Warbeck and his wild troop sailed to the coast of Deal, where most of them landed. They were received with false smiles by the gentlemen of Kent; who, though they had collected some troops to oppose Warbeck, pretended to be friendly disposed towards him, and invited him on shore, that they might take him prisoner. He observed that they had more order and military regularity about them than was usual or likely in newly-levied recruits, and, suspecting treachery, refused to trust himself among them. His caution saved his life; but when the Kentish men found they could not induce him to land, they fell upon those of his followers who had done so; and after a short contest, in which several were killed, they took more than 150 prisoners. These men were pinioned, and driven to London in herds like cattle. Henry, in a merciless manner, caused them all to be hanged. Some were executed at London, but others were gibbeted round the coast of Kent, Sussex, Essex, and Norfolk, and their bodies left hanging as a warning, in case Warbeck and his adherents should attempt to land again. Henry then thanked the men of Kent, and promised to reward their services; but he only gave them a few smiles and kind words, which, of course, cost him nothing, and did not do them much good.

Warbeck and his remaining followers, completely discouraged, sailed away from the coast of Deal to the court of Flanders, where he was very coldly received; for the Flemings, feeling the loss of trade with England, had entered into a treaty with Henry, and promised not to harbour his enemies any more. Warbeck then (1496) sailed to Ireland, in the hope of inducing the people to rise in his favour; but again he was disappointed. He had but one hope left: he knew that James IV., of Scotland, hated Henry, and regarded him with favour; so to Scotland he went. James received him in a courteous and honourable manner, acknowledged his right to the throne of England, and was so delighted with his fascinating manners, that he bestowed upon him the beautiful Catharine Gordon for his wife. This young lady was a daughter of the Earl of Huntley, and a relation of the Scottish king himself. Warbeck was also permitted to state his case before the council of the king, and it was soon determined that he should be assisted in an attempt to depose Henry from the throne.

The crafty English king had many spies at the Scottish court—not poor men, without an appearance of honour or position, as might be supposed, but men who ranked among the nobles of that land. Strange as it may seem, these men were ready to earn Henry's money by services of the most dishonest and disgraceful kind. Some of them laid a plot for seizing Warbeck during the night in his tent, and then sending him a prisoner to England; but their treachery failed of success. Then they endeavoured to persuade their sovereign not to invade England, because such a war would be impolitic and dangerous; but their representations were useless.

Having collected an army of Scots, Germans, and Flemings, King James and Warbeck marched into England. Warbeck addressed a proclamation to the English people, calling them his subjects, promising them liberty from oppression, and relief from taxation, and offering £1,000, and an estate in land, to any one who should capture or kill Henry Tudor. The people were too wise to be misled by any such promises; they disliked and feared Henry, but they disliked and feared a civil war much more. No one joined Warbeck, and both he and the King of Scotland were bitterly disappointed. The latter was so angry that he permitted his troops to plunder and ravage the county of Northumberland. They committed such frightful acts, that Warbeck was shocked and disgusted, and expostulated with King James upon the subject, saying he would rather lose the throne than gain it by the sufferings of Englishmen. Instead of regarding his scruples, that monarch sneeringly replied, that he thought the prince need not be so over-solicitous for the welfare of a nation which would not acknowledge him for a king, nor even for a fellow-countryman. Warbeck and the Scottish army were soon in want of provisions, and obliged to return, rather disgracefully, home again.

King Henry did not trouble himself much about this invasion; but, as usual, he attempted to extort money even from the misfortunes of his people. He summoned a parliament, and asked for a grant of money to punish the Scots for their aggressive conduct. The parliament feared the king, and dared scarcely refuse him anything; so they passed a tax, which it was expected would raise an immense sum. The people murmured (they knew Henry's great wealth), and said that he had money enough of his own. The men of Cornwall, in the spring of 1497, even rose in rebellion, and demanded the head of the chancellor, who was an exceedingly rapacious man. They chose Michael Joseph, a farrier, and Thomas Flammoc, a lawyer, for their leaders; and these men, with 16,000 stout peasants at their heels, marched through Devonshire, Somersetshire, Wiltshire, Hampshire, and Surrey, into Kent, and encamped on Blackheath. They had been joined by Lord Audley, and other rash and turbulent gentlemen; but the common people held aloof from them. They were wise enough to believe that such an ill-considered effort would not meet with success.

Henry was now quite used to insurrections, and, although they gave him considerable trouble, he seems to have always felt tolerably secure. It was his custom to say that he only desired to see his rebels; by which he meant that, when he did see them, he felt quite sure of subduing them. It happened that he had an army on foot, which had been collected for the purpose of fighting against the Scots; and he determined to employ it in putting down the insurrection. He divided his force into three parts: one part he sent, under the command of Lord Daubeney, to attack the rebels in front; a second part he despatched with the Earl of Oxford, to wheel round and fall upon them from behind; while he himself remained in St. George's Fields with the third part as a reserve. The attack was ordered to be made on the 22nd of June; and the fighting was commenced by Lord Daubeney, who beat the advanced guard of the rebels at Deptford Bridge; and then, marching upon the heath, began the attack on the main body. Rushing furiously into the midst of them, he was taken prisoner, but soon afterwards rescued. The Cornish men fought with more bravery than he expected; but they were ill-armed and undisciplined; and when Oxford and his troops attacked them in the rear, they were thrown into confusion:

2,000 of them died fighting bravely; 1,500 were taken prisoners, and the rest fled. Amongst the prisoners were Lord Audley; Flammoc, the lawyer; and Joseph, the farrier. These three were executed as traitors; but all the rest were permitted to ransom themselves from those who had taken them. This was a touch of mercy in the king which created some surprise; but, though generally severe in his conduct, he was not a savage man, and he always loved money better than revenge. Poor Joseph, the farrier, went to the scaffold with great courage, saying that he died for the liberties of his countrymen, and that he should be honourably mentioned in the pages of history. This encounter of Henry's troops with the Cornish rebels has received the name of the Battle of Blackheath.

While this unhappy insurrection was in progress, the Scottish king again invaded the northern counties of England, though this time he left the tender-hearted Perkin behind him. After having done a great deal of mischief, James retreated before an English army, and retired to his own country. Both monarchs were desirous of peace, and Henry secretly engaged a foreign ambassador to mediate between them. Commissioners were then appointed to arrange a treaty. Henry first demanded that Warbeck should be surrendered to him: this James refused, saying that he would never betray a man who had trusted to his generosity and good faith. Henry's commissioners next demanded that reparation should be made for the injuries which the Scottish army had lately committed on the English borders; but they were answered, that the spoil of that invasion was like water spilt upon the ground, which could never be recovered, and that Henry's subjects were better able to bear the loss than James's were to repair it. The third demand of the English commissioners was, that the two kings should meet at Newcastle to settle all their differences; but the Scots haughtily replied, that their king meant to treat for a peace, and not go begging for one. James, though thus uncomplying, desired peace, and knew that keeping Warbeck in his court was the chief impediment to it. Therefore he told that young man he could no longer protect him, and Warbeck and his beautiful wife embarked in a vessel that was prepared for them. Once more the mysterious pretender was a fugitive and a wanderer upon the broad expanse of waters.

After Warbeck's departure, a truce for seven years was entered into between Scotland and England; and Henry, who acted with great prudence and moderation, then proposed that a marriage should take place between King James and his eldest daughter, Margaret. James was not very eager for the match, for his affection was entirely engrossed by a beautiful woman, named Margaret Drummond, with whom he lived in a dishonourable manner; and the negotiation with England was prolonged for some time. But the connection of James with the ambitious and unfortunate beauty, Miss Drummond, was terminated in a sudden and very tragical manner. One day, after dinner, she and her two sisters, Euphemia and Sibylla, were seized with a strange illness, and died in great agony. Inquiry was hushed up; but it was supposed that they were poisoned by the nobles, who were jealous of Margaret's influence over the king. The treaty with England was then proceeded with; in 1502 it was concluded; and James was united to the Princess Margaret in the summer of 1503. He was in his thirty-first year, and she only in her fourteenth; but royal weddings are contracted from political convenience, instead of from private affection, and disparity of age is usually altogether disregarded. Still, James acted in an affectionate manner to his young bride; the marriage ceremony was remarkably splendid, and was succeeded by a great deal of feasting and entertainments.

When Warbeck, with his high-born and devoted wife, sailed away from Scotland, they sought for shelter on the shores of Ireland, and once again he landed at Cork. His safest and most honourable course, even supposing him to have been the character he had so long represented, would have been to abandon his hopeless claim to a throne on which another was so firmly seated. To urge his cause further was a cruel act of selfishness, which involved all who followed him in ruin, and led many to the scaffold. But ambition hardens the hearts and blinds the eyes of its votaries; and Warbeck once again tried to rouse the Irish to take up arms for his lost and forsaken cause. Happily for them they were tired of revolts, which led to nothing but misery, defeat, and death; and they held aloof in silent apathy. The restless pretender then consulted with some ruined tradesmen, who were his chief advisers, and he adopted the hardy resolution of landing in Cornwall, and endeavouring again to rouse the feelings of discontent which had so lately driven those bold peasants to insurrection.

Early in September, 1497, he landed at Whitsand Bay, in Cornwall, with about 150 followers. From the coast he marched to Bodmin, the native place of the unfortunate Joseph, the farrier, and there he was joined by about 3,000 men, who were eager to avenge the fate of those friends and relatives who had fallen at Blackheath. Assuming the title of Richard IV., King of England, he marched as far as Exeter, the number of his adherents increasing all the time. He attacked the east and north gates of that city on the 17th of September, but his men were repelled, about 400 being either killed or wounded. On the 18th the attack was renewed; but though they forced the east gate, and entered the city, they were again repelled by the inhabitants, and obliged to retire. From Exeter they marched to Taunton, in Somersetshire.

The news of Warbeck's landing soon reached Henry, who was delighted to hear it, for he felt convinced that he should at last get his enemy into his hands. He instantly gathered an army, and sent it against the rebels. These foolish men, who then amounted to about 7,000, were startled by the number and order of their foes; but there was no talk of fear or flight. It was evening, on the 20th of September, when the royal army came in sight of the Cornish men, and the battle was deferred until the next day. During the night Warbeck's heart failed him, and he secretly deserted his followers, and rode away to the abbey of Beaulieu, in the New Forest, where he took sanctuary. In the morning, his poor foolish followers, not having a leader, submitted to the king's forces in despair, without fighting. Henry commanded the ringleaders to be hanged, and sent the rest to their homes—that is, all except those who had any property, and these he ruined with heavy fines. The king then sent a troop of horse to seize Warbeck's unhappy wife, who had been left at St. Michael's Mount, in Cornwall. She was brought into the presence of Henry, before whom she wept bitterly. His usually cold heart was melted by her beauty and her forlorn position; he spoke to her with kindness, and sent her to the queen, who assigned her an honourable position among her attendants: Henry even granted her a pension, which she received till after his death. She was respected by the people, and was still called by them "The White Rose of England"—the title which had been bestowed upon her husband by the Duchess of Burgundy. Some time after the death of her husband, this lady was married again to a Welsh gentleman, and ultimately buried by his side in the old church of Swansea.

The king's next object was to get Warbeck also into his power. For that purpose he sent some messengers to the sanctuary, who promised the fugitive the royal pardon, and induced him to come forth, and trust to the mercy of the king. Henry, on the 28th of November, carried him to London in a sort of triumphal procession; and the citizens crowded the streets to see the handsome adventurer, whose romantic wanderings and mad attempts upon the crown had so long occupied their attention. Some insulted him as he passed; many more gazed on in a pitying and respectful silence. Henry treated him with clemency, permitting him to live at the Tower, under a guard, and he received every mark of respect. A confession of his imposture was, however, extorted from him, but it was kept a secret. He might now have ended his days in peace; but, in June, 1498, his restless spirit revived, and he contrived to escape. Being pursued, he took sanctuary in the priory of Sheen; but the principal of that religious house surrendered him to the king, on a promise that his life should be spared. Henry ordered him to be placed in the stocks for a whole day before Westminster Hall, where he was compelled to read a confession of his imposition. This confession was afterwards printed, but no copy of it now remains.

After this public disgrace, Warbeck was again sent to the Tower, where he was permitted to form the acquaintance of the unfortunate Earl of Warwick (the son of the Duke of Clarence), who had so long been a prisoner in that fortress. Long confinement and a want of education had rendered him so simple, that he was supposed to be defective in his mind; and when Warbeck proposed that they should murder the governor and escape from the Tower, he at once consented to the plot. Warwick was then to summon the retainers of his father, and Warbeck was to be proclaimed King of England. This absurd plot was discovered; and some writers have even suspected that Henry himself surrounded the prisoners by spies, who first led them into the conspiracy, and then revealed it. There is no proof, however, that the king was guilty of such an act of treachery.

Warbeck was placed upon his trial for treason on the 20th of November, 1499, found guilty, and sentenced to death. He was executed at Tyburn on the 23rd, together with John O'Water, an Irishman, and his first follower. When on the scaffold his confession was read over, and he pronounced it to be all true; and, after asking forgiveness of the king for his many rebellions, submitted himself with patience and humility to the hands of the hangman. There can be little doubt that his dying words were true, and that he was an impostor. It is incredible that the little Duke of York should have been able to escape from the murderers in the Tower when his elder brother perished. But some writers have professed their belief that he was really the son of Edward IV., and that a confession to the contrary, even upon the scaffold, was wrung from him by threats of fearful torture. That ingenious and highly-gifted writer, Horace Walpole, has tried to prove this, but not successfully. It is most probable that Warbeck was an accomplished knave, who acted a false part so long, that, at last, he himself almost believed it to be true.

After the condemnation of Warbeck, the Earl of Warwick was, on the 21st of November, placed upon his trial. His only crime was, that he had attempted to escape; but he was accused of having conspired with Warbeck to disturb the government, and excite an insurrection among the people. The truth is, that Henry had long feared him as being the last male heir of the House of York, and was glad of an excuse for putting him to death. The unfortunate young man, who seems scarcely to have known the meaning of what he did, pleaded guilty, and the servile and pitiless House of Lords condemned him to the scaffold. He was beheaded upon Tower Hill on the 28th of November. At his death he was twenty-nine years of age, and had been a prisoner from infancy; his only crime being that he was of royal blood—a crime which the jealousy of his uncle Richard, and his successor Henry, could never forgive. Although the legal heir to the crown, he lived in a prison, and died on a scaffold, without one cheering ray of sunshine throughout his blighted and gloomy existence. A murmur of disgust and indignation, at his cruel and untimely end, arose from the people, which startled the crafty Henry, and he tried to shift the blame from his own shoulders to those of the King of Spain, who, he said, would not permit his daughter to be married to Henry's son, Arthur, while any of the royal family of York survived. This excuse did not mend matters; but Henry was too securely seated upon his throne for murmurs to shake him. It was the peculiar age of kingcraft; and abroad, foreign princes rather respected Henry for the political wisdom which he displayed in his treatment alike of Warbeck and of Warwick.

It was at this time that Machiavelli, an Italian statesman, lived, who afterwards wrote a book in recommendation of tyranny and treachery, in which the worst crimes of kings are not only excused, but applauded. That many of the great sovereigns of Europe in that age were wanting in honour and truth, and capable of that duplicity to which the term Machiavellian was subsequently affixed, is proved by the fact that the hints from which Machiavelli composed his detestable book, called The Prince, were taken from the lives and actions of monarchs then living.

CHAPTER XLV.

CONCLUSION OF THE REIGN OF HENRY THE SEVENTH.—A.D. 1499—1509.

SOON after the tyrannous execution of the helpless Earl of Warwick, London was afflicted by a plague, which swept great numbers of its inhabitants to their graves; and men did not scruple to say that it was God's judgment upon the nation for that cruel act. Superstitious people are always fond of tracing public calamities to individual crimes: the plague, no doubt, arose from the neglect of cleanliness, and not from the anger of the Almighty; for Henry, who was the perpetrator of that state-crime, went over to Calais, where he remained until the plague was past, and escaped untouched.

In the year 1499, the marriage alluded to in the last chapter, between Prince Arthur, then in his thirteenth year, and the Spanish princess, who was about a year his senior, was performed; the princess being represented by proxy. In 1501, Catharine of Aragon, as the princess was called, arrived in London; and, on the 6th of November, the ceremony was again performed at St. Paul's. A great deal of feasting and rejoicing followed this event; the prince was compared by the courtiers to Arcturus, and the princess to Hesperus; and it was confidently declared that they would shine in the world as brilliantly as those constellations do in the heavens. As if to mock all the vain and foolish prophecies of the courtiers, Arthur sickened and died on the 2nd of April, 1502, within six months after his marriage; and, it is alleged, before it was consummated. The Lady Catharine afterwards became a distinguished character in English history. Her father proposed that she should be allied to her late husband's younger brother, Henry, and the English sovereign consented to this strange arrangement. Prince Henry was not, at that time, twelve years old, and he made all the opposition he could to the match; but, as it was considered politically necessary, he was at once contracted to Catharine, though the marriage did not take place until five years afterwards.

On the 11th of February, 1503, the king also lost his queen, Elizabeth. She was much regretted by the people, who thought that her husband had not treated her as kindly as he should have done; but Henry himself was not much grieved. He had married her on account of her title to the throne, and had always been jealous of her in consequence. But, under any circumstances, he was too selfish a man to mourn greatly for any one.

Henry's prudence and enormous wealth made him much respected by foreign princes, and feared by his own people. He had gradually obtained a more absolute power over the nation than had been possessed by any English king since the time of the Conqueror.

Unrestrained by any opposition, he therefore gave himself up to the gratification of his ruling passion—avarice! He was haunted by an insatiable craving for money; and to obtain it, he resorted to shamefully unjust and oppressive methods. He employed two villanous lawyers, named Empson and Dudley, to wring money from his people. Empson was a low-bred violent ruffian, who tried to terrify men out of their property; Dudley was a person of education and gentlemanly manners, but just as dishonest and extortionate as the other. These worthies got up unjust claims and accusations against an immense number of people of property—the rich merchants of London being specially selected—who were committed to prison, but never brought to trial; and, after remaining in confinement until their spirits were broken, were made to pay large sums to recover their liberty. Henry's rapacious ministers disregarded all forms of law, and summoned men to their private houses, where arbitrary and wicked judgments were pronounced upon them. Sometimes, indeed, juries were called together; but, unless they gave such verdicts as were required of them, they were brow-beaten, insulted, fined, and even imprisoned. Men were harassed almost beyond endurance; no one was safe; and, to be rich, was to live in constant fear of ruin. Innocence and strictness of life was no protection from the fangs of Henry's legal wolves; for they invented fresh offences, and spies and informers abounded in every direction. A new kind of Inquisition was created in England, only less dreadful than that gloomy and mysterious tribunal, where the victims were taken from the dungeon and the torture chamber to perish in agony by fire. By these wicked proceedings thousands were ruined, and prosperous families turned into the streets to starve; but Henry amassed enormous wealth; and even Empson and Dudley became very rich.

It might have been expected that the parliament would have interfered to save the nation from such oppression; but it remained quiescent; and it is strange how much both parliament and people consented to suffer in past times, when they were governed by a powerful and tyrannical king. Edward II. was dethroned and cruelly murdered for conduct which was absolute purity in comparison with Henry's extortion. It is not very honourable to the English people, that, in the middle ages of their history, they usually only resisted weak kings, while they submitted, with a slavish readiness, to crafty or strong-handed tyrants. The reigns of the Tudors furnish far too many illustrations of an abject crouching of the nation beneath the frown of an unjust and imperious sovereign. Under Henry VII., the House of Commons, instead of checking the mean tyranny of their miserly king, actually complimented that monarch, when they assembled in 1504, by choosing Dudley for their speaker, and taxing the nation to any extent which he proposed. Thus, although the king's coffers were full of treasure, he continued to add to, and gloat over, his glittering stores.

There was at that time a young nobleman, named Edmond de la Pole, who bore the title of Earl of Suffolk. He was a nephew of Edward IV., and brother of that Earl of Lincoln who had been killed at the battle of Stoke, in the early part of Henry's reign. The king, by a dishonest quibble, deprived this young noble of his inheritance, and then took credit for generosity in returning him a small part of it to live upon. By this dishonesty, Henry not only gratified his love of money, but also his hatred of the family of York, to which Suffolk was closely related. The young noble, in a violent fit of passion, accidentally killed a man—a solemn offence, but one which, in the judgment of the law, is called manslaughter, and not murder. The king, wishing to humble the earl, caused him to be tried for the latter crime, and then commanded him to plead the royal pardon. Suffolk indignantly refused, and fled to the court of his aunt, the Duchess of Burgundy. Henry, however, by fresh promises of forgiveness, induced him to return; but soon afterwards he fled a second time to Flanders, taking with him his younger brother.

Henry suspected that their object was to take advantage of the unpopularity into which he had fallen on account of his extortions, and get up a new insurrection against him. To prevent this, he set to work in his usual subtle manner. He caused Sir Robert Curson, who held an important trust at Calais, suddenly to abandon it, and represent himself to the Earl of Suffolk as an injured and discontented man. This traitor crept into the confidence of the unsuspecting earl; learnt the names of those friends on whom he relied in England; and then forwarded them to the king. In consequence of this information, Henry arrested William de la Pole, a younger brother of the earl, Lord Courtenay, Sir William Windham, Sir James Tyrrel, and some other persons. It was difficult to urge any particular crimes against them; but Henry suspected and disliked them, and that was sufficient. Lord Courtenay and William de la Pole were sent prisoners to the Tower, where they remained during the life of the king, and Windham and Tyrrel were beheaded as traitors. The people rejoiced in the death of the latter, because he had, many years ago, been concerned in the murder of the young princes in the Tower.

After the treacherous Curson had thus ruined or destroyed the friends of the Earl of Suffolk, he suddenly abandoned him and returned to Henry, who received him into great favour. Suffolk was bewildered at the duplicity of the man whom he had received as his friend; and not knowing where Henry's power might reach him, he fled first to France, then to Germany, and returned, at last, into the Low Countries.

The Archduke Philip, sovereign of the Netherlands, and his wife Joanna, Queen of Castile, were, while at sea, driven by a storm into the harbour of Weymouth. Sir John Trenchard and Sir John Cary, gentlemen of authority in the neighbourhood, invited the royal wanderers to their houses, and behaved to them with all humanity and respect. At the same time, however, they sent a messenger to the king, to inform him of what had happened; and he returned for answer that he would pay Philip and his queen, Joanna, a visit before their departure, to congratulate them upon their arrival on his shores. Philip, after receiving this message, knew that he could not depart until Henry had seen him; and, for the sake of saving time, he himself rode to Windsor to confer with the English monarch.

Henry met his guest at Elworth Green, near Windsor, and conducted him to the castle, where he was lodged in a magnificent suite of apartments. But the King of Castile, as Philip was called in right of his queen, Joanna, was in reality little better than a prisoner. Before Henry permitted him to depart, he wrung from Philip his signature to a treaty of commerce, greatly in favour of the English government; and, after that, complained that the Earl of Suffolk had found a shelter in his dominions. "I really thought," said the King of Castile, "that your greatness and felicity had set you far above apprehensions from any person of so little consequence: but, to give you satisfaction, I will banish him." Henry replied, "I expect that you will carry your complaisance further; I desire to have Suffolk put into my hands, where alone I can depend upon his submission and obedience." Philip hesitated to give up a man who had trusted to his generosity and protection; and he said, "Such an action will reflect dishonour upon you as well as myself. You will be thought to have treated me as a prisoner." "Then the matter is settled," replied Henry, "for I will take all the dishonour upon me, and so your honour will be saved from blemish." The King of Castile was obliged to consent; but he did so only on condition that Henry should spare Suffolk's life. This was promised; and then Philip wrote to the earl, and induced him to come over to England on a promise of pardon. Suffolk came, and was instantly committed to the Tower. Philip and his queen were then permitted to depart, after having been detained by Henry in a sort of honourable captivity for nearly three months. Suffolk was kept a prisoner for a few years; but, on his deathbed, Henry left an order for the earl's execution, and he was beheaded accordingly, by the order of Henry VIII., in 1513; no new offence having been alleged against the unfortunate nobleman.

Henry wanted another wife, but his chief object was to acquire money or territory by the lady; and though he entered into several matrimonial negotiations, he was disappointed in all. His declining state of health soon drew his attention to other and more solemn matters.

The last two years of his life, Henry was in a very feeble state of health. He suffered both from gout and from that mysterious scourge of England, which has been metaphorically called, "the destroying angel who claims a fourth of those who die"—consumption. His lungs were wasted by severe fits of coughing, which attacked him periodically three times a year. A fear of death excited great apprehensions in his mind; and he endeavoured to avert the Almighty's anger by acts of charity to the poor; and by ordering all prisoners, who were confined for debts of less than forty shillings, to be set at liberty. When very bad, he felt great remorse on account of the extortions which he had permitted Dudley and Empson to inflict on his people. He even talked about restoring to his subjects the money he had robbed them of; but, as soon as he got better, these penitent fancies vanished, and his two wicked finance-ministers were permitted to oppress the people as much as ever. Sir William Capel, Mayor of London, was a second time prosecuted upon some false pretence, and condemned to pay a fine of £2,000. This man possessed the old English spirit, and very properly refused to pay a shilling. For this spirited conduct he was committed to the Tower, where he remained a prisoner until Henry's death. Three other wealthy citizens were thrown into prison, and kept there until they bought their liberty with a sum of £1,400. Hawes, an alderman, was indicted, and died of vexation before the proceedings against him were concluded; and Sir Lawrence Aylmer, who had been Lord Mayor, and his two sheriffs, were fined £1,000; but they, like Sir William Capel, honourably preferred imprisonment to a mean submission to this harassing tyranny.

Thus this wealthy, but mean-spirited, king ground his people to the very last; but this career of craft and extortion was about to close for ever. The bleak damp air of the spring of 1509 aggravated his disorder so much that he felt the approach of death. Again his mind was agitated with the remembrance of his cruelties and extortions; and he urged his son to make restitution to all whom he had injured. The number of robberies which he had committed upon his people rendered this impossible; nor would he have given the matter another thought if he had recovered. He died in his palace at Richmond, on the 21st of April, 1509, in the 52nd year of his age, having reigned twenty-three years and eight months. The nation openly rejoiced at his death; and throughout England not one sigh of regret was uttered, except by his villanous financiers and collectors, who had some cause to fear the vengeance of the people now that their protector lay cold in his coffin.

To judge the character of Henry VII. by the ordinary rules of morality and Christian feeling, he must be spoken of in terms of the heaviest censure. That is, however, a test which it is hardly fair, in all cases, to apply to kings and statesmen who lived in an age when different feelings and principles prevailed than those which now influence us. Kings have not the same chance as private persons of becoming good men. They are exposed to temptations which intoxicate weak minds, and corrupt and harden strong ones. Far removed from the common wants and distresses to which most of us are subject, they too often lose that wholesome sympathy with their fellow-creatures which is called humanity. The power that is entrusted to them for the public good, is frequently, as in Henry's case, improperly diverted to private and selfish purposes; and sometimes, the man whom a nation tries to elevate into a sort of worldly deity, is corrupted, by the falsehood of flattery, into an incarnate demon. The famous Macedonian conqueror of antiquity, whose character Julius Cæsar studied as a model for imitation (Alexander the Great), was well aware of the false state of things in which monarchs dwelt, when he commanded a servant to remind him every morning that he was mortal.

As will be seen from the narrative of his reign, Henry had many faults; but he was not all evil. He was a tyrant, but yet a tyrant whose reign was rather advantageous to his country. Under his rule, the power of the barons was finally overthrown; and the nation had to submit to the will of one arbitrary man, instead of many. The middle classes of the country rose in greater estimation; and as the extravagance of the nobles often induced them to sell their estates, rich merchants and tradesmen became landed proprietors. Thus the aristocracy of industry and commerce rose in proportion as the aristocracy of war and violence sank. These nobles themselves were disgusted with the rude military lives their ancestors had led; and, hanging up their swords and coats of mail, they spent their time more in the library than on the battle-field. The effect of these changes was beneficial to the people; and we are told by Cavendish, Cardinal Wolsey's secretary and biographer, that when Henry VIII. ascended the throne, England was "called the golden world, such grace of plenty reigned then within this realm."

The greatest stain on the character of Henry VII. was his avarice; his love of money amounted to madness; it was the crime of his life, and the nurse of nearly all his tyrannies. He was extremely cunning; so much so that he preferred artifice to openness, when one would have served his purpose as well as the other; and loved trickery for its own sake. Indeed, his was an age when subtlety was in fashion with princes; and all the great sovereigns of Europe were trying who could be most crafty and indirect. In such a state of feeling, truth, manly openness, and lofty principles, were either forgotten or despised as simplicity. Henry's Machiavelian policy makes us often despise him; and his miserly love of gold led him into many actions of gross dishonesty and oppression. But, though arbitrary, he was not capriciously tyrannical: though usually severe, he was not naturally cruel. His conduct both to Simnel and Warbeck was lenient. He certainly sent the latter to the gibbet, but not without repeated aggressions, and many attempts on the part of that remarkable impostor to escape, and renew his efforts to sustain his fraudulent claim to the throne. Edward IV., or his brother, Richard III., would have put both Simnel and Warbeck to death at once, without the slightest hesitation; but Henry punished his enemies from motives of policy, and seldom from revenge. Indeed, his feelings scarcely ever interfered with his judgment, which was both clear and strong. His courtiers called him a second Solomon; but though he was a man of considerable talents, and evinced skill and judgment on many occasions, the application to him of that title was gross flattery. He was active, cautious, deliberate, and prudent; but certainly not possessed of either the capacity for profound thought, or the genius to conceive great and noble measures. A mean-minded, clever man, never actuated by lofty or purely honourable motives, he was an able, though not a good king. He crushed the numerous obstacles by which he was surrounded; and, by industry, caution, and deliberation, triumphed over all difficulties. His object was, to establish a despotic government in England; and he, in part, succeeded: but though the spirit and liberties of the people bowed in terror before him, they were only awed, not extinguished—thrown into slumber, not death; and the national energy and independence of character, though doomed to be still further depressed, was yet, in after-times, to rise with a might and majesty which they had never yet assumed.

Although the church of Rome was on the eve of its downfall in this country, yet, in the reign of Henry VII., its bishops and priests continued in their course of persecution, and endeavoured to stifle inquiry and dissent (which they called heresy) in fire, and to drown it in blood. Though so near that great Reformation which convulsed all Europe, the church felt, in that era, no diminution of the power it had enjoyed so long. Indeed, Henry was much attached to the priesthood, and bestowed on them nearly all the responsible offices of the state. Many persons perished in agony at the stake for entertaining the new doctrines in religion; but the most memorable of these unhappy martyrs was an elderly widow lady, named Joan Boughton.

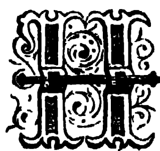
This venerable woman, the first of her sex who had been burnt to death in England for religious opinions, was upwards of eighty years of age. She was put to this cruel torture in the year 1494, the ninth of Henry's reign, for following the doctrine of the reformer, Wycliffe. So convinced was she of the truth of her opinions, that all the priests and learned doctors in London could not turn her from them. When they told her that she should be burnt for her obstinacy and false belief, the heroic old lady defied their power; and said that she was so beloved of God and his holy angels, that she did not fear the flames. When the fatal pile of faggots was lighted, and the fire blazed and crackled around her aged figure, she only called to God to receive her soul, and so perished. The stern and bitter priests turned away disappointed; they could destroy the body of the martyr who sought the truth, but the eternal principles of truth itself they could not touch. Men walked moodily from the smouldering embers of that brave woman, and questioned if a church which could sanction such cruelties, could be fulfilling the spirit of the merciful Jesus, whose sternest reproof to the erring was, "Go, and sin no more."

Even burning those who differed from them in opinion at the stake, would not satisfy the priests of the persecuting Romish church. In the year 1506, one William Tylsworth was put to death in this revolting manner, at Amersham, in Buckinghamshire: and to make his sufferings more poignant, his only daughter, who was suspected of sharing his opinions, was compelled, with her own hands, to set fire to the funeral pile. One poor man, who was thrown into the bishop's prison in Buckinghamshire, was placed in so small a cell, and ironed so heavily, that, although his confinement lasted only fourteen weeks, he was never able to stand upright again. About the same time thirty people were branded on the right cheek with a hot iron, "because," says Foxe, "they would talk against superstition and idolatry, and were desirous to hear and read the Holy Scriptures." Among the other victims of intolerance during this reign was one Thomas Chase, who was secretly murdered by his gaolers in the Lollards' tower. It was pretended that he hanged himself in prison; but that was impossible, as the cell in which he was confined was too small to allow him to stand upright.



But the victim of the Romish church, during this reign, who excited the greatest sympathy, was one Laurence Ghest, who was burnt to death in Salisbury, for denying that the bread and wine, in the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, was really the body and blood of the Saviour. The particulars of the death of that unhappy man are thus related by John Foxe, the martyrologist:—"He was of a comely and tall personage, and otherwise not unfriended, for which the bishop and the clergy were the more loath to burn him, but kept him in prison for the space of two years. This Laurence had a wife and seven children. Wherefore they, thinking to influence and persuade his mind by awakening his fatherly affection toward his children, when the time came which they appointed for his burning, as he was at the stake they brought before him his wife and his seven children. At the sight of them, although nature is commonly wont to work in other men, yet in him religion overcoming nature, made his constancy remain immovable: so that, when his wife exhorted and desired him to save himself, he began to desire her to be content, and not to be a stumbling-block in his way, for he was in a good course, running toward the mark of his salvation; and so fire being put to him he finished his life, renouncing not only wife and children, but also himself, to follow Christ. As he was burning, one of the bishop's men threw a firebrand at his face. At this, the brother of Laurence, who was standing by, ran at him with his dagger, and would have slain him had he not been otherwise prevented."

To mention all the victims of the priests in the reign of Henry VII., would encroach too much on the space allotted to this history. The examples given are not meant to excite an undue indignation against the Romish church, but rather to inculcate the true Christian doctrine of being kind and indulgent to all who differ from us in opinion in any matter, but chiefly in religion. Man delights to punish, but God to spare. We should remember that thousands of the best and wisest men have held different opinions upon this mysterious theme; and that charity and kindly forbearance to all persons is the conduct most acceptable to that Divine and Benevolent Being whose word created the universe, and whose will regulates and sustains it.

The period during which Henry VII. reigned was remarkable for two famous nautical discoveries, which were of deep importance and interest to the whole civilised world. The first was the discovery of the vast continent of America, in the year 1492, by Christopher Columbus, a Genoese; and the second, the achievement of the passage to India past the Cape of Good Hope, in 1497, by Vasquez de Gama, a native of Portugal.

CHAPTER XLVI.

THE REIGN OF HENRY THE EIGHTH.—A.D. 1509—1515.

HENRY VIII. was only eighteen years of age at the time of his father's death. His accession was the cause of great joy to the people, who entertained cheerful hopes of his good government and future glory. It was very natural that they should do so; for Henry was young, handsome, full of spirit, cheerful and frank in his manners, well educated, and possessed of considerable abilities. In almost all things he was just the reverse of his father, for whom every one felt a great dislike; and the nation believed that he would become a wise, just, and merciful sovereign. It will be seen, from the narrative, that these bright anticipations were far from being realised. Still, the thirty-seven years which Henry reigned over England, is a period of our history deserving more attention and study than any that had preceded it. Strange as it may seem, out of his tyranny arose the greatest of reforms; and from the prostrate and trampled liberties of Englishmen sprung that most valuable and blessed of all liberties, the liberty of conscience—the freedom of the soul, and the holy right of every one to read the Bible for themselves, and to exercise their own judgment upon its sacred doctrines.

The young king was proclaimed on the 22nd of April; and, on the 7th of the following June, he was married to the Spanish princess, Catharine of Aragon, the widow of his brother Arthur. Some objections were raised to Henry's marrying his sister-in-law; but a dispensation was procured from the pope, which rendered it legal. Catharine's marriage with Prince Arthur had been a mere form, and the young people had not lived together as husband and wife, though, in after-times, it suited Henry to pretend that he believed they had. The princess was attractive in her appearance, and amiable in disposition; and another reason for the marriage was, that a large dowry had been paid with her by the Spanish king, Ferdinand, which Henry was by no means inclined to return. Three weeks after their marriage, the royal couple were crowned as King and Queen of England.

Henry kept the chief of his late father's ministers, most of whom were men of talent and experience. Two of them were not only deprived of office, but sent to the Tower, to await a well-deserved punishment. These were Dudley and Empson, the lawyers who had pandered to the avarice of the late king, and practised so many extortions and cruelties upon his subjects. As soon as it was known that they were arrested, charges against them were made from immense numbers of people, and a loud outcry was raised for their execution. They could not be tried for their real crimes without casting disgrace upon the memory of the late king; so a false charge was made against them (A.D. 1511), of endeavouring to depose their sovereign, and they were condemned as traitors. For about a twelvemonth after sentence was pronounced they were kept in prison, when so loud a clamour arose for their deaths that they were brought out (A.D. 1512), and beheaded on Tower Hill. So great was the fury of the people against these extortioners, that the mob seized many of their spies and informers, and beat and ill-used them till they died.

At this time, Pope Julius II., who loved fighting much better than praying, had set many of the great nations of Europe together by the ears. Having overthrown the republic of Venice, he turned his arms against France, and induced the King of Spain to join him in a league to expel that nation from Italy. He also courted the alliance of England, and sent Henry a sacred rose perfumed with musk, sprinkled with holy water, and which had received the pontiff's benediction. The pope could hardly have sent him a cheaper present: but Henry prized it. What, however, tempted him much more strongly to comply with the pope's wish, and join in hostilities against France, was the hope that to him would be transferred the title borne by the sovereign of that country, of "Most Christian King." The young monarch was also eager for military glory, and anxious to spend the vast treasures his grasping father had left, and which were said to amount to £1,800,000; so he interfered on behalf of the pope, and sent a message to the French king to prohibit him from waging war upon the sovereign pontiff. Of course, Louis paid no attention to this impertinent command; and then Henry sent another message, demanding that the provinces of Anjou, Maine, Normandy, and Guienne, should instantly be delivered up to him as his lawful inheritance. This was the same as a declaration of war, for Henry knew that they would not be surrendered, and he summoned a parliament, and applied to it for money for the invasion of France.

The parliament of 1511-'12 readily voted the money, and the people readily paid it; for they were delighted at the idea of a war with France, and dreamed of obtaining new military triumphs like those of Crecy and Agincourt. Henry, unlike his father, applied the money to the purpose for which it was voted. He raised an army, which he intended should enter France through his own town of Calais; but his father-in-law, Ferdinand, the King of Spain, persuaded him to commence his attack in the south of France, and send his army to Guienne, where the sway of the English was still regretted. In that case, he said, he could assist Henry with a Spanish force; and he even sent over a fleet to transport the English army to the scene of action.

Ten thousand men, under the command of the Marquis of Dorset, embarked in the Spanish ships, and were carried, in June, 1512, to Fuente-Rabia, near the mouth of the river Bidassoa. But Ferdinand's object was not to assist the English against France, but to make them, unknowingly, assist him in the conquest of Navarre, a small kingdom on the frontiers of France and Spain. The presence of an English force in the Bidassoa prevented the French from sending any assistance to the King of Navarre, and that country was overcome by Ferdinand's troops, and annexed to the Spanish monarchy. Dorset perceived the trick that had been played upon him, and called upon the Spaniards to assist him in the siege of Bayonne and Bordeaux; but the Spanish commander very coolly replied, that he would march nowhere but towards Bearn, where the unfortunate King of Navarre had taken refuge. Dorset refused to make war upon any place but France, according to his instructions, and King Ferdinand sent an ambassador to England, to complain of the conduct of the marquis. Henry and his council did not perceive how completely they had been tricked; and they sent orders to Dorset to remain with the army where he was, and act in unison with the Spaniards. The English soldiers had been perishing from sickness and want of proper food; and when this order arrived, they mutinied and insisted on returning home. Thus the army, which was sent to conquer France, came back without drawing a sword. Henry was exceedingly angry, and scarcely better pleased when the trick which Ferdinand had practised was made clear to him. But as the offenders were too numerous for him to punish them all, he put on the best face he could, and pardoned them.

The same year the English engaged the French at sea, and suffered a partial defeat. An English fleet of forty-five ships encountered a French fleet of but thirty-nine ships near Brest, and after a savage conflict, in which the vessels of both the French and English admirals were burnt and sunk, the former had rather the advantage.

Louis then collected his fleet, and strengthened it very considerably; and in the March of 1513, Sir Edward Howard, the lord admiral, was sent by Henry to scour the Channel, and then attack the French navy at Brest. Howard was so sure of the victory, that he sent a letter to the king, desiring him to come in person and take the glory of it. But Henry had no fancy for glory that was attended by peril; and he caused his ministers to send a sharp message to the admiral, reproving him for tempting his sovereign into danger, and telling him to do his duty. Howard felt hurt, and fought with a reckless bravery that cost him his life. Sailing into the harbour of Brest among the French fleet, he lashed his ship to that of the French admiral, and leaped on board, followed by only eighteen of his crew. The French immediately cut the cable which held the two vessels together, the English galley drifted away, and Howard and his few brave men were surrounded by some hundreds of French. Before they could be rescued, they were all killed and thrown overboard. Their brave leader, seeing that death was inevitable, took his gold chain and whistle, the badges of his office, from his neck, and threw them into the sea. Such trophies, he said, should never fall into the hands of his enemies. The English were disheartened by the death of their brave commander, and sailed mournfully away: the French were so encouraged, that they ventured to invade the coast of Sussex, but were speedily driven back to their ships. Henry sincerely regretted the death of Sir Edward Howard, and appointed his brother, Sir Thomas, to succeed him as lord admiral.

For some months another army had been getting ready for the invasion of France; and Henry thought to retrieve all former disgraces by taking the command of it himself. On the 30th of June, 1513, he landed at Calais with the main body of his army, having sent before an immense detachment to prepare the way, and bear the brunt of the danger. Henry only liked the pride and pomp of war, its stateliness, its finery, its floating banners, its inspiriting music, and the roar of cannons fired as salutes: as far as real fighting was concerned, he took care to keep as much as possible out of the reach of it.

The detachments which preceded Henry to Calais, under the command of Lord Herbert and the Earl of Shrewsbury, had marched to Terouenne and laid siege to that place. Henry, on his arrival, remained for some time at Calais, occupied with frivolous and unwarlike amusements. Among his counsellors was a keen-eyed, frank-looking, and rather handsome priest, about forty years of age, who was conspicuous for his assiduous attention to the king, and in whose society Henry spent much of his time. This man was Thomas Wolsey, the king's almoner, who soon became, and for nearly twenty years remained, the most distinguished and extraordinary man in England.

Henry was roused from his pleasures by the intelligence that a French army, under the command of the Duke de Longueville and the famous Chevalier Bayard, was advancing to the relief of Terouenne. The dilatory English king then marched towards that town with an army of 15,000 men. On his way, a strong detachment of French cavalry appeared in sight, each man having behind him a sack of gunpowder and two quarters of bacon. These they contrived to throw into the besieged town, and then they hastily retired. Henry thought they rode away for fear of him; but they had executed their orders, and relieved the wants of their countrymen.

When Henry arrived before the walls of Terouenne, he was joined by his ally, the Emperor Maximilian, a prince considered to be the first sovereign in Europe, but who was so poor, that he was called "Maximilian the Moneyless." He had received the sum of 120,000 crowns from Henry to provide troops, to aid in the conquest of France; but having pocketed the money, he came with little more than his personal attendants. He endeavoured to make up for his want of good faith by ministering to the vanity of Henry, which he had discovered was enormous. Maximilian told him that he, the Emperor of the West, had come to serve under the great King of England; and Henry was so fooled by this idle compliment, that he not only excused the breach of his engagement, of which the emperor had been guilty, but actually allowed him 100 crowns a day for his expenses.

Henry was so far from being likely to accomplish the conquest of France, that his army had been six weeks encamped before the walls of Terouenne, without being able even to take so unimportant a town. The French army then advanced, and on the 18th of August a singular conflict took place. Their cavalry, after approaching the English, were suddenly seized with a strange panic, and galloped back upon their own lines, which they threw into confusion. The Englishmen immediately charged with a shout of "St. George! St. George!" and the French army fled without striking a blow. The Duke de Longueville, the Chevalier Bayard, and other officers, who scorned to fly, were taken prisoners. This affair was sometimes called the battle of Guinegate, from the name of the place where it was fought; but it was long known as the Battle of the Spurs, as the French had made more use of their spurs than of their swords.

After this success, Henry, who was now at the head of an army of 50,000 men, might have followed up his advantage and struck a serious blow at France, especially as his allies, the Swiss, with 20,000 men, had crossed the Jura mountains, penetrated into Burgundy, and were laying siege to Dijon, its capital. But the English king did not understand war, and was beginning to be heartily tired of it. After remaining at Terouenne till the 27th of August, when that place surrendered, he wanted to go home to his queen and his pleasures. But as he very properly feared the just contempt of his people if he should return after having talked so much and done so little, he turned back to Tournay, and laid siege to that city. Tournay, though it belonged to France, lay within the frontiers of Flanders, injured the trade of the Flemings, and gave the French a passage into the heart of the country. Maximilian longed for its destruction; and it was by his advice that Henry undertook to besiege it. Indeed, all through these inglorious conflicts, the English king was constantly being tricked into fighting for other people's advantage. The men of Tournay were very bold at first, and, in their foolish confidence, rejected the aid of a garrison of royal troops, which the French king offered them. When, however, they heard the roar of the English cannon, their hearts failed them, and on the 29th of September they surrendered. Henry gave himself as many airs as if he were a great conqueror; and, soon after the surrender of Tournay, he returned to England, where he arrived on the 22nd of October, having been absent not quite four months.

While Henry was parading himself and his troops in France, a great victory was won by the Earl of Surrey over the Scots. James IV., the king of that people, was in alliance with the French, and sought to aid them by an invasion of England. James sent a herald with a letter to Henry, who was then at Terouenne, desiring that he would desist from further hostilities against the French king; and adding that, unless he did so, he should feel justified in compelling him to abandon so unjust a war. Henry burst into a violent passion, and asked the herald if he would take back a verbal answer to his master. That functionary asked for a message in writing; but, at the same time, reminded Henry that James's demand was not that he should write him a letter, but that he should straightway leave the war and return into his own country. Henry answered—"That I shall do at my own pleasure, and not at your king's command!" The herald rejoined by a denunciation of war, and then retired.

King James was as good as his word; and, on the 22nd of August, 1513, he crossed the borders, at the head of an army of 50,000 men. For some time he loitered on the banks of the Tweed, and took several border fortresses. The Earl of Surrey made good use of this delay; and, collecting an army of 26,000 soldiers, approached the Scots, and challenged them to battle. James accepted the challenge, and made preparations for the coming contest; but many of his troops had deserted on account of a want of provisions, and his nobles advised him not to risk an engagement. He treated their advice with disdain, and told the brave old

Earl of Angus, that, if he was afraid of the English, he could go home. The aged warrior burst into tears, and departed, saying, "Age renders my body of no use in battle, and my counsel is despised; but I leave my two sons and the vassals of Douglas in the field: may old Angus's foreboding prove unfounded."

The two armies met on Friday, the 9th of September, 1513, at a place called Flodden Field. The battle began at about four in the afternoon, and, after a furious contest, victory seemed to incline to the Scots; but the impetuosity of the Highlanders, who were cruelly galled by the English bowmen, induced them to quit their ranks, and rush upon their foes with their broadswords. The result was, that they were baffled by the intrepid coolness of the English, and thrown into confusion. The English then attacked the centre of the Scottish army, both in the front rear and on the right flank; and the battle was waged with such fury that the soldiers took off their shoes, that they might obtain a firmer footing on the ground, which was rendered slippery with blood. The Scottish king was struck almost at the same moment by an arrow and an axe, and fell dead. His troops closed around the body, and still fought, until darkness put an end to the slaughter.

The English passed the night under arms, and kept strict watches; but the rising sun revealed to them that they were the victors. The Scots had silently retired, leaving 10,000 of their companions lying dead upon the field. Many of the bodies on that ghastly ground were quite naked; for, during the night, the borderers who fought under the standard of Lord Home stripped the dead, and carried off the blood-stained garments of the silent warriors. The corpse of the Scottish king was found beneath a heap of dead, and sent by the Earl of Surrey to London. It was afterwards buried in the monastery of Sheen, now called Richmond. Besides the king, thirteen Scottish earls perished; and it is said that there was scarcely a family in the country that had not one of its members to mourn for. Thus ended the fatal battle of Flodden Field—a battle which plunged the Scottish nation into the deepest grief, and filled the land, from one extremity to the other, with weeping widows and orphans. The loss of the English was too considerable to permit Surrey to follow up his victory.

The Scottish people would not at first believe that their king was dead. It was reported that he had been seen crossing the river Tweed at Kelso; some said that he had been murdered by the vassals of Lord Home; while others declared that he had gone on a pilgrimage to the Holy Land, to pray for the souls of his slaughtered nobles, and spend the remainder of his life in penitence and prayer. But these were idle stories; James perished on the battle-field; and his sword and dagger, together with a turquoise ring which was taken from his corpse, are still preserved in the Herald's College at London.

To reward the Earl of Surrey for this great victory, Henry restored him to his hereditary title of Duke of Norfolk, which had been forfeited by his father, who perished in arms against the Earl of Richmond on the field of Bosworth. Margaret, the widow of the King of Scotland, who was now appointed regent of that country, was Henry's sister; and she wrote to her brother, imploring his forbearance towards herself and her helpless infant. It is much to the credit of Henry that he extended to her the kindness that she asked; and he consented to grant a peace to Scotland. But his generosity proceeded partly from prudence; for he had no wish again to encounter so brave a nation.

Peace with Scotland was soon followed by peace with France. The allies of Henry had all entered into separate treaties with Louis XII., and left the English sovereign either to carry on the war against France by himself, or get out of the difficulty the best way he could. In this state of things, the Duke de Longueville, who had been taken prisoner at the Battle of the Spurs, and was living at the English court, proposed a peace and alliance between Henry and his sovereign. He thought it would be an excellent bond of union, if the French king, who had lately lost his queen, was to marry Henry's sister, the beautiful Princess Mary. Certainly there was a great difference in the age of the parties; for Louis was fifty-three, and the princess only sixteen; he was also a confirmed and feeble invalid, and she in all the vigour and rosy bloom of healthy youth. Besides these objections, the princess loved some one else—the handsome and accomplished Charles Brandon, Viscount Lisle; but Henry approved of the suggestion, and Louis was delighted with it. A treaty was therefore entered into; peace was to reign between the two nations; and the princess was compelled to marry her royal, but feeble and ill-matched, admirer. The ceremony took place in the October of 1514, the French king at the time suffering severely from the gout. On the 5th of November the queen was crowned; and, on the first day of the very next year, the royal Adonis died, and left the beautiful Mary a widow. Before her husband had been two months in the grave, the young lady asked her former lover, Charles Brandon, who had been created Duke of Suffolk, whether he had courage to marry her at once, and trust afterwards to obtain her brother's forgiveness. The duke was too gallant to refuse such an offer; and he and the late Queen of France were privately married at Paris. King Henry was very indignant at first, for he thought such a match beneath the rank of his sister; but, as he was much attached to Suffolk, he soon relented, and received them both into his favour.

CHAPTER XLVII.

CONTINUATION OF THE REIGN OF HENRY THE EIGHTH.—A.D. 1515—1521.

BEFORE we proceed further with the historical narrative, it will be necessary to glance at the rise of Thomas Wolsey, first mentioned a few pages back, and who by this time had risen to the dignity of cardinal. This extraordinary man was, for many years, Henry's principal adviser, minister, and favourite. He was born at Ipswich, in Suffolk, being, as Cavendish informs us, "an honest, poor man's son." His father exercised the calling of a butcher, but had sufficient discrimination to observe that his son possessed more than common intelligence. He gave him an excellent preparatory education, and then sent him to Oxford University, to study for the church. There his progress was so rapid, that he gained the distinction of being called the "Boy-Bachelor," in consequence of obtaining the Bachelor's degree at the age of fifteen. Having taught for some time at the grammar-school adjoining Magdalen College, he obtained (A.D. 1500), the parsonage of Lymington, in Somersetshire, through the patronage of the Marquis of Dorset, one of whose sons had been under his tuition. At this time he was rather wild and indecorous in his manner of living; and it is related, that he was, on one occasion, placed in the stocks by Sir Amias Paulet, a neighbouring magistrate, for some misconduct.

Leaving Lymington, probably in consequence of this punishment, he became domestic chaplain to the treasurer of Calais. The treasurer, finding that Wolsey was a man of great abilities, recommended him to Bishop Fox, one of the ministers of Henry VII. The bishop was pleased with the talents of the young priest, and recommended him to his sovereign as a useful and business-like person. The king, who was a good judge of character, received Wolsey into his favour; and, after preferring him to the deanery of Lincoln, made him his almoner. Of his industry and intelligence while in the service of Henry, the following incident will give a good idea. The king having sent him on a commission to a foreign prince, who was residing at Brussels, was surprised to see him, in less than three days afterwards, present himself before him. Supposing that he had not yet started on his journey, his sovereign began to reprove him for his delay. Wolsey informed him that he had just returned from Brussels, and had successfully fulfilled all his majesty's commands. "But, on second thoughts," continued the king, "I found that something was omitted in your orders; and have sent a messenger after you with fuller instructions." "I met the messenger on my return," said Wolsey; "but, as I had reflected on that omission, I ventured of myself to execute what I knew must be your majesty's intentions." Promptness, industry, and intelligence like this seldom fail to win their way; and Wolsey would, no doubt, have been further promoted by Henry VII., but for the death of that monarch.

When the young king, Henry VIII., ascended the throne, Bishop Fox found that the Earl of Surrey, afterwards created Duke of Norfolk for his victory over the Scots at Flodden Field, was his successful rival for the favour of the sovereign. The bishop introduced Wolsey to the notice of the king, with instructions that he should assist him in his views, and with the hope that he would draw away the affection of that prince from Surrey. Wolsey's talent and craftiness enabled him to supplant them both, and establish himself as the chief favourite of the king.

Though Wolsey was a priest, and about twenty years older than Henry, he entered freely into all the pleasures and tastes of his sovereign. He read books of divinity with him, or talked gaily about the various styles of beauty and dress shown by the most lovely ladies of the court. He would amuse the king with a learned discourse, or a cheerful song, and pass from pleasure to business without an effort. He loved gaiety and magnificence, and arranged all the young monarch's feasts and pageants; but, above all, he flattered Henry in a manner so gross, that it would have been apparent to anybody, except the vain and conceited king. Henry hated business, and loved to devote his hours to pleasure without control. Wolsey encouraged him in this course, and gradually got all the state affairs into his hands. He told him that he should hawk and hunt, and amuse himself with those pastimes to which his elevated rank entitled him; and that, whenever he wished to learn the business of his kingdom, his humble servant would relate in an evening, in a few words, the substance of a whole day's consultation.

By this crafty and courtier-like conduct, he soon became appointed, first, in 1514, to the bishopric of Lincoln; then, in 1515, to the archbishopric of York; and, in 1516, to the lofty and responsible office of chancellor of the kingdom. Besides these great dignities, he held many other very profitable preferments in the church; indeed, so many, that the butcher's son had risen to be the richest, and, except the king, the most powerful person in the land. The pope, also, anxious to win a person of such importance to his interest, made the wealthy priest a cardinal in the same year in which he obtained the great seal; and in the following year, Leo X. appointed him his legate, with the highest powers appertaining to that office.

Wolsey showed himself fit for his good fortune; his great talents were quite equal to the stress laid upon them, and he administered justice with impartiality. Though he afterwards became very much disliked by the people, he was at that time exceedingly popular; for he was not only the richest, but the most generous and magnificent, of the king's subjects. He feasted the nobles; encouraged learned men; endowed colleges; and was very liberal to the poor. Still he was grasping, haughty, and very fond of a display of finery. He is said to have doubled his immense income by the sale of preferments in the church; he gave away benefices, the right of patronage in which belonged to others; and all persons who committed offences were called before him, and made to pay such fines as he pleased to inflict upon them. These things, in time, made him many enemies, who longed for the ruin of the fortunate priest.

His fondness of finery and display was exemplified by his love of dress. He wore silks and satins; and even his shoes were ornamented with pearls and diamonds. When he appeared in public, the cardinal's hat was carried before him by a lord; for he had no less than nine or ten noblemen among his attendants, who are said to have amounted altogether to the enormous number of 800. Before him walked his pursuivant-at-arms, carrying a silver-gilt mace; then came two gentlemen with silver staves; and then two tall and handsome priests, holding aloft immense silver crosses. Behind the cardinal rode a troop of horsemen, all richly dressed. Wolsey, himself, as a priest, sat upon a mule; but the trappings of the animal were of crimson velvet, ornamented with gold. In the end, the king got envious of all this magnificence; but, for a time, he liked it; as he fancied that, his minister being so great, he, of necessity, must be greater. And Wolsey was very vain of all his power and wealth, which gave him hopes of becoming pope, and caused him to think himself superior to all his brother priests. When the Archbishop of Canterbury, having written him a letter, signed himself, "your loving brother," Wolsey complained of his presumption. The archbishop, on being told of this, merely replied, "This man is drunk with too much prosperity."

For some years affairs went on quietly in England; though the quiet, to some extent, resembled the hush and calmness which precede a storm. Few events of any historical importance took place. Peace existed between King Henry and Francis I., who had succeeded Louis XII. upon the throne of France; and the English sovereign so much admired the bravery and spirit of the French king, that he proposed a personal interview. Francis readily consented; and everybody was delighted with the idea of two wealthy and powerful monarchs meeting for the purpose of exchanging compliments and kind words. The interview was put off for a time, in consequence of the death, in January, 1519, of Maximilian, the Emperor of Germany. Henry of England, Francis of France, and Charles of Spain, became candidates for the imperial crown; for the emperors did not succeed by hereditary right, but were elected to their elevated rank by the petty princes of Germany. Henry had no reasonable cause to suppose he would be elected; but he was disappointed when Charles of Spain was chosen. As Francis was also unsuccessful, the friendship between him and Henry remained uninterrupted.

The proposed interview between the two monarchs took place in the month of June, 1520, in a plain between Guisnes and Ardres. The French and English nobility vied with each other who should make the most magnificent display; and many spent their whole fortunes, and ruined themselves, to provide costly dresses and equipages. Henry had a wooden palace built for his residence, which resembled those beautiful structures read of in fairy tales. Before it was a gilded fountain, spouting forth many sorts of wine, and an exquisitely carved column, supported by four gilded lions, wreathed with flowers. Upon the tower and battlements of the palace, were statues of gigantic warriors, seemingly in the act of hurling down great stones upon the heads of those below; and other statues of the heroes of classical mythology. The furniture of the interior was exceedingly gorgeous, and the walls and altar of the little chapel were radiant with gold and brilliant gems. Henry had a Latin motto placed over this magnificent habitation—Cui adhaereo praest; which means, "He prevails whom I support." It implied that he held the balance of power between the great monarchs of Europe: which, indeed, to some extent, he did. Wolsey arranged all this pomp and magnificence.

Francis, the French king, had an immense pavilion in the form of a dome, the outside of which was covered with cloth of gold; and the inside, which was concave, was lined with blue velvet, and studded with golden stars, to represent the sky. Unfortunately for this magnificent tent, a tremendous wind arose, which tore up the ropes, and made the whole a mere heap of glittering ruins; so the French king was obliged to go and live in an old castle near the spot. Still, such was the profusion of finery and gorgeous apparel that was exhibited, that the place received the name of the Field of the Cloth of Gold.

On the 7th of June, the two kings approached each other, on horseback, in the valley of Ardres. After mutually embracing, Francis said, "My dear brother and cousin, thus far to my pain have I travelled to see you personally. I think verily that you esteem me as I am, and that I am not unworthy to be your aid. The realms and seigniories in my possession demonstrate the extent of my power." Henry answered—"Neither your realms nor other the places of your power are a matter of my regard; but the steadfastness and loyal keeping of promises comprised in charters between you and me. I never saw prince with my eyes that might of my heart be more beloved; and for your love have I passed the seas into the farthest frontier of my kingdoms to see you." Then both of then dismounted, and walking arm-in-arm together into a tent prepared for them, partook of a splendid banquet. A grand tournament followed, which lasted for six days. During this time the common soldiers amused themselves with wrestling; and, one day, the King of England asked the French king to try a fall with him. The challenge was instantly accepted, and Henry was thrown. Being very much mortified, he demanded his revenge; but the courtiers on both sides interfered, and prevented a contest which might have turned this peaceful meeting into a scene of confusion and violence.

The French king was of a cheerful, generous disposition, and he much disliked all the suspicious precautions that were used when Henry and himself met. He therefore hit upon a curious plan to remove them. One morning he rode almost alone to the English quarters, and told the guards to take him to their king. Entering Henry's apartment, he found him still in bed, and told him, in a smiling manner, that he was his prisoner. Henry was delighted with this generous mark of confidence, and, leaping from his bed, called Francis his brother, and placed around his neck a collar of pearls, worth 15,000 angels (an angel being a piece of money valued at ten shillings, and so called because it had the impression of an angel stamped upon it). Francis would not be outdone in liberality, and he only consented to keep the collar upon condition of Henry's accepting a magnificent bracelet worth twice as much.

The next day Henry returned the French king's visit in the same manner, and, after some more time spent in balls, banquets, and masquerades (of which Henry was very fond), the two monarchs parted, the French king departing to Paris, and the English one to Calais. Before Henry returned to England he went to Gravelines, and paid a visit to the Emperor Charles, who was Queen Catharine's nephew. Though young, that monarch was wise and crafty; and, as he was anxious that, if a war arose between him and Francis, Henry should not take the part of France, he lavished many compliments upon the English sovereign, and told Wolsey, that if the pope died, he might count upon his assistance in helping him to the triple crown of Rome.

The most important effect of all the dressing, feasting, and extravagance at the Field of the Cloth of Gold was, that numbers of both the French and English nobles were brought into difficulties, and some of them even ruined. Many, it is said, wore, in costly clothes and jewels, the price of an entire estate upon their backs. The greatest of English poets thus speaks of the rivalry in magnificence between the high-born spendthrifts of the two nations:—

"To-day the French,
All clinquant, all in gold, like heathen gods, Shone down the English; and, to-morrow, they Made Britain, India: every man, that stood, Show'd like a mine."

The Duke of Buckingham, one of the richest men in England, provoked the king's anger by loudly condemning all this extravagance; although he was amongst the foremost men on the field, and one of the four judges of the jousts. This nobleman was related to the House of the Plantagenets, being descended, on the female side, from the youngest son of Edward III. Henry was seated too firmly on the throne to admit of any one being able to dispute his claims; but still he looked upon Buckingham with a jealous eye. The duke had been so unguarded as to say that, if the king died without leaving any children behind him, he thought that he had the best title to succeed him. And he listened to a fortune-telling monk, named Hopkins, who encouraged him to believe that he or his son would, at some time, wear the crown of England. Buckingham had also offended Wolsey, whom he pretended to despise as a low-bred person; and, on one occasion, when the duke was holding a basin of water for the king to wash his hands, the cardinal, as soon as the king had done, dipped his hands into the same water; upon which Buckingham, who disdained to wait upon him, spilt the water in Wolsey's shoes. No doubt this incident was secretly enjoyed by the courtiers who were jealous of the cardinal's power; but that prelate himself was so incensed, that he uttered an audible threat against the duke.

One day Buckingham was invited from his estates in Gloucestershire, to attend the court at Greenwich. Suspecting no evil, he arrived in London, where he was arrested, and carried to the Tower. This was during the month of April, 1521, and the following May he was tried before the House of Lords on a charge of high treason. It was said that he had tempted Friar Hopkins to make traitorous prophecies, and had threatened, in the event of the king's death, to send Wolsey and others to the scaffold. But by far the most serious charge against him was, that he had said, on a late occasion, that if the king had ordered his arrest, he would have plunged his knife into him. It seems Buckingham had been guilty of listening to the friar's obscure stories, and of using the threatening language spoken of; but he declared that words alone, without any action, did not amount to treason. That is certainly true: to threaten to murder any one is not to commit a murder; although it is a very serious offence, and deserving of punishment. Buckingham should have been imprisoned or reprimanded; but moderation and mercy in such matters were seldom exercised in the middle ages of our history, and the unfortunate duke was condemned to perish by the hands of the headsman.

The Duke of Norfolk, the victor of Flodden Field, pronounced the sentence, and shed tears as he did so; for he respected the unhappy noble, but he dared not oppose the king's will, and he knew that Henry had resolved upon Buckingham's death. The fallen peer answered, "My lord of Norfolk, you have said to me as a traitor should be said unto; but I was never one. Still, my lord, I nothing malign you for that you have done unto me. May the eternal God forgive you my death, as I do. I shall never sue to the king for life, howbeit he is a gracious prince, and more grace may come from him than I desire. I desire you, my lords, and all my fellows, to pray for me." It was expected that the king would grant Buckingham a pardon, for he was greatly loved by the people; but, on the 17th of May, he was led to the scaffold, and beheaded on Tower Hill. His father was the worthless Duke of Buckingham who had helped to raise Richard III. to the throne; then rebelled against him; and finally perished in the same violent and gloomy manner as his son did.

CHAPTER XLVIII.

A DIGRESSION ABOUT MARTIN LUTHER, AND THE BEGINNING OF THE REFORMATION.

WE have now arrived at the commencement of one of the most important events to be found in modern history —the REFORMATION OF THE CHURCH OF ROME! Before, however, the progress of that movement is dwelt upon, a few pages must be devoted to a brief account of the distinguished reformer, Martin Luther, and the origin of that great religious convulsion, which took its rise in Germany. Without some knowledge of Luther's life, it would be very difficult to understand the great and fundamental change in religious practice which was brought about mainly by his teaching, and is known as the Reformation.

Martin Luther was born at Eisleben, in Lower Saxony, on the 10th of November, 1483. His parents were poor people—very poor indeed; his father being only a mine-labourer. But God sends his gifts where he pleases, without regard to rank or wealth; in His sight all men are equal; and the son of the humble, unregarded labourer was to win a fame greater than that of any of the princes of his time. When Luther was a child, he and his companions sang about the streets and begged, to get a trifle to purchase food. This would be very sad to reflect upon, but that begging in this manner was not then considered degrading in Germany, as it now is amongst us. It was a custom, and many children of the poor practised it. While still a boy, he was sent to some relations at Eisenach—very humble people too—and there he obtained a situation in the house of a daughter of a neighbouring burgomaster. Being thoughtful and industrious, he set to work to learn Latin, and, after a time, contrived to enter the university of Erfurt, intending to study the law.

His father, in the meantime, had got on better in the world, and was able to help him a little; and the old man had hopes that his learned son would make his fortune. When Luther was nineteen, he and a friend, named Alexis, had been to visit his father; as they were walking back, a storm came on, and Alexis was struck dead by lightning at Luther's side. This painful accident awoke in his mind very serious reflections; he thought of the awful power of God, and of the littleness and weakness of man. He saw that we were, every hour, surrounded by danger and temptations; and he shrank in fear from the noisy, working, pleasure-loving world, and crept nearer to God for protection. What, thought he, is this life of ours!—a water-drop, a grain of sand, a mote in the summer air!—but one moment, and it is past! One flash of that mysterious lightning and it is gone; the pale, smitten body is tenantless, and the spirit cleaving the blue expanse of the universe, towards the mercy-seat of the Eternal One, who holds the ocean in the hollow of his hand, and whose word governs the myriads of gigantic orbs which roll throughout immeasurable space. Luther was appalled; he resolved to devote himself to the service of the Almighty, and become a monk.

With these feelings he entered, in 1505, the monastery of St. Augustine, very much to the disappointment of his father, who had hoped to see him a thriving, wealthy man. Luther was very unhappy after he became a monk; he was haunted by the fear that he had incurred the anger of God, and that he would be lost eternally. This gave him so much pain that he became pale and haggard, and so thin and worn, that he feared he should die. But among the idle, worldly-minded monks was one man who gave him great comfort, and restored peace to his wounded mind. He became a preacher, and preached with such holy warmth and eloquence, that his hearers were struck with wonder, and sometimes melted to tears. He was so much liked, that the Elector Frederick, Duke of Saxony, in 1508, desired him to become professor of philosophy at the university of Wittenberg, which had been just founded.

Two years afterwards, in 1510, he went on a mission to Pope Leo X. at Rome; and at that time he had no idea of the great and daring opposition which he was destined to organise against the religion of that magnificent but idolatrous city. When he arrived there, he fell upon his knees, and exclaimed, "Hail, holy Rome! sanctified by holy martyrs, and by the blood which they have here shed!" His mind was soon changed; the enthusiastic Luther was startled at the worldliness and immorality he saw among the priests of Rome. To him religion seemed banished from the world; and he began to think that this great wrong must be set right, and the church re-formed—made over again, upon better and purer principles. But what could he, a poor monk, do against all the power, riches, and authority of the pope and the holy college? It seemed, nothing; but it was to be otherwise; the power of one good, sincere man, working for the benefit of his fellow-creatures, is immense.

In the year 1516, Leo, who was in great want of money to help him to build the cathedral of St. Peter's, thought it would be an excellent means of raising it by selling indulgences for sin. These indulgences were to save all those sinners who purchased them from the pains of purgatory. The price was ten shillings; and, as many persons thought a pardon for their offences was cheap at that sum, large numbers were sold. A Dominican monk, named Tetzel, entered Wittenberg to retail these indulgences. Luther, as yet, agreed with the church of which he was a member, upon all points of doctrine; but the idea of buying from man that pardon which he felt sure only God could grant, distressed and startled him. The more he thought upon the subject, the more sure he was that the pope and friars were guilty of sinful presumption. He was also disgusted by the shameful manner in which Tetzel and his fellow-monks puffed off their pretended pardons; and he first condemned indulgences from his pulpit, and then wrote ninety-five propositions against them, which, on the 31st of October, 1517, he placed on the door of the church of Wittenberg, and offered to defend against all opponents.

Tetzel, the Dominican friar, the agent for the sale of the indulgences, called Luther a heretic, who deserved to be burnt at the stake. Luther retorted by defending his propositions with great warmth; and, in a little while, this quarrel between the two monks was talked of through the whole of Germany. Luther's doctrines soon attracted the notice of the pope; and he was summoned before Cardinal Cajetan, the legate of the pontiff, to answer for his conduct. He attended before the cardinal at Augsburg, when that prelate informed him that he did not intend to enter into any controversy, but that he should propose three things: and he earnestly advised him, "First, to become a sound member of the church, and to recant his errors; secondly, to promise that he would not teach such pernicious doctrines for the future; and thirdly, to take care that the peace of the church was not broken by his means." As the cardinal employed threats instead of reasoning, Luther, after three days' conference with him, secretly left Augsburg, and appealed from the cardinal to the pope himself. The latter decided that he, as the successor of St. Peter, and vicar of Jesus Christ upon earth, had power to pardon the guilt of sin, and to mitigate or withhold its punishment. Luther would not submit, even to the pope himself, when he believed him to be in error; and he appealed from the pontiff to a general council, which, he said, possessed greater authority. The pope's nuncio, Miltitz, applied to the superiors of the Augustine monks to reclaim or coerce their disobedient brother, and they begged Luther to conciliate the pope by a respectful letter. Luther consented to write, but his letter was of such a nature that it could only be regarded as an insult. In it he said he had never spoken dishonourably of his holiness, but had called him a Daniel in the midst of Babylon, to denote the innocence and purity he had preserved among so many perverse men: that the court of Rome was more corrupt than either Babylon or Sodom; and that his holiness was a lamb among wolves, a Daniel among lions, and an Ezekiel among scorpions. These comparisons were looked upon as sarcasms, as they very likely were; but Luther also gave the pope some excellent advice, though of a kind he was sure not to follow. He said that the pope must not prescribe him rules for the interpretation of the Word of God, because it ought not to be limited; and desired him not to suffer himself to be seduced by his flatterers into a persuasion that he could command and regulate all things; or that he was above a council and the universal church, and had alone the right to interpret scripture; but to believe rather the men who debased than those who exalted him.

After receiving this letter, Leo, in 1520, published a bull, denouncing forty-one propositions selected from Luther's works, as false, scandalous, or heretical; and declaring him excommunicated if he did not retract them within sixty days. Luther termed the pope's letter, "the execrable bull of Antichrist;" and published a book, in which he called upon the whole German nation to shake off the pope's power, and reform the church. And then, taking the pope's bull and the writings of several prelates who opposed him, the courageous and resolute monk burnt them without the walls of Wittenberg, before an immense number of people; saying, as he threw them into the flames, "Because ye have troubled the holy of the Lord, ye shall be burnt with everlasting fire."

The pope immediately sent messengers to the Emperor of Germany, desiring two things. The first was, that he would cause all Luther's books to be burnt; and the second, that he would put Luther himself to death, or imprison him, or send him to the pope. Accordingly, Luther's books were burnt in many parts of Germany; but out of respect to the Elector of Saxony, Luther's patron, the emperor would not proceed against the reformer himself.

But the pope was not willing to give up the subject so easily, and he sent a minister, named Aleander, to the Diet of Worms, in the year 1521, who urged the emperor and assembled princes to execute the pope's bull against Luther without delay. The emperor sent an officer from Worms to Wittenberg to bring Luther in safety to the Diet, assuring him that he should not be molested. Luther's friends advised him not to go, and feared that some dark fate would befal him if he did. That brave priest, who seems to have been almost incapable of fear, answered that, "If he knew there were as many devils at Worms as tiles upon the houses, he would go."

When he arrived at Worms, two questions were put to him—"First, whether he owned the books for his that went under his name? And, secondly, whether he intended to retract or defend what was contained in them?" After a discussion, which lasted for some days, the reformer answered, that, unless he was convinced by texts of scripture or evident reason, he neither could nor would retract anything; because it was not lawful for him to act against his conscience. "Here I stand," said he firmly in conclusion: "I cannot do otherwise; God be my aid—Amen!" The emperor then declared that he should proceed against him as a notorious heretic, but honourably permitted him to leave Worms in safety, as he had promised.

The friends of the reformer saw that his life was in danger; they knew that if he remained at liberty, no earthly power could save him from the vengeance of Rome, and from a hideous death by fire. Duke Frederick, of Saxony, resolved to prevent this if possible; and, as Luther was returning to Wittenberg, he was seized by a party of masked horsemen, who carried him off to the strong castle of Wartenburg, where he was placed for safety in an apartment, the staircase leading to which was secured by chains and an iron door. Thus no one knew where he was, and no one could come near him, except two young men who visited him twice a-day to bring him his meals.

He remained in the castle for ten months, during which time he occupied himself in translating the Bible into the language of his own country. In his solitude, he often fancied that Satan was hovering near him in his room. Once he had an attack of illness that brought on a sort of beating in his head and a singing in his ears, and he firmly believed that it was the fiend buffeting him because he was a faithful servant of the Lord. Another time he believed he actually saw the devil. He had been translating one of the Psalms, and was worn out with long labour at his task, and faint from illness and want of food. Suddenly there seemed to rise before him a dreadful-looking phantom, of a hideous but indescribable shape, to forbid him to proceed with his work. But the courageous monk cared not for the fiend: why should he? He knew that he was one of God's creatures; and that the God on whom he relied would protect him. Starting up resolutely, he seized his inkstand and threw it at the spectre, which instantly disappeared. Of course, there was no such appearance; solitude, sickness, and exhaustion made Luther believe that he saw the dark being, the incarnation of all evil, that so often filled his thoughts. Rest, pleasant walks, and smiling faces would have cured him of these illusions; but the incident shows us the bold decision of the man. His fearless disposition was terrified neither by pope nor devil; in the holy cause of truth he would defy them both. What should he fear except the wrath of God? That he would avoid by a pure and blameless life; for the rest, nothing could much afflict him who had resigned the delights of the world, and looked only for peace and joy in heaven.

Tired of solitude, Luther, in 1521, left Wartenburg Castle, and returned to his duties at Wittenberg, where he was received by the students with delight. He found that King Henry VIII., of England, had written a book against him in Latin, called a Defence of the Seven Sacraments against Martin Luther. The English king had sent a copy of his work to the pope, who bestowed upon him, in return, by a bull issued on the 10th of October, the title of "Defender of the Faith." Luther replied to the book in so severe a manner, that Henry, who had as yet remained attached to the Roman church, disliked the reformed doctrines more than he had done before. The bold preacher said that he did not believe the king had written the book at all; and that whoever had written it was a fool, who did not understand his subject, and whose only merit consisted in being able to write in elegant language.

Pope Leo X. died in 1522; but Luther was not out of danger, for his successor, Adrian VI., was also resolved on sending the reformer to the stake. But, in 1523, Adrian died too; and his successor, Clement VII., was of a more merciful nature.

Luther, at first, only preached against the blasphemous trade of the pope's selling indulgences for sin; but he at length utterly renounced the authority of the Roman church; and, in the year 1524, he married! His wife was an escaped nun, who had adopted his notions of religion: her name was Catharine de Bore. He said, "No words are more odious to my ears than the names of nun, monk, priest; and marriage seems to me a paradise even in the depths of poverty." After his marriage, he felt the poverty he speaks of, and that very bitterly. He was obliged to labour for his bread, and to sell many articles of furniture to buy food; but he and his wife kept up bravely. Once, after speaking of her gentleness and affection, he said, "I would not exchange my poverty for the wealth of Crœsus!"

In the year 1529, a Diet was held at the city of Spires, at which the Emperor Charles presided; and some severe attempts were made to put down Luther and the new opinions in religion. But those opinions had gathered strength, and were spreading rapidly abroad. The Elector and the reformers uttered a solemn protest against the decrees of this Diet, or assembly; and from that act they were called PROTESTANTS—a name used ever since to distinguish all Christians who do not belong to the Roman church. To call the Roman church, or, indeed, any other church, by the name of Catholic, is absurd; for Catholic means universal; and even Christianity itself has not yet extended over more than a fourth part of the whole earth; that is, not more than a fourth part of the people in the world, as yet, believe its divine truths, and receive its blessings.

After the Diet at Spires, the pope issued a severe decree against the reformers; and the Protestant princes, for the sake of defence, entered into a holy league to resist Rome, and enable themselves and their subjects to worship God after their own fashion. All this had been begun by our countryman, Wycliffe, nearly 200 years before; but the great work had slept since. He claimed for all persons the right of reading the Bible for themselves, according to their own judgment. That was the true seed from which the Reformation sprung—the hallowed right of private judgment: that is one of the most precious rights which God has bestowed upon his creatures, and one which, if observed, will ever sustain the religion of our land in freedom and glory.

Luther was better fitted to destroy the dominion of the Roman church than Wycliffe was; for Luther was a bolder and a sterner man. He was less liberal towards those who differed from him than was the good old priest of Lutterworth; and not so kindly or so genial, or so broad in his views, or so free from superstitious errors. But Luther's great courage made him more fit to trample down powerful error, and to establish a better and purer church. He was very fierce: intensely so towards his persecutors, and returned their curses with as much bitterness as they were uttered. One time he said—"They shall never more have a good word from me; I would have them buried to the sound of my thunders and lightnings. I can no longer pray without cursing. If I say, 'Hallowed be Thy name,' I feel myself constrained to add, 'Accursed be the name of papists, and of all who blaspheme Thee.' If I say, 'Thy kingdom come,' I add, 'Cursed be the popedom, and all kingdoms opposed to Thine.' If I say, 'Thy will be done,' I follow with, 'Cursed and disappointed be the schemes of the papists, and of all who fight againt Thee.'" This vindictiveness of spirit must not be harshly judged; for Luther lived in a wild, unquiet time—a time of strife and unsettled opinions; amongst men who thirsted for his blood, and longed to strangle the strong infant truth, which, on its part, threatened to rock their church to its foundations. He died in the year 1546, after a life of storms and dangers, in his sixty-third year. When he felt his last hour approaching, he uttered the following prayer:—"My heavenly Father, eternal and merciful God, Thou hast manifested unto me Thy dear Son, our Lord Jesus Christ. I have taught him; I have known him: I love him as my life, my health, my redemption; whom the wicked have persecuted, maligned, and with injury afflicted.—Draw my soul to Thee!"

CHAPTER XLIX.

CONTINUATION OF THE REIGN OF HENRY THE EIGHTH.—A.D. 1521—1530.

THE doctrines of Luther had made their way into England, and had spread abroad among the people, as it was natural they should do; for there were many there who still loved the memory and teachings of our noble old reformer, Wycliffe. King Henry, as already mentioned, wrote a book against Luther, and sent it to the pope, who conferred on him the title of "Defender of the Faith." Henry was vain enough to believe that if he wrote against Luther's doctrines, the English people would at once give them up and keep to the old religion; but he was mistaken: the effect of his book was to make the matter more known, and to spread the principles of the Reformation farther than ever. Cardinal Wolsey had, before this, given orders to the bishops to seize all books written by Luther found in the possession of their clergy or the people; and to give notice in the churches, that all persons having such books, who did not deliver them up within fifteen days, should be excommunicated. On the 12th of May, 1521, the condemned works were burnt in London, before Paul's Cross.

Soon after the publication of Henry's book, Pope Leo X. died, and Wolsey sent a messenger to Rome to try and promote his election to the papal throne; but he was too late; his chance was gone; and a feeble old man, Adrian, Cardinal of Tortosa, was chosen. Wolsey was vexed, but he trusted that Adrian would not live long, and that he would yet become pope.

It had been agreed that King Henry should be the umpire in any dispute which might arise between the German emperor, Charles, and the French king, Francis. A quarrel had arisen between the two princes, and both of them, in 1522, requested Henry's judgment. The English king made Wolsey arbitrator in the matter; and the cardinal (who was bribed by the emperor with a promise that he would endeavour to raise him to the popedom on the death of Adrian) secretly took part against France, and even begged Henry to join the emperor in a war against that country. Henry had lately exchanged protestations of friendship with Francis at the Field of the Cloth of Gold. Still he was ready to enter into a conspiracy and war against him, in the hope that Francis might be conquered, and his kingdom divided between the emperor and himself.

In settling the quarrel between Charles and Francis, Wolsey proposed such terms as he knew the French king would reject. He then deplored the obstinacy of Francis; said that he was the aggressor, and that Henry was bound to assist the German emperor in a war against him. It was soon agreed that Henry should invade the north of France with an army of 40,000 men, and that Charles should attack it on the east and south with the same number. Henry seemed to have forgotten that armies are not to be raised without money; and, after screwing from the people as much as they would pay, he was only able to collect about 15,000 soldiers.

In the month of August, 1522, the Earl of Surrey landed with these troops at Calais, and marched through Artois to the banks of the Somme, burning all the villages and farmhouses they passed, and ruining the poor people. The French would not run the risk of a regular battle—their experience of such conflicts had rendered them cautious—but they hung upon the rear of the English, and prevented them from obtaining provisions. Constant rains fell; and this, with a want of sufficient food, soon brought on sickness in the English army. So that, after having done no mischief except to the harmless country-people, who had nothing to do with the affair, and done himself or his king no good at all, Surrey was obliged, in the month of October, to return to Calais.

An alliance had long existed between the Scots and the French; therefore, when Henry sent Surrey to invade France, the Scottish regent, Albany, raised an army and ravaged the English borders. Scotland, however, was in such an unhappy state, and so many jealousies existed amongst its nobles, that Albany was soon compelled to enter into a truce. The next year (1523) Henry became the aggressor, and sent an army into Scotland, under the command of the warlike Earl of Surrey, who ravaged the Merse and Teviotdale, and burned the town of Jedburgh without meeting with any opposition. A feeble attempt was made on the part of the Scots to retaliate, but it failed through the treachery of their own leaders; and that nation was so distracted with factions at home, that for several years it was unable to disturb the English, who, on this account, had more leisure to make war upon France.

Henry had spent all his money in foolish wars and extravagant pageants; and in April, 1523, he summoned a parliament to grant him some more. It was eight years since he had called a parliament, and he only required it to vote him a sum of money and retire. Cardinal Wolsey himself attended the house with an immense retinue; and, after making a long speech to the members upon the need the king had of their assistance, he asked them to grant the enormous sum of £800,000, to be collected by means of a property-tax of 1s. in the pound on every income each year, for four years. As such a grant as this was very unusual, the members hesitated; and, although the cardinal talked to them very sternly, they refused to consult upon the subject until he had retired from the house. A debate of several days followed; and, in the end, the Commons granted half the tax proposed. Even this was far more easily granted than collected, and nearly produced an insurrection among the people.

About this time Pope Adrian VI. died, and Wolsey was again a candidate for the pontifical throne; but once more he was disappointed, for Cardinal Giulio de Medici was elected, under the title of Clement VII. Nearly all the cardinals changed their names when they became pope, as they had a superstition among them, that those who did not take another name when they were raised to that gorgeous station died shortly afterwards.

Wolsey bore his defeat with patience, congratulated the new pope, and applied to him for a continuation of the legatine power he had before enjoyed. Clement readily assented, and appointed him to be legate, or representative of the pope in England, as long as he should live. Besides this, he gave him authority to reform and suppress some small monasteries in England. The church of Rome had plenty of ignorant monks and to spare; and, instead of them, she wanted learned scholars to defend her doctrines against the fast-spreading principles of Luther and the protestant reformers. Wolsey, therefore, suppressed some smaller monasteries, and distributed the monks in them amongst the larger ones. With the revenues of these houses he built and endowed two colleges—one at Oxford, and another at the town of Ipswich, where he was born.

England, Germany, Spain, the pope, and all the states of Italy, now leagued together against France; and Henry spent the money he had lately wrung from the people in collecting an army for another invasion of that country. The command of the forces was given to the Duke of Suffolk; and, in the August of 1523, he sailed over to Calais. His army consisted of 12,000 English soldiers; and as many more Flemings and Germans, who were led by the Count de Bure. Though the Duke of Suffolk was very expert in feats of arms, and could ride a horse and wield a lance better than any other man in England, he was but a very poor general. A fine intellect, a ready spirit never perplexed by unforeseen accidents, and a genius for military tactics, are far more necessary for a general than even the strength and courage of the Hebrew patriot, Sampson. The strong gigantic Cossacks could not understand how a little man such as Bonaparte, who is said to have ridden like a butcher, could be the first soldier in Europe. They were not wise enough to know, that strength of mind, compared with strength of muscle, is like a sword of finely-tempered steel opposed to one of lead. For want of understanding well how to command as well as how to fight, Suffolk lost time, fell into difficulties, and was harassed by the French, who, though they would not fight him, hovered round his army, and cut off its supplies of provisions. After doing absolutely nothing, bad weather, want of food, and sickness among his troops, compelled the duke to retire in disgrace to Calais.

For four years few events of any interest occurred in England. Henry created a great deal of discontent among his people by the arbitrary manner in which he extorted money from them; for he would not now call a parliament, but levied taxes at his own pleasure. Wolsey also created a great deal of envy by his covetousness and ostentation. It was during this period that he made the king a present of the magnificent palace of Hampton Court, which he had built as a residence for himself; but, fearing to excite the envy of Henry by his grandeur, he pretended that he had designed it for him from the first.

Though England was nearly tranquil, the neighbouring continent was filled with wars and strange transactions. Francis, the French king, notwithstanding the powerful league against him, had invaded Italy; had been defeated at a great battle, fought on the 25th of February, 1525, at Pavia; had been taken prisoner by the German emperor, and had recovered his liberty. Henry had at first intended to attempt the conquest of France; but, as he could not raise the money to do so, he changed his mind, and, as soon as Francis was at large again, entered into a peace with him. But the most remarkable event was the assault and sack of Rome, on the 6th of May, 1527, by the French traitor, Constable Bourbon. The Vatican was plundered; Pope Clement only found safety within the walls of the castle of St. Angelo; many of the cardinals and bishops were murdered; and, for five days, the streets of the city, which the Romanists believed to be the residence of the representative on earth of the blessed Saviour, ran with blood, and resounded with blasphemous oaths and shrieks of terror.

These events had little connection with the affairs of England, where King Henry, who had been married seventeen years to his queen, Catharine of Aragon (who, all that period, was an affectionate and excellent wife), suddenly pretended to be struck with remorse, on account of his having married his brother's widow—a marriage forbidden by the church, and by the customs of Christians generally. The truth was, that another lady had attracted his fancy, and he wanted an excuse to be divorced from his queen, Catharine, that he might marry again.

The lady who had won the affection of the king was Anne Boleyn, one of the queen's maids of honour. Anne was extremely beautiful, graceful, witty, and cheerful; and, at the time she attracted Henry's admiration (the year 1527), she was about twenty years of age. She had spent some years in France, and had all the gaiety and vivacity of the ladies of that nation. Her father, Sir Thomas Boleyn, though descended from a London merchant, had lately been created Viscount Rochford. Her mother, however, was of noble blood—being a daughter of Thomas Howard, Duke of Norfolk. King Henry, at first, made some dishonourable proposals to the young lady, which she instantly rejected; but she gave him to understand that, if he had been single, she would have had no objection to become his queen. Anne acted very properly in rejecting the king's solicitations—though, in so doing, no great praise is due to her; for it is said that Henry had before ruined, and then abandoned, her own sister, Mary. But she acted wrongly—indeed, with shameful ingratitude—in encouraging the addresses of the husband of the kind mistress on whom she attended.

Henry now lived away from his queen, and talked a great deal about his religious scruples concerning the lawfulness of his marriage. Catharine was past her youth—for she was in her forty-third year, and time and illness had robbed her of much of the beauty which she once possessed. Besides this, she had brought Henry but one child, the Princess Mary; and the king longed for a son to succeed him. Henry first consulted his confessor, the Bishop of Lincoln, upon the subject; and the bishop agreed with the king, and felt, or pretended to feel, the importance of his doubts. The Archbishop of Canterbury was next applied to: he consulted the other prelates; and, in the end, all of them, except one, declared that they considered the king's marriage unlawful—as they very well knew that he wished them to do. Wolsey, who was no favourite of the queen, took the same side, and proposed to his master to divorce Catharine, and marry the Duchess of Alençon, sister of the French king. The cardinal knew of the king's attachment to Anne Boleyn, but he had no idea that Henry had any intention of marrying her. The king's fancy, however, proved stronger than the cardinal supposed possible; and Henry, who was very fond of writing, and proud of his skill in argument, even wrote a book to prove, from certain passages in Leviticus, that his marriage with the queen was an unlawful alliance.

Henry soon resolved to apply to the pope for a divorce; and, as Clement was still a prisoner at Rome, and wished for the interference of England on his behalf, he regarded the application favourably. Clement soon afterwards escaped from Rome, and took up his residence at Orvieto. There he signed one paper, granting to Wolsey power to decide the divorce, and another, granting Henry permission to marry any other woman; but he desired them to keep these papers for a time, for fear of the consequences to him from the Emperor Charles, who had caused his imprisonment, and who was the nephew of Queen Catharine.

The impatient English king, who longed for an immediate divorce, that he might at once marry Anne Boleyn, was by no means satisfied with these documents; and he sent Dr. Gardiner and Dr. Fox to the pope, to ask for a more ample dispensation, and for an authority, called a decretal bull, in which the pontiff should promise to confirm the decision that Wolsey might pronounce upon the subject. The pope did not wish to offend Henry by denying this bull, and he did not like to offend the Emperor Charles by granting it: in this situation he acted in a very doubtful manner; but at length he signed the decretal bull, and instructed Cardinal Campeggio, whom he joined in the commission with Wolsey, to show it to the king, but not to let it go out of his possession.

Cardinal Campeggio, who quite understood the views of the pope, did not arrive in England until the month of May, 1529; and was resolved to delay the business as much as possible. On the 31st of May, Wolsey and Campeggio took their seats in the great hall of the Black Friars, to try the question, whether the marriage of the king and queen was lawful, or forbidden by the Scriptures and the church? When Henry and Catharine were called upon to make their appearance in court, a proxy attended for the king, but the queen was there in person. But she had not come to submit to their decision; she protested against the judgment of the cardinals, and appealed to the pope himself. In consequence of this, the court was adjourned until the 18th of June; and, in the meantime, the queen was persuaded to submit to its decision in the matter.

On the 21st of June, Henry and Catharine both attended, and took their seats. When the name of the king was called, he answered "Here," but the queen remained for a little time in silence. On her name being again called she rose, crossed herself, and then kneeling at the feet of her husband, addressed to him a gentle and touching speech, of which the following is an abbreviation:—

"Sir, I beseech you, for all the loves that hath been between us, and for the love of God, let me have justice and right: take of me some pity and compassion, for I am a poor woman, and a stranger, born out of your dominion. I have here no assured friend, much less impartial counsel, and I flee to you as to the head of justice within this realm. Alas! Sir, wherein have I offended you, or on what occasion given you displeasure? Have I ever designed against your will and pleasure that you should put me from you? I take God and all the world to witness that I have been to you a true, humble, and obedient wife; ever conformable to your will and pleasure. Never have I said or done aught contrary thereto—being always well pleased and contented with all things wherein you had delight or dalliance, whether it were in little or much; neither did I ever grudge in word or countenance, or show a visage or spark of discontent. I loved all those whom you loved only for your sake, whether I had cause or no, whether they were my friends or mine enemies. The king, your father, was, in the time of his reign, of such estimation through the world for his excellent wisdom, that he was accounted and called of all men the second Solomon; and my father, Ferdinand, King of Spain, was esteemed one of the wisest princes; both, indeed, were excellent princes, full of wisdom and princely behaviour. Also, as me seemeth, there were in those days as wise, as learned, and as judicious men as be at the present, who thought then the marriage good and lawful; therefore it is a wonder to hear what new inventions are brought up against me. Ye cause me to stand to the order and judgment of this new court, wherein ye may do me much wrong; for ye may condemn me for lack of sufficient answer, having no impartial advisers, but only such as ye assign me. Ye must consider, that they who be your subjects cannot be impartial counsellors for me; they have been chosen out of your own council, and they dare not, for fear of you, disobey your will, or frustrate your intentions. Therefore, most humbly do I require you, in the way of charity, and for the love of God, who is the best Judge, to spare me the extremity of this new court, until I be advertised what way my friends in Spain may advise me to take; and if you will not extend to me so much impartial favour, your will then be fulfilled: unto God I commit my cause."

When the queen had finished this appeal to Henry's better nature, she rose, curtsied to him very humbly, and left the court, to which she declared she never would return. Henry then acknowledged that she had always been an affectionate and dutiful wife, and said that the only reason for his desire to divorce her was, that he was disturbed in his mind because she had been his sister-in-law before she was his queen, and, therefore, that he feared his marriage with her was against the commands of the Scriptures.

The cardinals cited the queen to return to the court; but, as she would not do so, they pronounced her contumacious, and went on with the trial without her. Many particulars were then entered into, which it is not necessary to repeat; and it was decided that, as the queen had actually been the wife of the dead Prince Arthur, her subsequent marriage with his brother Henry was unlawful and unnatural. The king then demanded a judgment; but Cardinal Campeggio, after many delays, adjourned the cause on the 30th of July, until the month of October, that he might take the opinion of the pope upon the subject. The truth was, that the pope had not made his peace with the Emperor Charles, and had promised that sovereign not to sanction Henry's divorce; and the cardinal, having lengthened out the proceedings until that event had taken place, took his leave of the English court.

Henry was much disappointed and enraged: he dared not touch Campeggio; but Wolsey was within his power, and on him Henry's anger fell. The beautiful Anne Boleyn, who was now always with the king, entertained a dislike to the cardinal, as she fancied that he had hindered the divorce, and because she was attached to the reformed principles in religion, which he had done his best to put down. Henry was also surrounded by courtiers who hated the proud cardinal that outshone them in magnificence; and the king himself was jealous of the great wealth and power of the man who had so long enjoyed his favour.

Wolsey's ruin was determined on by the fickle monarch; and it was not long before means were taken to effect it. Soon after the trial of the lawfulness of the king's marriage, two bills were filed against the cardinal in the Court of King's Bench, in which he was charged with having broken some old and unused law in fulfilling his duties as legate of the pope. Wolsey very well knew that this was merely a pretence; but he knew, also, the tyranny and absolute disposition of the king; and he pleaded guilty to the charge, in the hope of softening the royal anger by his submission. His humility was as great now as his pride and haughtiness had been before, and he drew up a deed, giving all his immense personal wealth to the king, on condition of his being allowed to keep his rank and property in the church.

The greedy and unjust king seized the wealth thus surrendered to him, and then sent the Dukes of Suffolk and Norfolk to Wolsey, to say that he must leave his noble palace at York Place, and confine himself to his house at Esher. The dukes also demanded the great seal, which Wolsey held as chancellor; and, in doing so, they could not conceal their animosity and triumph.

The humbled cardinal replied—"My lords, the great seal of England was delivered to me by the hands of my sovereign; I hold it by his majesty's letters patent, which, along with it, have conferred on me the office of chancellor, to be enjoyed during my life, and I may not deliver it at the simple word of any lord, unless you can show me your commission." Henry sent a written order, and then Wolsey, on the 17th of October, 1529, resigned the seal. It was given to Sir Thomas More.

Leaving his magnificent abode, Wolsey sadly entered his barge, and was rowed up the Thames towards Esher. There were many boats full of people on the river, who hooted him as he left his gorgeous palace; but the fallen minister was so utterly spirit-broken, that he did not regard them. Arrived at Putney, he mounted his mule, and rode with his retinue towards Esher. As he was on his way, he was overtaken by Sir John Norris, one of the royal chamberlains, who presented to him a ring which the king had sent him from his own finger, together with a consoling message. The cardinal, who lost all dignity in his misfortunes, dismounted from his mule, and, falling upon his knees, thanked God for the returning favour of the king. The news, he said, was worth half a kingdom; but he had nothing to give Sir John but a little gold chain and crucifix. After bestowing these trifles upon the chamberlain, he added—"As for my sovereign, sorry am I that I have no worthy token to send him; but stay, here is my fool that rides beside me. I beseech thee take him to court, and give him to his majesty. I assure you, for any nobleman's pleasure, he is worth a thousand pounds." The poor jester, who loved his master, refused to leave him, and was obliged to be dragged away by six stout men.

At Esher, Wolsey spent his time in tears and lamentations; he pined away, and his health was soon very seriously injured. His face shrunk up to little more than half its natural size, and he fell ill of a fever. He had written the most humiliating and unmanly letters to the king; but Henry took no further notice of him until it was supposed that the miserable cardinal was dying. Then the ungrateful monarch was a little touched with the sufferings of the man who, for twenty years, had been his friend and faithful adviser; and he sent his own physician to attend upon him. This mark of the royal favour revived the cardinal, and he began to recover. But Henry was fickleness itself; for, having again summoned a parliament in October, 1529, he encouraged it to bring a bill of impeachment, consisting of forty-four articles, against Wolsey. But the fallen minister was not utterly deserted; his late secretary, Thomas Cromwell, opposed the bill with so much earnestness and eloquence, that it was abandoned.

Again did Henry seem to relent towards his old favourite; he granted him a free pardon, sent him some money for his present wants, and permitted him to remove nearer to the court. To grant a pardon for imaginary offences, and to send the cardinal some of his own money, was no very great liberality; but the enemies of Wolsey were alarmed lest he should regain his influence over the mind of the king, and they induced Henry to command him to retire to York and live within his archbishopric.

The humbled cardinal went to Cawood, in Yorkshire, where he became apparently an altered man, and won the affection of all the clergy and gentry of the neighbourhood. He had given up his haughtiness and ostentation, and become meek and considerate. Though he lived plainly, he was still very hospitable to his neighbours, and charitable to the poor, 300 of whom he employed in repairing the churches and houses of his see. Indeed, he was getting to be as much loved in Yorkshire as he had formerly been hated there.

The enemies of Wolsey did not like his becoming so popular, and they would not leave him in peace even in his retirement. He had been writing some letters to the pope and to the French sovereign, and these backbiters persuaded the king that there must be something treasonable in them. Henry listened to their insinuations, and sent the Earl of Northumberland to arrest the cardinal, and bring him as a prisoner to London, in order that he might be placed upon his trial. The earl arrived at York on the 4th of November, 1530. He had been the cardinal's friend, and was received by him with great kindness. Observing that he came very numerously attended, and that many of his followers were old servants of the family, Wolsey exclaimed, "Ah! my lord, I perceive that you observe the precepts and instructions which I gave you when you were abiding with me in your youth—to cherish your father's old servants." He then led the earl affectionately into the house. Northumberland hesitated; his errand was a very painful one: at length he laid his hand on the cardinal's shoulder, and, while the tears started to his eyes, said, "My lord, I arrest you of high treason."

The unhappy prelate seemed stunned, and, for a time, he neither moved nor spoke. Then he shed tears, and vented many exclamations of grief, but made no attempt at resistance, and uttered not one word against the king. The earl set out with him towards London, but Wolsey had received a shock from which he never recovered. When he reached Sheffield Park, the seat of the Earl of Shrewsbury, he was taken so ill as to be confined to his bed for a fortnight. As soon as he was able to continue his journey he proceeded as far as Leicester Abbey, where, on the 26th of November, he was again obliged to halt. He was received by the abbot and monks with much ceremony. "Father," said he to the former, "I come to lay my bones among you." He was taken to his bed, from which he never rose again.

The cardinal fainted frequently; and on the second morning after his arrival at the abbey, it was plain that he was dying. Kingston, the lieutenant of the Tower, had been sent to meet him and take charge of his person; and calling this officer to his bedside, he addressed to him almost his latest words:—"Master Kingston, I pray you have me commended most humbly to his majesty, and beseech him, on my behalf, to call to his gracious remembrance all matters that have passed between us from the beginning, especially respecting Queen Catharine and himself, and then shall his conscience know whether I have offended him or not. He is a prince of most royal courage, and hath a princely heart; for, rather than miss or want any part of his will, he will endanger one half of his kingdom. And I do assure you, I have often kneeled before him in his private chamber, sometimes for three hours together, to persuade him from his appetite, and could not prevail. And Master Kingston, this I will say—had I but served God as diligently as I have served the king, He would not have given me over in my grey hairs. Howbeit, this is my just reward for not regarding my service to God, but only my duty to my prince."

There is something very painful about these words; and we feel inclined to forgive the wretched prelate for the arrogance, subtlety, and exactions of the time of his power. Had he possessed a more noble and manly spirit in his misfortunes (although, perhaps, we might have pitied him less), his memory would have been more respected. He wanted a little of that unbending firmness and untameable courage of which his great predecessor, Thomas à Becket, possessed so much. Yet he had great talents, and many good qualities; and certainly restrained the despotic and savage whims of Henry, which did not break out in their wild fierceness until after his death. He expired at eight o'clock in the morning, on the 29th of November, 1530, in the sixtieth year of his age; and was buried, without much ceremony, in the church of the monastery.

CHAPTER L.

CONTINUATION OF THE REIGN OF HENRY THE EIGHTH.—A.D. 1530—1536.

SOME time before the death of Wolsey, an obscure priest of the name of Thomas Cranmer, who was secretly attached to the reformed doctrines of religion, happened to be in the company of Dr. Gardiner, the king's secretary, and Dr. Fox, his almoner. The conversation turned upon the subject of the king's divorce, when Cranmer observed, that the best way, either to quiet Henry's conscience or to gain the pope's consent, would be to consult all the universities of Europe on the subject; for if they were unanimous in approving of the king's marriage with Catharine, his remorse would naturally cease; and, if they condemned it, the pope would find it difficult to resist the solicitations of so great a monarch, seconded by the opinion of all the learned men in Christendom.

This remark was repeated to Henry, who approved of the suggestion, and sent for Cranmer. In the interview, the king was so pleased with his learning and his manners, that he desired him to write a book in favour of the divorce. Cranmer did so, and declared in it, that the laws of God, as revealed in the Bible, and confirmed by the ancient fathers of the church, did not permit a man to marry his brother's widow. Agents were then sent to the various universities of Europe, to collect opinions on the subject. The English universities, Oxford and Cambridge, debated the question with a good deal of spirit, and were inclined to favour the queen; but they were at last driven by threats to decide according to the wishes of the king, and declared that they considered the marriage unlawful. Many of the foreign universities came to the same conclusion, though some of them received large bribes from the king to induce them to do so. All the German universities, however, agreed with their emperor, and decided against the divorce; and the pope, in the month of March, 1530, published a breve, threatening Henry with excommunication if he contracted a new marriage, and summoned him to appear, either himself or by proxy, before the tribunal at Rome.

Henry would not appear, either in person or by proxy; but, in 1530, he sent the father of Anne Boleyn, whom he had created Earl of Wiltshire, to explain his reasons for refusing to do so. This only made matters worse; for the earl insulted the pope by declining to kiss his toe, when the latter, according to custom, presented it to him for that purpose. Cranmer, who accompanied the earl, remained at Rome to endeavour to persuade the pope to decide in Henry's favour. The pontiff was not to be moved, and Cranmer went into Germany, where he departed from the rules of the Roman church by secretly marrying the niece of a protestant pastor of Nuremburg.

The scheme of getting the opinions of the universities of Europe having failed in inducing the pope to decide upon the divorce, as Henry wished him to do, the king became very fretful and impatient upon the subject. There was in the service of Henry a bold, active, talented man, named Thomas Cromwell, who was encouraged by the pope's opposition to the king's will, to attempt to set England altogether free from the dominion of Rome, and to establish the reformed religion. Cromwell's life had been a romantic one: he was the son of a blacksmith at Putney; and, having received a good education, went abroad, and became a clerk in the English factory at Antwerp. He then turned soldier, joined the army of Constable Bourbon, and assisted at the sack of Rome, in the year 1527. On the restoration of peace in Italy, he went to Vienna, where he accepted a situation in the counting-house of a merchant. After this, he returned to England and studied the law; and, by some means, he attracted the notice of Cardinal Wolsey, who made him his solicitor, and employed him in the dissolution of those small monasteries which Wolsey suppressed for the purpose of raising funds to build a college at Oxford and another at Ipswich, as already mentioned. Cromwell showed so much talent that he gained a seat in the House of Commons; and, after the death of the cardinal, was received into the service of the king.

Knowing the unsettled state of Henry's mind on the subject of the church, and his vexation with the pope, Cromwell begged for an audience with the king. On being admitted, he told him, that the great difficulty about the divorce was the timidity of his ministers; and that the best way was to deny the authority of the pope altogether, and to rest his reason for putting away Queen Catharine upon the opinions of the foreign universities and the decision of his own parliament. Cromwell, finding that the king listened, without anger, to this bold advice, went a little further, and advised him to follow the example of the German princes who had adopted the new religion, and declare himself to be the supreme head of the English church. He said that, at present, Henry was only half a king, and that he would never have the full exercise of his royal authority until the bishops and clergy were made entirely dependent upon him, and not allowed to hold anything from the pope.

This advice pleased the absolute Henry so much that he resolved immediately to carry it into practice, and at once throw off the authority of an obstinate pope, who would not permit him to divorce his queen and marry another lady; and be, as far as England was concerned, both king and pope himself. Another advantage was, the prospect of deriving great profits from this new mode of managing the church; for the popes of Rome had always drawn immense sums from England, and these he would put into his own purse. But there was one difficulty in the way of this scheme: it was certain that the bishops and clergy would oppose it as much as they dared; so Henry began by attempting to coerce them into submitting to anything that he, in his selfish and avaricious whims, might please to propose.

The pretence put forward for the ruin of Cardinal Wolsey was, that he had presumed to exercise the functions of legate of the pope in defiance of some old unused law. Henry now (1531) said, that the clergy, in obeying Wolsey as legate, had shared his offence, and he ordered the attorney-general to bring an indictment against them all. The bishops were alarmed; they knew it would be useless to appeal to the reason or justice of the arbitrary king, and to tell him that they would have been ruined if they had not submitted to Wolsey's legatine authority, which had, in reality, been procured by Henry's consent, and supported by his power; therefore they pleaded guilty, and offered to pay a fine of upwards of £100,000 to win the pardon of their sovereign. Henry had no objection to sell his forgiveness for this large sum; but he would not receive it unless he was acknowledged by the bishops as "the protector and only supreme head of the church and clergy of England."

The bishops and clergy did not know how to act: if they refused this request they would incur the anger of the passionate king: if they granted it, they would be separating their church from the pope, and placing the power of the pontiff in the hands of their sovereign. They debated about it for three days, and then answered, that they acknowledged his title as head of the church with a certain limitation, quantum per legem Christi liceat—that is, "as far as may be by the law of Christ." When Cromwell (who had been made a privy councillor) brought this answer to Henry, the furious king exclaimed, in a loud and violent manner, "Mother of God! you have played me a shrewd turn. I thought to have made fools of those prelates, and now you have so ordered the business, that they are likely to make a fool of me, as they have done of you already. Go to them again, and let me have the business passed without any quantums or tantums. I will have no quantum nor no tantum in the matter, but let it be done out of hand." On this point, however, the clergy were firm, and Henry accepted the money and his title as head of the church, with the limitation attached to it.

While the king's mind was so unsettled on the subject of religion and church government, it might have been supposed that persecution and burnings for the sake of religious opinions would cease. This was by no means the case; several persons had been burnt during the previous part of his reign; but at this very time, when Henry was himself overthrowing the authority of the pope, he permitted a good and learned man, named Thomas Bilney, to be burned at Smithfield for exposing the errors of the Roman church.

Queen Catharine—from whom Henry had long separated, though they were not yet formally divorced—wrote a letter to the pope, who showed a wish to be reconciled to the English king, on condition that he would take back the queen and abandon Anne Boleyn. Henry treated the proposition with disdain; and as the parliament, in January, 1532, passed an act abolishing the annates, or first-fruits—a sort of taxes hitherto paid to the pope (an act which Henry did not confirm till July, 1533), Clement signed a breve, declaring both Henry and Anne excommunicated unless they should separate. Henry did not trouble himself much about this excommunication; he knew that his clergy had not the courage to enforce it; and taking Anne with him (whom he had created Marchioness of Pembroke), he went to Calais, where they landed on the 11th of October. On the 20th, Francis I. came to Calais; and, amidst the gaieties that prevailed, Henry endeavoured, but in vain, to induce his ally also to throw off the spiritual authority of Rome.

The king, Anne Boleyn, and the royal suite, did not leave Calais till the 13th of November. On arriving in England Henry continued his marked attention to Anne; and he was privately married to her on the 25th of January, 1533. The ceremony was performed by Dr. Rouland Lee, in an unfrequented chamber at Whitehall. The priest naturally hesitated, for he knew that Queen Catharine was yet living; but Henry told him that the pope had decided in favour of his divorce, and that he had the deed in his closet. Dr. Lee did not consider it prudent to inquire further: he took the king's word, the marriage proceeded, and then the party separated.

In February, 1533, Cranmer was made Archbishop of Canterbury; and, although he was strongly attached to the protestant religion, and had a wife in secret, he accepted it as a catholic, and took his oaths of obedience to the pope. Though Henry had thrown off the authority of the pontiff, yet he was so unsettled in his mind, and inconsistent in his conduct, that he insisted on Cranmer's receiving his consecration from Rome. Had that prelate been as good and brave a man as some writers have represented him, he would have refused to take an oath of obedience to the pope which he never intended to keep. But he was timid, loved rank and worldly distinction better than honourable duty, and dreaded the chance of incurring the displeasure of the king. He took the oath with a mental reservation—a detestable mode of equivocation, far worse than open lying. Such conduct is perjury before man, and blasphemy before God; highly criminal in any one, but most criminal in a priest. The result of this duplicity must have been very painful to Cranmer: he, a protestant in heart, accepted a situation as a catholic archbishop, and was compelled, in the execution of his duty, to condemn many better men than himself to perish at the stake by fire, for openly professing those opinions which he secretly held, but had not the manliness to avow.

As Cranmer was in a position which made it especially incumbent on him to set an example of truth, and sincere, unswerving integrity, his conduct must be regarded as most reprehensible. It was not necessary that he should have courted martyrdom himself; no one is required to do that: the ever-merciful Creator wants no such sacrifice from any of his creatures; but the first principles of morality (not to mention religion) demanded that he should not have accepted an office which compelled him to persecute those whom he believed were serving God more faithfully and purely than he himself was doing; and taken an oath which he did not intend to observe. Cranmer certainly expiated these sins, at last, by himself dying for the truth at the stake; but though he died bravely, he lived timidly: in his death he was a martyr; but in his life, unfortunately, a double-dealer and a parasite.

Because Cranmer was one of those who brought about the great Reformation in our religion, his memory has been respected and praised by many good, well-meaning persons; but he was not himself a great, good man; and, had the Reformation depended chiefly upon him, we should still have been worshipping consecrated wafers, and adoring winking pictures and bleeding images, at St. Paul's Cathedral and Westminster Abbey. Many of those who brought about the Reformation were not exactly the sort of men we could wish them to have been; still the Reformation itself was a great blessing. King Henry afterwards did more than any one in England to promote that glorious revolution of opinion; but he himself was a selfish tyrant. Many a bad man is unknowingly doing good work in the world—the unconscious instrument of a holy cause.

Cranmer, who was solemnly consecrated as archbishop on the 30th of March, had to purchase his elevation by, in all things, abjectly performing the will of the imperious king. This was a tacit understanding between him and that monarch; and Cranmer accordingly implored Henry to permit him to proceed to the final examination of the cause of his divorce, and pass judgment thereon. As this was exactly what Henry wanted, he consented directly. The parliament then passed an act, declaring all appeals to Rome unlawful; and another, which decreed that Catharine should not in future be called queen, but only Princess-Dowager of Wales, the title which she would have enjoyed as Prince Arthur's widow, had she never been married to Henry. Cranmer, in April, assembled a court of bishops at Dunstable, and summoned Catharine to appear in it. That high-minded woman refused to do so; and then the archbishop declared her contumacious, and pronounced her marriage with the king to be unlawful, and therefore annulled. This judgment was given against the queen on the 23rd of May, 1533; and, a few days afterwards, Cranmer publicly declared that Henry had already been married to Anne Boleyn, and that he now confirmed the marriage by his pastoral authority.

On the 1st of June, Anne was crowned queen at Westminster Abbey; and, on the 7th of September, she presented Henry with a little girl, who was named Elizabeth: in after-times she became the famous Queen Elizabeth, the greatest sovereign of the House of Tudor.—From this time the divorced Catharine was treated with great indignity; Henry did not permit her to have any servants that did not take an oath never to call her queen, but only princess-dowager; and as she would not keep any who did not salute her by that title, she was left almost without attendants.

The King of France laboured hard to bring about a reconciliation between Henry and the pope; but neither would either bend or yield; and, in a short time, a final separation of the church of England from that of Rome took place. The pope, when he heard the news of the king's marriage, annulled the judgment of Cranmer, and published a bull of excommunication against Henry and Anne. This sentence had no power, for the English clergy dared not observe it, and the king treated it with contempt; but he took his revenge on the pope nevertheless. Early in 1534, the year following his marriage, the parliament, at Henry's suggestion, passed an act confirming his title as Supreme Head, on Earth, of the English Church; and vested in him alone the right of appointment to all bishoprics, and of deciding in all ecclesiastical causes. It also prohibited every kind of appeal to the pope, and every kind of payment to him. This act (the Act of Supremacy as it was called) was a death-blow to the papal power in England. It is, however, one thing to make a law, and another to enforce it; and it cost much cruelty and bloodshed to compel the people to observe the Act of Supremacy; for, as yet, nine-tenths of them were sincere catholics: they regarded the pope as supreme head of the Christian church on earth, and would not acknowledge any one else by that title. Besides the Act of Supremacy, the parliament passed another act, by which they set aside Queen Catharine's daughter, the Princess Mary, as illegitimate; declared that the marriage between Henry and Anne was not only lawful, but that it was high treason to question or speak against it, and settled the succession to the crown on the children of Henry by his second queen. All the subjects of the king were commanded to swear obedience to this Act of Succession.

At this time, the case of Elizabeth Barton attracted great notoriety. She lived at Adlington, in Kent; and was subject to fits which threw her into strange convulsions of the face and body. During the time they lasted she uttered strange incoherent sayings, which made the ignorant people about her think she was inspired, and they declared her to be a prophetess, and named her the Holy Maid of Kent. The rector of the parish, one Richard Masters, encouraged these notions, in order to make a profit by them. In his chapel was an image of the Virgin Mary, for which he wished to gain such a reputation of sanctity as should draw many persons to make a pilgrimage to it, and offer rich presents to gain its favour. To effect this, he persuaded Elizabeth Barton, as early as 1525 or 1526, to make her appearance before the image, and then, after pretending to fall into terrible convulsions, suddenly to get up and declare she was perfectly restored through its grace and power. The design succeeded; the fame of this pretended miracle spread far and wide; and people visited the chapel in great numbers. Another person was connected with this imposture—a monk of Canterbury, named Bocking; and he and Masters began to extend their views, and teach the maid to make sham prophecies about public events, and to condemn the new doctrines as heresy, and displeasing to the Almighty. Gradually getting bolder, she had denounced the king's intended divorce from Queen Catharine, and declared that, if Henry put her away and married the Lady Anne Boleyn, he would forfeit God's favour, and die the death of a villain within seven months afterwards.

The supposed prophetess was countenanced by several persons of rank and education, who ought to have known much better than to have sanctioned such folly; and as her denunciations, and pretended prophecies, became topics of general conversation and comment, Henry caused Elizabeth Barton and several of her associates to be apprehended, and examined before the court of the Star-Chamber. They were brought before that tribunal on the 21st of April, 1534; pleaded guilty; and were sentenced to confess their imposture publicly, on a Sunday, at St. Paul's Cross. This was done; but Henry, considering that this punishment was not sufficient, compelled his parliament to pass a bill of attainder of treason against Elizabeth Barton, Masters, and Bocking, together with Dering, Gold, and Rich (three ecclesiastics), and one Risby, a gentleman, who had all been connected with her deceptions, or were so foolish as to believe them. Monstrous as it may seem, all these seven persons were condemned and put to death as traitors at Tyburn. When she was brought to the scaffold, the wretched young woman, who seems to have been persuaded into the deception by the rector and the monk, thus addressed the spectators:—"Hither am I come to die; and I have not only been the cause of mine own death, but am also the cause of the death of all these persons which at this time here suffer. And yet, to say the truth, I am not so much to be blamed, considering it was well known unto these learned men that I was a poor wench without learning; but because the things which I feigned were profitable unto them, therefore they much praised me, and bear me in hand that it was the Holy Ghost, and not I, that did them; and then I, being puffed up with their praises, fell into a certain pride and foolish fantasy, which thing hath brought me to this case."

Before the poor girl was cold in her coffin, John Fisher, the Bishop of Rochester, Sir Thomas More, the late lord chancellor, together with two other gentlemen, were charged with listening to and concealing her prophecies—an offence which was said to amount to misprision of treason. The venerable Bishop of Rochester had been Henry's friend, and the friend of his father, and he was much distinguished for learning; but he loved the ancient church, of which he was a prelate; and he objected to take the oath of succession, which declared that Queen Catharine's child, the Princess Mary, should not inherit her father's crown, and approved of the marriage of Henry and Anne. Sir Thomas More was an author of great elegance, and famous for his wisdom, wit, and extensive learning: he also refused to take the oath of succession, because it implied that Henry's former marriage with Queen Catharine was unlawful. In consequence of this, and their having listened to the prophecies of Elizabeth Barton, they were both sent to the Tower, and treated with very great severity. Bishop Fisher, who was in his seventy-sixth year, was left almost without clothes, and with scarcely sufficient food to keep him alive. While in this miserable condition, the pope, Paul III. (Clement VII. died on the 25th of September, 1534), created the aged priest a cardinal out of respect for his virtues; and sent him the scarlet hat worn by prelates of that dignity. "Ha!" said the king, "Paul may send him the hat; but I will take care that he have never a head to wear it on." He kept his word; the venerable bishop was tried before a special commission at Westminster Hall, on the 17th of June, 1535, for denying the supremacy of the king over the church. He was condemned; and, on the 22nd of June, beheaded. The grey head was exposed on a stake at London Bridge, and the body indecently exhibited in a state of nakedness to the people.

Henry trusted that this atrocity would frighten Sir Thomas More into taking the oaths of supremacy and succession; but he was mistaken; for Sir Thomas had determined rather to die than to act against his conscience. On the 1st of July, the commission again sat, and More was brought before it. When asked, whether he would obey the king's highness as supreme head on earth, immediately under Christ, of the church of England? he said he could make no answer. The next question put to him was, whether he would consent and approve the king's highness's marriage with the most noble Queen Anne to be good and lawful, and affirm that the marriage with the Lady Catharine, princess-dowager, was and is unjust and unlawful? He answered, that he did never speak or meddle against the same, but that he would make no further answer. A pardon was then offered him if he would submit to the king's will; but he declined to sacrifice the truth by doing so, and defended himself in a speech of great eloquence. The judges and nobles who conducted the case were abject slaves to the king; the trial was a mere mockery, and More was condemned to death. That bold man denounced the oath of supremacy as utterly unlawful, and declared that his conscience would not permit him to do otherwise. He had no animosity, he said, against his judges; but hoped that even as St. Paul was present at the death of Stephen, and consented to that cruel act, and yet was afterwards a companion saint in heaven, even so he trusted that they and he should all meet together hereafter.

As he was being taken back to the Tower, his daughter forced herself through the guards who surrounded him, and falling upon his neck, wept bitterly. He comforted her with great tenderness; and after bidding her an eternal farewell, moved forward. The poor girl looked after him with a distracted air, and then again bursting through the crowd, convulsively embraced him. The patriot had stood unmoved before his judges, but now the father burst into tears as he gave his last blessing to his child. The people wept too; and tears dimmed the eyes of the stern guards, used as they were to sights of misery and suffering.

When this painful scene was passed, Sir Thomas recovered his usual serenity; and even in his last moments his wit never deserted him. When he was told that the king had mercifully commuted his sentence of hanging, drawing, and quartering into the less revolting death of beheading, he remarked—"God preserve all my friends from such royal favours!" As he was about to mount the scaffold, it was discovered to be so badly made, that some fears were expressed that it might break down. "See me safe up, Mr. Lieutenant," said this noble martyr to his integrity, "and for my coming down let me shift for myself." When the executioner, according to custom, asked his forgiveness, he readily granted it, and added—"Friend, thou wilt render me to-day the greatest service in the power of man; but my neck is very short; take heed, therefore, that thou strike not awry for the sake of the credit of thy profession." When he placed his head on the block, he told the executioner to wait until he had put aside his beard; for, said he, with a gentle smile, "my beard never committed any treason." The axe then fell, and the head was severed at once. Thus, on the 6th of July, 1535—a year of blood and terror—perished the bravest and most accomplished man in England, because he would not yield to the commands of a vain and exacting king, when they trenched upon his honour and his conscientious belief. If it had not been for some persecutions against the reformers, in which this unhappy gentleman took an active part, on account of his extreme devotion to the Romish church, he would have been considered a perfect character. His head was set up on London Bridge; but, after having been exposed there for fourteen days, his daughter contrived to obtain possession of it. At her death, it was, according to her last request, buried in her arms.

Throughout Europe a sensation of disgust and indignation was excited at Henry's conduct; and at Rome he was freely compared to Caligula, Nero, and Domitian, whose crimes were said not to exceed his. The pope was so incensed, that he signed a bull citing Henry and his adherents to appear in Rome, within ninety days, to answer for their crimes. In case of their refusal, it declared them to be excommunicated, the king dethroned, the country laid under an interdict, and Henry's children by Anne Boleyn to be illegitimate. It also commanded the king's nobility to take up arms against him, freed his subjects from their oath of allegiance, and gave his kingdom to any foreign prince who pleased to invade it. But, whether from fear, or a hope of yet reclaiming Henry, and bringing him back to a submission to the Roman church, this extreme bull, though signed and ready, was not promulgated, but kept back for a time.

The English people, generally, were so terrified at Henry's fierce temper, and the shameful executions of Bishop Fisher and Sir Thomas More, that they took the oath, acknowledging the king as supreme head of the church, willingly enough. The bishops, whose duty it was chiefly to resist such an assumption, having all sworn to acknowledge the pope as the head of the church, were the first to abase themselves at the footstool of their sovereign. It was a sort of race between them who first should take an obligation which was a direct violation of one they had previously taken. But, in that age, it certainly is not to bishops and nobles that we must look for public spirit and honourable conduct. The courage and manliness that they should have exhibited, was trodden into the dust by the iron heel of the imperious king. Some of the monks and priests, however, refused to obey the edict, and would not take the oath. During the May of 1535—which was literally a year of terror—many of these honest and sincere ecclesiastics—as we must presume they were, however erroneous their faith and doctrines might be—were hanged, drawn, and quartered for this assumed offence.

But while Henry hanged and mutilated the Catholics, because they would not acknowledge him to be a sort of pope instead of the one at Rome, he was equally merciless to the Protestants, whom he burnt to death for heresy. The very month in which the wretched monks were half hanged, and then hewn into quarters by the knife of the executioner, because they were true Catholics, fourteen poor persons, natives of Holland, were burnt to death, in various parts of the country, because they were Protestants, and denied that the bread and wine in the sacrament was the real body and blood of the Saviour.

These events caused the monks to regard the king with fear and aversion. They looked upon him as the profane despoiler of their ancient religion; and he, in his turn, began to regard them as the boldest opponents of his wild and tyrannical pretensions. On this account he seems to have resolved on a great reduction of their numbers, if not upon destroying them altogether. Thomas Cromwell, now (A.D. 1535) Secretary of State, was an ardent reformer, and hated the monks bitterly; therefore Henry created him, what he called, vicar-general and royal vicegerent of the king, and gave him authority to manage all church business. He soon entered on the duties of his office, and proposed to the king to abolish certain monasteries, convents, and abbeys, and to seize all the property attached to them. Henry was delighted with the idea: he wanted money; and whether he got it by taxing the people, or by robbing the monks, he cared very little, so long as he did get it. Indeed, it seems that he considered robbing the church was the more pleasing way of the two; for it was a sort of tyranny he had not thought of before, and therefore it had the charm of novelty.

It was necessary to make some sort of excuse for this violence and dishonesty; and that excuse the sharp-sighted Cromwell soon invented. He charged the monks with being guilty of immorality and wickedness; and sent commissioners into the convents to inquire into the lives and manners of those who dwelt in them. No doubt many of the monks were idle, dissolute, ignorant persons: the strange sort of life to which they had devoted themselves was more likely to foster vice than to encourage virtue; to make them narrow-minded, superstitious, and selfish; and to shut out all tenderness and love from their hearts. They had no one whom they could love, and who would love them in return. Still, it is hardly to be believed that they were guilty of all the crimes which Cromwell's agents charged them with—crimes so numerous and revolting, that the nation shuddered at the publication of them.

Whilst these inquiries were in progress, Henry's discarded queen terminated her earthly career. Catharine had been living at Kimbolton; but sorrow, at the cruel indignities she had received, had so preyed upon her mind as to bring on a disorder of which it was evident she was dying. At the close of 1535, feeling her death approaching, she sent a request to the king, that she might be permitted to see her daughter Mary. This natural desire, though repeated several times, the callous-hearted Henry refused to gratify. A little before she expired, she wrote him a letter, calling him "her most dear lord, king, and husband." In this affecting communication she said—"The hour of my death now approaching, I cannot choose, out of the love I bear you, but advise you of your soul's health, which you ought to prefer before all considerations of the world or flesh whatsoever. For which yet you have cast me into many calamities, and yourself into many troubles. But I forgive you all, and pray God to do so likewise. For the rest, I commend unto you Mary, our daughter, beseeching you to be a good father unto her, as I have hitherto desired. I must entreat you also to respect my maids, and give them in marriage, which is not much, they are but three; and to all my other servants I solicit a year's pay, lest otherwise they should be unprovided for. Lastly, I make this vow—that mine eyes desire you above all things."

That persecuted lady breathed her last on the 8th of January, 1536, in the fiftieth year of her age. It is said that Henry was melted when he received the letter she had written in her last moments, and even shed tears over it. Well he might; for his cruelty had driven a noble, high-spirited, and loving woman to a sad and premature end of a life once splendid and happy. But though Henry grieved, Anne Boleyn rejoiced at the death of the woman whom she had supplanted in her husband's love, and exclaimed, that for the first time she was truly a queen.

Alas! how insecure are we in our happiest moments—how ignorant of the events of the future! Although she knew it not, Anne, though apparently standing in the warm sunshine, was hovering, in reality, on the verge of a gloomy precipice, and wantoning in a luxuriant garden, the clustering roses of which concealed a terribly sharp thorn.

CHAPTER LI.

CONTINUATION OF THE REIGN OF HENRY THE EIGHTH.—A.D. 1536—1538.

DURING the year 1536, King Henry, at the solicitation of Cromwell and Cranmer, permitted the Bible to be translated into English, and read by the people. A translation had been made by the good old reformer, Wycliffe, in the reign of Edward III.; but it appears that was old-fashioned in its style of language, or otherwise objectionable; at any rate it was not printed. The Bible used for the instruction of the people at this period of Henry's reign, was a translation by Miles Coverdale, an English monk, afterwards made Bishop of Exeter. Some people objected to this translation, and Henry ordered several bishops to read it, and then give their judgment upon it. Their answer was, that it possessed many faults. The king inquired if there were any heresies in it? The bishops answered, that they found none. Then said Henry, "In God's name let it go abroad among my people." Some years before, another English translation of the Bible, by William Tyndal, was printed at Antwerp, and the copies brought over and sold in this country. But it was thought better to have a new translation made by authorised persons—one which should be generally used and relied upon. Cranmer, therefore, induced a convocation of the clergy to petition the king to give orders for the preparation of such a translation. Henry consented. The convocation met in 1538; their labours extended into 1539; and the result was the publication, in the latter year, of Cranmer's Bible, or the Great Bible, as it was called, for the sake of distinction.

Though Henry consented that every one should be permitted to read the Word of God, he still doubted whether more harm than good would not be done by so great an innovation. Cranmer and Cromwell had sufficient influence to induce him to consent to it, especially as they told him that nothing would make the pope and the monks so hateful to the nation, and his own supremacy so acceptable, as his giving to the people the free Word of God; but his own mind was unsettled upon the subject. Those who were attached to the Romish religion, said that the people were so ignorant and stupid as to be unable to form any judgment upon many points of doctrine; and that it was a mockery to give them the Bible when they could not make any proper use of it. It was maintained the church only could interpret the Bible, because God was with it and assisted it; but that if men presumed to rely for help upon their own judgments, they would be led into many errors; and such a multitude of sects would arise, that religion would be at an end, and society thrown into utter confusion. Those, however, who were in favour of the reformed doctrines, contended that it was absurd to conceal the Word of God in the mystery of a language which the people did not understand, and that it was time the practices of the church should be compared with the sacred ground of revelation, upon which they were supposed to rest. Fortunately, for the cause of truth, these latter arguments were successful.

Another change in the domestic life of Henry was now approaching. Three weeks after the death of Catharine, Anne was confined of a son; but the child was born lifeless. This was a great disappointment to Henry, and served to wean his fickle affection from the queen. The truth is, he had already seen another lady who had attracted his fancy; for it would be absurd to call such selfish feelings as his by the name of love. This was Jane Seymour, a daughter of Sir John Seymour, a young lady of great beauty, and one of Anne's maids of honour. The queen had been brought up in the gay court of France, and she indulged in many little levities of manner which were not considered proper in one of her high rank. She was vain of her beauty, fond of admiration, and talked familiarly with persons who were once her equals, but to whom, according to the customs of a court, she should now have behaved with a certain reserve and dignity. There was no great harm in this; but some enemies of the queen, who envied her for her elevation above them, noticing that Henry's attachment towards her had cooled, insinuated that her conduct was not so pure and innocent as it should be. The king's jealousy was soon excited; and, on the 1st of May, 1536, not four months after Catharine's death, as he was with Anne and the court at a tilting match at Greenwich, he was offended in consequence of her dropping her handkerchief, which, he supposed, she purposely let fall that some favoured admirer might pick it up. Rising abruptly from his seat, he left the pastimes, and went moodily to London. Anne wondered at this conduct; but her wonder was soon turned into terror; for the next day she was arrested on a charge of treason. As she was being rowed up the river to the Tower, she was met by her uncle the Duke of Norfolk, and some other courtiers, who told her that she was accused of adultery. The unhappy queen immediately fell upon her knees, and exclaimed, "O Lord! help me, as I am guiltless of that whereof I am charged." On entering the Tower, she burst into fits of hysterical laughing and crying, seeming quite bewildered by the unexpected change in her fortune.

At the same time that the queen was arrested, her brother, Viscount Rochford, together with Henry Norris, William Brereton, and Francis Weston, gentlemen attending on the king, and Mark Smeaton, a musician, were also sent to the Tower, on a charge of sharing in her guilt. There is something very shocking in the supposition that her own brother was her lover, nor was there anything to support such an accusation. The others had all been imprudent enough to express great admiration for the beautiful but flighty queen; but Anne declared that she had never given them any encouragement. On one occasion, she admitted she had laughingly asked Norris why he did not marry, and then told him that he probably expected her, if she should become a widow. Another time, she said she had reproved Weston for his affection towards a young lady who was a relation of her's, and his indifference to his wife; and that he had told her that she had mistaken the object of his affection, for it was she herself whom he loved; and that, for this presumption, she had been very angry with him. She declared that her admirers had never said anything further than what she thus confessed; and that she herself had never even any thought of harm.

As Anne's protestations of her innocence were disregarded, and produced no effect, she wrote an affecting and elegant letter to Henry; which, although it is a long one, is so full of interest, that it deserves a place in history. It shows that, with all her frivolity, she had a generous heart—as is evidenced by her urgent request to the king, that, if he believed her guilty, he would not visit others with punishment for her supposed sin. It also has an air of truthfulness; and there can be no doubt, on reading it, that Anne knew very well, the real cause of the king's displeasure with her was, that his fickle mind was captivated by the attractions of another.

"Sir,—Your grace's displeasure and my imprisonment are things so strange unto me, as what to write or what to excuse I am altogether ignorant. Whereas you send unto me (willing me to confess a truth, and so obtain your favour) by such an one whom you know to be mine ancient professed enemy; I no sooner received this message by him than I rightly conceived your meaning; and if, as you say, confessing a truth indeed may procure my safety, I shall, with all willingness and duty, perform your command. But let not your grace ever imagine that your poor wife will ever be brought to acknowledge a fault where not so much as a thought thereof preceded. And, to speak the truth, never prince had wife more loyal in all duty, and in all true affection, than you have ever found in Anne Boleyn: with which name and place I could willingly have contented myself, if God and your grace's pleasure had been so pleased. Neither did I, at any time, so far forget myself in my exaltation or received queenship, but that I always looked for such an alteration as I now find; for the ground of my preferment being on no surer foundation than your grace's fancy, the least alteration, I knew, was fit and sufficient to draw that fancy to some other object. You have chosen me from a low estate to be your queen and companion, far beyond my desert or desire. If, then, you found me worthy of such honour, good, your grace, let not any light fancy, or bad counsel of mine enemies, withdraw your princely favour from me: neither let that stain, that unworthy stain, of a disloyal heart towards your good grace, ever cast so foul a blot on your most dutiful wife, and the infant princess your daughter. Try me, good king, but let me have a lawful trial, and let not my sworn enemies sit as my accusers and judges; yea, let me receive an open trial; for my truth shall fear no open shame; then shall you see either mine innocence cleared, your suspicion and conscience satisfied, the ignominy and slander of the world stopped, or my guilt openly declared. So that whatsoever God or you may determine of me, your grace may be freed from an open censure; and mine offence being so lawfully proved, your grace is at liberty, both before God and man, not only to execute worthy punishment on me as an unlawful wife, but to follow your affection already settled on that party for whose sake I am now as I am, whose name I could some good while since have pointed unto, your grace not being ignorant of my suspicion therein. But if you have already determined of me, and that not only my death, but an infamous slander, must bring you the enjoying of your desired happiness, then I desire of God that He will pardon your great sin therein, and likewise mine enemies, the instruments thereof, and that He will not call you to a strict account for your unprincely and cruel usage of me, at His general judgment-seat, where both you and myself must shortly appear, and in whose judgment, I doubt not (whatsoever the world may think of me), mine innocence shall be openly known and sufficiently cleared. My last and only request shall be, that myself may only bear the burden of your grace's displeasure, and that it may not touch the innocent souls of those poor gentlemen, who (as I understand) are likewise in strait imprisonment for my sake. If ever I have found favour in your sight, if ever the name of Anne Boleyn hath been pleasing in your ears, then let me obtain this request, and I will so leave to trouble your grace any farther, with mine earnest prayers to the Trinity to have your grace in his good keeping, and to direct you in all your actions.—From my doleful prison in the Tower, this sixth of May.—Your most loyal and ever faithful wife—ANNE BOLEYN."

This touching letter (which, had Anne been a more blameless character in respect of her conduct to Queen Catharine, would bring tears into the eyes of those even who were strangers to her) did not reach the heart of Henry. Her affection, her grace, her beauty, and arch cheerfulness, were all forgotten; and her faithless husband longed for her death, that he might marry the Lady Jane Seymour. Every cruel and unjust means was taken to procure such evidence as would serve for the condemnation of the wretched queen. She was surrounded by spies, who pretended to be her friends, and endeavoured to draw her, during conversation, into admissions which could be used against her. Those who had been arrested as her lovers were tampered with, and offered their lives if they would confess their guilt and accuse her. All of them refused, save one—Smeaton, the musician, who, from a hope of life, and a fear of being put to the torture, confessed that he had received guilty tokens of her affection. Such a witness as this was, of course, not to be believed.

The grand jury of Middlesex, on the 10th and 12th of May, had the cases of Norris, Brereton, and Weston before them, and returned "true bills." Smeaton was also arraigned, with the same result. The charge against them was high treason: they were tried in the afternoon of the 12th; found guilty, and executed on the 17th; the king refusing to pardon Smeaton, who had expected to escape death in consequence of his treachery to the queen. Viscount Rochford was tried at the same time by his peers, and found guilty. His lordship and the four commoners all suffered on the same day.

Two days previously, on the 15th, the queen had been put upon her trial before a jury of peers, on the charges of treason and adultery. Her own uncle, the Duke of Norfolk, who greatly disliked her, was the presiding judge. She had no counsel; but she defended herself in such a manner that quite convinced the spectators of her innocence. It is very likely that the peers also believed her to be guiltless; but they were the slavish instruments of the king's will: they knew that he desired her to be found guilty; and they were mean and wicked enough to bring in a verdict to that effect. She was sentenced to be burnt or beheaded, according to the king's pleasure. On hearing this dreadful doom, she raised her hands towards heaven, as if imploring that justice which she could not obtain upon earth, and exclaimed—"O Father! O Creator! Thou who art the way, the truth, and the life, Thou knowest that I have not deserved this fate."

At first Anne thought that her sentence would not be executed, but that she would be permitted to live in banishment. This hope faded as she beheld the preparations for her death. Then she resigned herself to the cruel fate that awaited her; but, in spite of all her efforts at patience, she frequently fell into fits of hysterical laughter and tears. Her execution was appointed for the 18th of May, but it was cruelly deferred until the next day. Sending for the lieutenant of the Tower, she said, "I hear I shall not die before noon, and I am very sorry therefore, for I thought to be dead by this time, and past my pain." The lieutenant told her it would be no pain, it was so subtle. Anne laughed as she put her hands round her delicate, white neck, and exclaimed, "I heard say the executioner was very good, and I have a little neck."

The next day, the 19th of May, 1536, she was led to the scaffold on the Tower Green. Before laying her head upon the block, she addressed this short speech to the nobles and citizens who had been admitted to witness her death:—"Good Christian people, I am come hither to die according to law; by the law I am judged to die, and therefore will I speak nothing against it. I am come hither to accuse no man, nor to speak anything of that whereof I am accused. I pray God save the king, and send him long to reign over you, for a gentler or more merciful prince was there never. To me he was ever a good, gentle, and sovereign lord; and if any person will meddle with my cause, I require them to judge the best: and thus I take my leave of the world and of you all; and I heartily desire you all to pray for me." It may seem strange that Anne, with her last breath, praised her husband for mercy and gentleness: it looks like dying with a lie upon her lips; for she knew her own fate to be a fearful instance of his savage and remorseless nature. But it has been supposed that she flattered her destroyer in the hope that he would be a kind father to her infant child, Elizabeth, whom, in a few minutes, she was about to leave motherless. Having finished her speech, she put aside her beautiful hair, and laying her head upon the block, repeated the words—"Christ have mercy upon my soul!" until the axe fell, and at one blow her head was severed from her body. She had been a queen three years and about four months.

The very next morning after Anne's death, the king married Jane Seymour! Haste like this was as indelicate as it was unfeeling; but Henry had become so disgustingly selfish and tyrannical, that he was capable of anything. Not contented with Anne's death, he ordered Archbishop Cranmer to declare that the marriage with her also was illegal, as there was a sort of contract existing between her and some other person. Cranmer knew that the marriage was perfectly lawful—he himself had very lately declared it to be so; but he had not the courage to speak the truth in the face of danger. He trembled, and obeyed.

After having divorced his first wife, murdered his second, and married his third (all within the short space of three years), Henry met his parliament, which assembled on the 8th of June. His majesty—[the title "Your Majesty," was first applied to Henry by Francis I., at the meeting on the Field of the Cloth of Gold. It has since been constantly used by the English sovereigns]—addressed the members in a speech, in which he said, that notwithstanding the misfortunes attending his former marriages, he had been induced, for their good, to enter on a third. The parasite Speaker, Rich, replied, that the people were very grateful for the kindness of the king, whom he compared, for justice and prudence, to Solomon; for strength and fortitude, to Sampson; and for beauty and comeliness, to Absalom! Henry, who had then become very corpulent, smiled at these ridiculous compliments, and said, that if he really were possessed of such graces, he ought not to be proud of them, as they were the gift of Almighty God. He then desired the parliament to pass an act, by which he should be enabled to leave the crown to any children whom he might have by Jane Seymour, or any other wife; or that he might bequeath it by his will to any one whom he thought proper. Such an act changed the nature of the English government; but the servile parliament passed it.

Henry's mind had been for some time diverted from the subject of the church and the doctrines of religion; but he now resolved on breaking all connection between the churches of England and Rome. Cromwell had persevered in the inquiry into the lives and conduct of the monks; and so many strange charges were brought forward, that a general sensation of anger was created against them in the minds of the people. This was just the thing for Henry's purpose; and he compelled the parliament to pass an act, by which all the small monasteries in England, with revenues of less than £200 per annum, amounting to 376, were suppressed, and their revenues, plate, and jewels made over to the king. The Commons hesitated at first at this startling measure; but the tyrant told them that he would have the bill or their heads, and then these unworthy Englishmen assented. The members of a few of these establishments, when they discovered the determination of the king, voluntarily surrendered their revenues, and received a trifling pension out of their own property. Small pensions were also given to some of the principals of the other monasteries; but the monks and nuns, who lived in them, were turned out to do the best they could. Thousands wandered about the country, begging in a state of starvation; for most of them were so unacquainted with the ways of the world, that they were unfit to earn their bread by any employment. The king was quite indifferent to their sufferings, and he occupied himself in settling what the people were in future to believe with respect to religion. He reduced the number of sacraments from seven to three; namely—baptism, the Lord's Supper, and penance. He abolished a number of saints' days, or holidays, and declared that the Scriptures, the Apostolic, Nicene, and Athanasian creeds were to be the sole standards of faith. He insisted on the necessity of confession; permitted people to believe in purgatory, or not, just as they pleased; but declared that any one who denied the presence of the actual body and blood of the Saviour in the consecrated bread and wine, was a heretic, who should be burnt to death at the stake. These tenets show that the king was neither a Catholic nor a Protestant, but something between the two.

The indignation which had been excited against the monks was soon turned into pity when it was seen what they had to endure. The great mass of the people were still attached to the Catholic church; and they felt that the suppression of the smaller monasteries, and the ruin of their inhabitants, was a violation of the ancient religion of the country, and an act of cruel oppression. The slumbering spirit of Englishmen was at length aroused, and in October, 1536, a formidable insurrection broke out in Lincolnshire. It was headed by Dr. Mackrel, prior of Barlings, who disguised himself like a mechanic, and assumed the name of Captain Cobbler. Twenty thousand men obeyed his orders; but, although they committed some excesses, they did not seem inclined to proceed to extremities against the king. In reply to a demand by the Duke of Suffolk, as to what were their complaints, they answered, that they acknowledged the king to be the supreme head of the church, but they complained of the suppression of the monasteries; of his evil counsellors; of mean persons being raised to great dignities; of the danger to which the jewels and plate of their churches were exposed; and they prayed the king to consult the nobility of the realm concerning the redress of such grievances.

Henry gave a severe and contemptuous reply to these complaints; but he afterwards sent a milder answer, saying that he would pardon the treason of the rebels, if they would surrender their ringleaders, and disperse. Whether through fear or treachery, the Lincolnshire men surrendered Captain Cobbler and fifteen of their leaders, and then broke up their army, and went to their homes. Dr. Mackrel, the prior (or the captain, as he was called), was hanged, together with his associates. During the progress of this insurrection, a priest and a butcher were hanged at Windsor, without any trial. Their only offence was, that they had spoken some discontented words. The butcher was offered a low price for some of his meat, and he replied, indignantly, that sooner than sell it for such a price as that, he wished the good fellows in Lincolnshire might have it; the priest, who was standing near, added, that he too wished them to have it, for they had need of it.—When men were thus put to death for thoughtless words, no one was safe from the gibbet; and a terror of the tyrant reigned throughout the land.

Still, the insurrection in Lincolnshire was no sooner put down, than, in 1537, another and much more extensive one broke out in the northern counties. Again, 40,000 Englishmen rose in arms, and chose a Yorkshire gentleman, named Robert Aske, for their leader. They called their rebellion "The Pilgrimage of Grace;" and all engaged in it took an oath to stand by each other, for the love of God and of the church. Some priests marched before them, carrying crosses in their hands: they wore upon their sleeves the emblem of the five wounds of the Saviour, and the name of Jesus; and on their banners was painted a figure of Christ in his dying agony. The rebels threatened with death all who would not join them; and Lord Darcy, the Archbishop of York, and other distinguished persons, went over to their ranks.

Henry sent an army to the north, under the command of the Duke of Norfolk and other noblemen; but Norfolk, who feared to fight such a multitude, again demanded to know what were their grievances. The rebels sent in a paper, making much the same complaints as the men of Lincolnshire did; but also adding some others. The most important of these additions showed that the people still loved the ancient religion of the country; and that the Protestants were as yet but a very small part of the nation. The rebels desired that the heresies, as they called them, of Wycliffe and Luther should be rooted out, all heretical books destroyed, and the spiritual supremacy of the church restored to the pope.

The king sent a reply, in which he said that he was astonished the people should take upon themselves to instruct him how to govern after he had been so long a king; and he ended by only promising to pardon their rebellion, on condition of their giving up to him ten of their leaders for punishment. The rebels refused these terms, and prepared to attack the royal army; but they were prevented from doing so by a great fall of rain, which rendered the river Trent impassable. Though Henry was obstinate, yet he was much alarmed; and he sent large sums of money, to be used in buying over some of the leaders of the people. This produced quarrels and suspicions; the rebels soon lost all trust in their own captains; and having also failed in several sieges which they undertook, they despaired of success, and began to disperse. Lord Darcy, Captain Aske, and many other gentlemen, were taken prisoners, and sent to the scaffold as traitors. Henry then commanded Norfolk to proclaim martial law, and take vengeance upon the inhabitants of all the towns and villages that had been concerned in the insurrection. He was also particularly directed to hang all monks who had encouraged the rebels; and these savage orders were so strictly obeyed, that for miles corpses were hanging from the branches of trees; and ghastly heads and blackening limbs were fixed upon the gates of every town throughout the disturbed districts. When the king thought sufficient blood had been shed to satisfy the calls of justice, he proclaimed a general pardon.

Soon after this sign that the spirit of Englishmen was not utterly extinguished, and that they had not learnt to submit to tyranny in passive stupor, Queen Jane Seymour presented Henry, on the 12th of October, 1537, with a son. But the gift was fatal to the mother, who died two days after her confinement. The king was so delighted at the birth of a boy, that he soon forgot the loss of his queen. Perhaps it was fortunate for her she died naturally before she lost the favour of her stern husband: had she outlived his liking, he might have got up some charge which would have sent her to the same cruel fate as that which befel poor Anne Boleyn.

Henry suspected that the insurrection in Lincolnshire and Yorkshire had been encouraged by many of the abbots and clergy, and he now resolved on the suppression of those large and wealthy monasteries which he had hitherto spared. A new visitation was appointed of all the monasteries in England; and many of the abbots, knowing that they could not resist the will of the tyrant, gave up their houses and estates to him, in order to secure their own safety. Others, however, refused to surrender what they said was not theirs to give, but had been devoted to the glory of God and the cause of charity. They were, in consequence, thrown into the public prisons, where they died so rapidly, that it was suspected they were killed by some quicker means than ill-usage.

To reconcile the people to the destruction of the monasteries, stories were everywhere circulated about the immoral lives of the monks and nuns, and their frauds were publicly exposed to the people. A great crucifix, called the Rood of Grace, was brought up from Boxley, in Kent, and broken to pieces before the people at St. Paul's Cross. The figure of the Saviour, extended upon this crucifix, used to roll its eyes, bend its brows, and shake its head, when it was supposed to be displeased with those who prayed or made offerings before it; but when it was gratified, then it would bend its body forward in a kind of bow. The ignorant people thought that this was done by divine power; but the image was discovered to be set in motion by machinery, which was shown and explained to the crowd before it was destroyed. Another supposed miracle, thus detected and exposed, was a crystal phial, kept at Hales, in Gloucestershire, and said to contain some of the blood of the Saviour. This sacred blood, the monks said, could not be seen by any sinful person, even when it was placed before them, until they expiated their offences by presenting rich gifts on the altar of the monastery. The trick was managed in this way: one side of the phial was made of thin, transparent crystal, and the other of thick and opaque glass. In this was placed the blood of a duck, which two of the monks, who were in the secret, renewed every week. When a rich pilgrim came, they showed him the dark side of the phial, until he had made sufficient offerings and paid for masses enough to expiate his sins, or until he would give nothing more; and then they turned the phial round, and the blood became visible.

The relics also of saints and sacred things were taken from the monasteries, and exposed to the ridicule of the people. Some of these were, indeed, so absurd, that it seems hardly possible they could ever have been regarded with veneration even by the most ignorant persons. Amongst them was an angel with one wing, which was said to have brought over, with the spear-head that pierced the side of our Saviour, some of the coals used in burning St. Lawrence; the parings of St. Edmund's toe-nails; the penknife, shirt, and boots of St. Thomas à Becket; eleven different girdles of the Virgin Mary; and as many pieces of the wood of the true cross as would have been enough to make several crosses. There were also an immense number of relics, which were supposed to be useful for particular purposes: relics to procure rain; relics to prevent too much rain; relics to make corn and fruit grow; and relics to kill weeds.

It was quite right to expose all this absurdity and fraud, which disgraced the name of religion: Henry's motive in doing so, however, was not to promote the truth, but to wean the respect of the people away from the monks and monasteries, that he might be able to plunder them without opposition. Not content with stripping the shrines and altars of all the gold and jewels which had been lavished upon them, under the pretence of putting down the worshipping of images, the imperious king proceeded to take revenge upon the bones of the famous Thomas à Becket. The prelate had been made a saint in consequence of his zealous defence of the privileges of the church against the king; and for this reason his memory was especially loved by the priests. His body was raised once a year from the grave; and that day was held as a general holiday. Every fifty years a jubilee, which lasted for fifteen days, was celebrated in his honour. So many offerings were made at his shrine, that it was perfectly gorgeous with gold and precious stones; and at Canterbury Cathedral, the devotion towards him had even made that of the Deity himself almost forgotten. During one year, £3 2*s.* 6*d.* were offered on the altar of the Lord; while the offerings on St. Thomas's altar amounted to £832 12*s.* 3*d.*

The same reason for which the monks so reverenced the memory of Becket was the cause of the king's indignation and displeasure. Henry had no idea that an archbishop should dare to oppose a king; and though Becket had been dead nearly 400 years, Henry had his tomb broken open, and a criminal proceeding filed against him. The king actually summoned the dead man to appear in Westminster Hall within the space of thirty days, and answer to the charge against him. Of course the dry bones of the archbishop remained motionless in the silence and darkness of his coffin: the tyrant could violate the sanctity of the grave, but he could not make the dead conscious of the petty insult. As Becket did not appear, he was pronounced contumacious; found guilty of rebellion and treason; and his bones were sentenced to be burnt as those of a traitor. This was a lesson to living men not to oppose the will of the king. All the wealth which adorned the shrine of Becket was considered as his personal property, and forfeited to the crown.

After this, the king proceeded to seize all the abbeys and monasteries throughout the land. Colleges, chapels, and hospitals alike fell beneath the hand of the spoiler. Shrines were robbed of everything that was valuable; statues mutilated; pictures rent into shreds; mosaic pavements torn up; and magnificent, painted windows shattered into atoms. The zealots who acted as the king's commissioners spared nothing that was connected with the religion which they hated. Horses were stabled in the noble old cathedrals and abbeys, and the valuable manuscript libraries belonging to these places were sold for waste paper. All this was very barbarous and pitiable; but violence seems to attend all great revolutions. This work of spoliation continued for more than two years; and then all the abbeys in England, except where they were parish churches also, were left bare and ruined.

The people, generally, were shocked at these proceedings, and murmured loudly; and, no doubt, to many of them it seemed more like the extinction of religion than its reformation. To reconcile them to such wild proceedings, they were told that the king would never, in future, have occasion to levy any taxes, but would be able to pay all the expenses of government from the profits arising from the abbey lands. But the wealth so dishonestly obtained was squandered in the most shameful manner; and the king, soon afterwards, had the confidence to demand from the parliament a supply of money to meet the expenses he had incurred in reforming the religion of the state.

Though the suppression of the monasteries was a necessary step in the progress of the Reformation in religion, every one must condemn the violence and injustice with which that suppression was accompanied. The immediate result was very disastrous. The schools kept in the monasteries were suppressed; and, as there was nothing to supply their place, education, even such as it had been, declined rapidly. The people were left almost without religious instruction; the rural parishes were attended to by persons of no education; for noblemen, on whom church lands had been conferred, presented their servants with livings as a payment for their wages. These men frequently spent their time at the ale-house, and sometimes even kept one themselves, to eke out the living which the discharge of their clerical duties did not afford them. Crowds of starving and desperate beggars travelled along the roads, not knowing where to get a shelter or a crust of bread. They had been fed daily at the doors of the monasteries (for the monks were exceedingly charitable to the poor), and now they were left without any resource whatever. Many of the monks were beggars like themselves. The abbeys, with all their frauds and abuses, had also served as hospitals, where the sick were tended and restored; and as places of refuge, where the benighted traveller got refreshment and a night's rest. All this charity and hospitality was at an end; and a purer religion had not yet arisen from the ruins of the old. Night had fallen upon the church; and the darkness was greatest just before the dawning of a brighter and a better day. Priestcraft, deception, and superstition grovelled in the dust; but for a time, all that was venerable, true, and good in the old system of religion lay prostrate with it.

When Henry's conduct was known at Rome, the rage of the pope and the sacred college of cardinals was almost beyond description. The pope issued the bull of excommunication against the king which he had long kept in reserve, and publicly delivered his soul to the devil, and his dominions to the first invader. The time when a sentence of excommunication would throw an English king into terror and submission was past; still Henry felt a little nervous; for he feared that the wrath of the pope might stir up foreign princes to unite in a war against him. His strong-minded minister, Cromwell, however, removed his fears.

CHAPTER LII.

CONTINUATION OF THE REIGN OF HENRY THE EIGHTH.—A.D. 1538—1542.

THE fires of martyrdom continued to blaze throughout the kingdom; for although, in the eyes of the pope, Henry was the greatest and worst heretic in England, yet he spared none who, whilst they followed his example in differing from the pope, had the misfortune to differ from him also. Though he had overthrown the authority of Rome in this country, he still, as we have seen, held many of the doctrines of the Roman church; and he condemned, as detestable heretics, all who would not agree with him.

Not long after the plunder of the monasteries, there was a schoolmaster living in London, named John Lambert, who had embraced the reformed religion. He had been a priest, and also been imprisoned on a charge of heresy. This, however, did not prevent him from still teaching what he considered to be the truth. Having heard Dr. Taylor preach a sermon, in which he declared that, in the sacrament, the bread and wine were transformed into the actual body and blood of Christ, Lambert went to that minister, and presented to him a written expostulation upon the subject. Dr. Taylor showed the paper to a certain Dr. Barnes. This man, though himself a reformer upon some points, yet did not exactly agree with Lambert; and he was so intolerant as to accuse the schoolmaster, before Archbishop Cranmer, of heresy. Cranmer held the same doctrine in secret, but he dared not avow it; and he tried to make Lambert recant his opinions. He refused to do so, and appealed from the judgment of the archbishop to that of the king.

Henry was pleased with this opportunity of exercising his assumed authority as supreme head of the church, and also of showing his learning. He consented to listen to the appeal of the schoolmaster: and ordered scaffolds to be erected in Westminster Hall, for the accommodation of such of the bishops and nobles as pleased to attend. On the appointed day he took his seat upon the throne, accompanied with all the pomp of majesty, and surrounded by bishops, nobles, judges, and lawyers.

After looking sternly at Lambert, the king told the Bishop of Chichester to declare to the people the reason for the meeting of that assembly. The bishop then made an oration, in which he said that the king would have all persons admonished at his pleasure; and that no one must suppose, because he had utterly abolished the authority of the pope, that he would also extinguish religion, or give liberty to heretics to trouble the church of England. That they were not met to dispute upon the heretical doctrine, but only that the heresies of Lambert should be refuted or condemned in the presence of them all.

When the bishop had finished speaking, the king rose from his seat, and leaning upon a cushion of white cloth of tissue, he turned to Lambert with a stern countenance, and exclaimed in a loud voice—"Ho, good fellow! what is thy name?" The schoolmaster knelt humbly, and replied—"My name is John Nicholson; although by many I am called Lambert."

"What!" said the king; "have you two names? I would not trust you, having two names, although you were my brother!"

"O, most noble prince," said Lambert, "your bishops forced me to change my name." He then commenced his address with some compliments to the king; but Henry interrupted him by saying—"I came not hither to hear mine own praises thus pointed out in my presence; but briefly go to the matter without any more circumstance."

This interruption abashed the poor schoolmaster; and he stood silent for a time, considering. The king then said, angrily—"Why standest thou still? answer me as touching the sacrament of the altar, whether dost thou say that it is the body of Christ, or wilt thou deny it?" To this Lambert replied—"I answer with St. Augustine, that it is the body of Christ, after a certain manner."

"Answer me not out of St. Augustine," said the king, "neither by the authority of any other; but tell me plainly, whether thou sayest it is the body of Christ, or not?" "Then," said Lambert, "I do deny it to be the body of Christ." "Mark well," continued the king, "for now shalt thou be condemned, even by Christ's own words—'This is my body!'" Lambert answered, that there was no evident place in Scripture in which the Saviour said that he would change the consecrated bread into his body; but that it was merely a figurative speech, the same as many hundreds of others used in the sacred writings.

When the king had browbeaten Lambert until he was tired, Cranmer and nine other bishops harassed the poor man with arguments; and, after standing and occasionally replying to them for five hours, he was almost exhausted. Twilight was now coming on, and torches were brought into the hall, upon which the king (who wished to go home to his dinner) again turned towards Lambert, and inquired—"What sayest thou now, after all these great labours which thou hast taken upon thee, and all the reasons and instructions of these learned men? Art thou not yet satisfied? Wilt thou live or die? What sayest thou? Thou hast free choice."

"I yield and submit myself," answered Lambert, "wholly unto the will of your majesty." "Then," said the king, "commit thyself unto the hands of God, and not unto mine." "My soul," continued the reformer, "I commend unto the hands of God; but my body I wholly yield and submit unto your clemency." "Then," said the inexorable monarch, "if you commit yourself to my judgment, you must die, for I will not be a patron to heretics;" and turning to Cromwell, he commanded him to read the sentence. Lambert was accordingly condemned to be burnt to death at the stake. He met his fate in Smithfield with great fortitude and resignation. His sufferings were extreme; but, so long as he remained sensible, he lifted up his hands amidst the flames, and cried continually—"None but Christ! none but Christ!"

While Henry was making every one submit to his tyranny at home, there was one man abroad of whom he stood in fear. This was Cardinal Pole, a son of the Countess of Salisbury, daughter of that Duke of Clarence who was said to be drowned in a butt of wine in the Tower. Pole, in his youth, had been a favourite of the king; but having quarrelled with him, he had retired to Italy, from whence he wrote and published works condemning Henry's shameful rapacity and tyranny, in an eloquent and bitter manner. Having failed in several attempts to get the cardinal into his hands, Henry at length arrested his two brothers, Lord Montague and Sir Geoffrey Pole, together with the Marquis and Marchioness of Exeter, Sir Edward Neville, brother to Lord Abergavenny, two priests, and a sailor; all of whom were tried on the last day of 1538, on a charge of treason, they having conspired to place Cardinal Pole, the king's enemy, on the throne. The peers were tried by some members of the House of Peers, the commoners by juries. All were found guilty, with the exception of Sir Geoffrey Pole (who was base enough to turn "king's evidence"), and condemned to death. On the 9th of January, 1539, Lord Montague, the Marquis of Exeter, and Sir Edward Neville, were beheaded on Tower Hill. The Marchioness of Exeter, who had not been tried, remained in prison.

This was not enough to satisfy Henry. The hatred which he bore towards Cardinal Pole extended to all the relatives of that prelate, and particularly to his mother, the Countess of Salisbury, who was seventy years of age. He had also a mean jealousy of her, because she was the last direct descendant of the royal House of York. Suddenly, he caused that venerable lady to be arrested on several frivolous charges. One was, that she had written to her son; another, that she had secretly received bulls from Rome; and a third, that she had employed her authority in preventing her servants from reading the new translation of the Bible. Even these accusations, Henry's ready tool in matters of tyranny, Cromwell, was unable to prove; but the king had resolved on shedding the blood of the countess, and he would not be baffled. He commanded Cromwell to ask the judges whether parliament might convict persons of treason without any trial or confession? The judges were astonished at this monstrous tyranny; but they dared not speak their minds. They replied, that it was a dangerous question; that the high court of parliament ought to be an example to inferior courts; that no inferior court could act in that manner; and that they thought the parliament never would. Cromwell pressed for a more decided answer; and the judges then replied, that, as the court of parliament was supreme, such a condemnation would be good in law.

Having extorted this reluctant sanction for an act of gross injustice from the judges, parliament was summoned for the 28th of April, 1539, to pass a bill of attainder against the countess. Cromwell produced a banner in the House of Lords, which, he said, had been found in her mansion. Upon this banner was embroidered a representation of the five wounds of the Saviour, the symbol of the northern rebels; and this was considered to be sufficient evidence to convict the aged lady of high treason. A bill of attainder was, in consequence, passed against her; and also against the Marchioness of Exeter, Sir Adam Fortesque, Sir Thomas Dingley, and a little boy, the son of Lord Montague, and the grandson of the countess, who had all been arrested with her.

The two gentlemen were beheaded on the 10th of July; the marchioness was imprisoned for six months, and then pardoned; and perhaps the unoffending boy was pardoned also, for no further mention is made of him. Far different was the fate of the venerable countess herself. After having been kept nearly two years a prisoner in the Tower, she was, on the 27th of May, 1541, dragged forcibly to the scaffold. When told to lay her head upon the block, the high-spirited woman, in whose veins ran the proud blood of the Plantagenets, replied—"No! my head never committed treason; if you will have it, you must take it as you can." The executioner tried to force her down upon the block; but she ran round the scaffold, and moved her head from side to side. The guards struck at her with their weapons, and her streaming grey hair was covered with blood. At length this scene of horror ended by her being overpowered, held down by force, and so beheaded. If the brave spirit which actuated this noble old lady and her talented son had been more common in England, Henry would not so long have disgraced its throne by his tyranny and murders.

After having shed the blood of the guiltless countess, merely to satisfy his capricious revenge, Henry resolved to do away with all differences of opinion among the people on subjects of religion—a thing as difficult as the ancient Danish King Canute undertook to do, when he commanded the waves of the sea to stand still, and not presume to wet his feet. Henry was not content with tyrannising over the bodies of his subjects—he longed also to fetter their souls. To do this, he sent a message to the parliament, desiring it to choose a committee to draw up certain articles of faith, which every one should be commanded to believe. The committee was elected; but, after eleven days of discussion, was unable to come to any conclusion.

The king then went to the parliament-house, and took the matter into his own hands; and a bill, called the Bill of the Six Articles, or the Bloody Statute, was passed into law, and was to become effective from the 12th of July, 1539. These articles all favoured the doctrines of the Romish church, and were opposed by Cranmer, the Archbishop of Canterbury, and by Bishops Shaxton and Latimer: the two last resigned their sees on the day before the act came into operation, rather than go against their consciences; but the timid, worldly Cranmer yielded to the passing of a law condemning people to believe what he thought not only detestable, but dangerous to their salvation. These Six Articles were—that the bread and wine in the sacrament of the Lord's Supper were really changed into the body and blood of the Saviour; that the communion in both kinds was not necessary for salvation; that it was sinful for priests to marry; that vows of chastity must never be broken; that private masses should be continued, as being agreeable to God's law; and that confession was expedient and necessary, and must be retained.

Any one denying the first article was to be burnt to death as a heretic, and his property to be forfeited to the king; and even if he recanted he was to be burnt all the same. All persons offending against any of the other articles were to be imprisoned during the king's pleasure, and to forfeit their property for the first offence, and be put to death for the second. These articles Henry supposed would produce a unity of the church. "What unity followed?" asks an old writer; and replies, "The groaning hearts of a great number, and also the cruel death of many, both in the days of King Henry and of Queen Mary, can so well declare, that as I pray God the like may never be felt hereafter."

It seemed as if the parliament did not know how to humble itself sufficiently at the feet of the despotic king. No sooner had the members passed the Six Articles into law—a law which punished with a cruel death all who dared to think for themselves—than they passed an act, declaring that, in future, "all the king's proclamations should have the same power and authority as acts of parliament!" and that any person offending against these proclamations might be punished just as the king pleased! Thus parliaments were made a mere idle mockery: the whole power of the state was placed in the hands of the king, and the lives and property of all his subjects laid at the mercy of his caprice. It also declared, that if any person attempted to leave the country, in order to escape the penalties incurred by disobeying any of the king's proclamations, he was to be put to death as a traitor.

The national slavery was now complete; the disgrace of England was full to overflowing; the ancient spirit of its once bold sons was prostrate beneath the feet of its tyrant; and the genius of liberty trampled into the dust. It is painful to reflect upon the depth of humiliation into which our ancestors of that age were plunged: the good and the heroic were mostly sent to perish on the scaffold or at the stake, while the mean lived on and submitted. It seemed as if the nation would become a crowd of intolerant or hypocritical priests; crouching, slavish nobles; and trembling, astonished people. It was the unhappy fate of most men, that, instead of uniting to hurl the tyrant from his throne (as their ancestors would have done, and as, in after-times, their descendants did), they occupied themselves in quarrelling about the opposing forms of religion. Instead of resisting the gigantic and still growing tyranny which was placing fetters both upon their souls and bodies—which would not even permit them to worship their God according to the dictates of their consciences—which spread uncertainty and terror throughout the land, and made the most innocent persons fear that perhaps they might perish by the hands of the executioner—they were disputing as to whether a wafer or a morsel of bread was the Son of God; whether priests might marry, or whether they could not be saved without confession of their sins to erring men like themselves; as if a repentant outpouring of their hearts to God were not the readiest way of obtaining pardon for their offences against His laws.

The same year in which the parliament passed the Six Articles, and the slavish act about making the tyrant's proclamations equal to laws (the dark year 1539), it also confirmed the surrender of the monasteries. Henry's robberies of the church were thus made lawful; and no one had the courage to question them. The abbey lands also were confirmed to him and to his successors for ever. A few abbeys had yet been left: these Henry now despoiled; and he put three abbots to death for hiding away the plate and ornaments which had adorned the abbeys over which they presided.

Henry had been a widower more than two years, and for some time he had wished for another wife. Indeed, he had made several unsuccessful attempts to get one: he had proposed to the Duchess-Dowager of Milan, who replied sarcastically, that if she had two heads, she might think of the match; but, as she had but one, she would rather decline the honour. Then he thought of marrying the French princess, Mary of Guise; but that lady was already engaged to the King of Scotland. Henry wished the engagement to be broken off; but the French king, Francis, would not consent to such a proposal: still, as he wished to please Henry, he offered him either of the two sisters of that princess. The English king proposed that he and Francis should have a meeting at Calais, on pretence of business, and that the latter should bring with him the two ladies, that he might choose which he liked best. But Francis declined to carry ladies of high rank to market, as if they were sheep or oxen; and the affair came to nothing.

Cromwell, who had been made a noble, saw that Henry was still leaning to the doctrines of the church of Rome, rather than to those of the reformed religion; and, observing the king's desire to marry again, he was very anxious to get him a Protestant wife. For this reason he proposed to Henry to marry Anne of Cleves, the sister of the Duke of Cleves, one of the princes of the Protestant confederacy. The lady, he said, was amiable and beautiful; and a fine large woman—a great point with the king, who had grown so stout, that he thought none but a fat beauty suitable for him.

Anne of Cleves had no objection to become Queen of England; and Henry sent his painter, Hans Holbein, to take her likeness. Holbein painted a flattering portrait of the Flemish princess; and when Henry saw it, he was very pleased. He thought Anne would exactly suit him: the match was arranged to take place, and the lady invited over to England. She landed at Deal on the 27th of December, 1539. As soon as she arrived, the king, all impatience, rode privately to Rochester (as Anne passed through that town on her way to London), and obtained a secret view of his bride. She was certainly a tall, large woman, but coarse-featured and unattractive. Henry was not only disappointed, but at once conceived a feeling of dislike for her. He could not, at first, prevail upon himself to meet her; and when he did, he treated her with geat coolness. Returning in a very melancholy humour to Greenwich, he commanded Cromwell to invent some way of breaking a match with a woman whom he rudely called "a great Flanders mare." Cromwell, and the rest of Henry's council, represented to him that there were strong political reasons why the marriage should not be broken off. It was feared that the great Catholic countries might yet unite against him, to revenge the injuries he had inflicted upon their religion; and that, if he also irritated the princes of the Protestant confederacy, the consequences might be extremely dangerous. This reflection had great weight with Henry; and, after inquiring, "Is there, then, no remedy? must I needs, against my will, put my neck into this noose?" he consented that the marriage should take place.

On the 5th of January, 1540, Anne and Henry were wedded: but he disliked her more after that event than he had done before, and he complained bitterly of his hard fate to his courtiers. Sir Antony Denny tried to comfort him by saying, that his was a misfortune common to him and all kings, who could not, like private persons, choose for themselves, but were obliged to take their wives upon the judgment and fancy of others. This was but cold comfort; and Henry declared that his life would be a burden to him if he were compelled to pass it in the society of such a wife. The Catholics rejoiced at the event, and supposed that Cromwell would be deprived of his offices, in consequence of his having brought about a marriage so disagreeable to the king; but Henry concealed his dislike, and even bestowed on his active minister the Order of the Garter, and created him Earl of Essex and Lord Chamberlain.

Henry had not been long married when he saw the beautiful little Catharine Howard, who, like poor Anne Boleyn, was a niece of the Duke of Norfolk. That nobleman was an extreme Catholic, or papist; for that is a more correct name, and now began to be used. Norfolk's niece was of the same principles, and he made use of her attractions to ruin Cromwell in the favour of the king. That minister was generally disliked: the Catholics hated him for the part he had taken in the ruin of the abbeys and monasteries; for his cruelties towards the poor monks; and for the bitter spirit he had shown to their religion. The Protestants disliked him because he had consented to their persecution, and had not stood between them and the anger of the king. The nobility hated him, because, although he was of mean birth, he had been raised to a level with the proudest of them. Henry was captivated by the charms of Catharine Howard, and he frequently met her at Bishop Gardiner's house, where a cabal was forming for the destruction of the Protestant minister.

Cromwell was in the full height of his power, and vigorously persecuting the Catholics, when he was suddenly arrested, and imprisoned in the Tower, on a charge of treason and heresy. The accusations against him bear the appearance of having been got up by his enemies. They alleged that he had received bribes; had encroached on the royal authority; had protected preachers of heresy, and assisted in the circulation of heretical books; and that, during a private conversation about the new opinions in religion, he had unsheathed his dagger, and affirmed that he would maintain the cause of the Reformation even against the king himself. These charges may have been true, although the last seems scarcely probable; but they would never have been brought against him if he had not had the misfortune to contract the king's marriage with Anne of Cleves. Cromwell was ensnared in the pit which he had dug for others; for he was condemned without a trial, by that very attainder of parliament he had devised for procuring the execution of the innocent Countess of Salisbury. The oppression which he had so cruelly dealt out to others, he himself shrank from with terror. From the Tower he wrote the most humble supplications to the king to spare him; but he wrote in vain. He was beheaded at Tower Hill, on the 28th of July, 1540.

Cromwell was a man of great abilities, and did much to forward the cause of the Reformation; but he was destitute of noble and generous principles, and a slavish tool in the hands of the imperious king. His principal object—that of purifying the church from superstition and idolatry—was a noble one; but he promoted it by dishonest and cruel means: and his character was disgraced by a merciless intolerance towards those who differed from him. Still he was not without virtues: his charity was great; and 200 people were fed every day at his expense.

Though Henry had married the Lady Anne of Cleves, he would not live with her. A few months after the wedding, he ordered her to remove to Richmond; and then said, that as she had been previously contracted to the Duke of Lorraine, her marriage with him was not legal. He gave also another absurd reason—namely, that the ceremony had taken place without the inward consent of his own mind. Frivolous as these objections were, a convocation of the clergy decided that they were sufficient causes for annulling the marriage; and it was annulled by the parliament on the 9th of July. The lady was of an easy temper, and offered no opposition. She might have been terrified into compliance; but she seems to have possessed a happy indifference. She wrote a submissive letter to the king, consenting to the divorce, and begging him to receive her as a sister; and she amused herself at Richmond with dressing, every day, in new clothes, made in odd fashions. Pleased with her docility, Henry gave her a settlement of £3,000 a year; and this simple, but insulted lady remained in England, and seems to have lived tolerably happy. At Henry's desire she had written a letter to her brother, the Duke of Cleves, saying that she was very well treated, and desiring him to live on good terms with the English king.

Having thus got rid of his fourth wife, Henry, almost immediately afterwards, was married privately to Catharine Howard; who, on the 8th of August, was introduced at court as his acknowledged queen. The Catholic party were in high spirits in consequence of this event, and thought that they would be able to revive the ancient form of religion. The Duke of Norfolk and Bishop Gardiner directed the council of the king; a fierce persecution commenced against the reformers; and the law of the Six Articles, which the people called the whip with six strings, was put in force with great rigour.

The first that suffered was that same Dr. Barnes who had been the cause of Lambert's death by accusing him of heresy before Archbishop Cranmer. Barnes had offended Gardiner; and that bitter, unforgiving man got him condemned, without the form of a trial, as a heretic. Two other reformers, named Gerrard and Jerome, were burnt along with him. That Henry might not be thought to favour the old religion too much, he caused three Catholics to be dragged to Smithfield on the same hurdles, and there to be hanged and quartered for denying his supremacy. A foreigner, who was at that time in London, inquired how people contrived to live in a country where Catholics were hanged and Protestants were burnt. Henry's cruelty increased as he got older; and a month after those executions, he caused the prior of Doncaster, and six other persons, to be hanged for defending a monastic life.

Early in the next year (1541), another attempt at insurrection was made in the north of England; but it was soon put down, and the leaders of it executed. Henry then made a royal progress to York, partly to reconcile the people in that district to his authority, and partly for the purpose of having an interview with the King of Scotland, whom he wished to bind more closely to the interests of England. The meeting, however, did not take place; for the clergy of Scotland persuaded their king to break the appointment. They feared that Henry would induce James to follow his example of robbing the monasteries, and persecuting their ancient religion.

Henry was very fond of his new queen; for her beauty and fascination had entirely captivated him. Indeed, so happy was he with his fifth wife, that he publicly returned thanks to God for his felicity; and desired the Bishop of Lincoln to compose a form of prayer for that purpose. This happiness was of very short duration: the queen was a woman of profligate habits, and had been guilty of an improper familiarity with a servant of the Duchess of Norfolk, in whose family she had been educated. Within a year after her marriage, her conduct was revealed to Archbishop Cranmer by a person named Lascelles. Cranmer was astonished: he scarcely knew what to do; but having taken the advice of the chancellor, he resolved to communicate to the king the guiltiness of his beautiful wife. At first, Henry disbelieved this strange accusation; but having caused Lascelles, and other persons acquainted with the queen's transgressions, to be arrested and examined, he became convinced of its truth. It seems that he had really felt more affection for that guilty woman than could have been expected from his antecedents. After reading the examinations, he remained silent for some time, and then burst into tears; though his after-conduct showed that there was much selfishness in his sorrow.

When the queen was taxed with her guilt, she at first denied it; but on being told that her lover, Francis Derham, had confessed his participation in it, she admitted that she had been criminal before her marriage; but affirmed she had been faithful to the king since that ceremony. That might have been true; but as she had lately taken Derham into her service, and as a gentleman of the privy chamber, named Culpepper, had remained one night for some hours alone with her and Lady Rochford, a woman of infamous character, Henry gave no credit to her statement.

The king's affection was soon turned into anger; and once angry, he never forgave. Derham and Culpepper were, on the 31st of November, 1541, tried for treason at Guildhall; found guilty on very defective evidence, and executed at Tyburn on the 10th of December. Catharine's grandmother, the old Duchess of Norfolk; her uncle, Lord William Howard, and his lady; together with the Countess of Bridgewater, and nine other persons, were also attainted of misprision of treason, because they knew the queen's wickedness before her marriage, and had concealed it. Even the tyrannical Henry, however, seems to have been aware of the cruelty of punishing the near relatives of Catharine, merely because they did not reveal her shame and blast her character; and he afterwards pardoned most of them—not, however, before they had suffered severe imprisonment.

A confession had been extorted from the wretched queen, on a promise that the king would spare her life; but it appears that he never had any such intention. In January, 1542, the parliament passed a bill of attainder against her and Lady Rochford, charged with having encouraged the queen in her dissolute conduct. On the 13th of February both were beheaded within the Tower walls. They died with patience and in penitence; and Catharine, with her last breath, protested, by her hope of salvation, that she had never been guilty since she had been queen. Though undoubtedly erring before her marriage, this unhappy woman was treated not only with severity, but with injustice. Her crime did not amount to treason: she had no trial; but was condemned, without a hearing, by a slavish parliament; and the principal witness against her was a female servant, who, there is some reason to believe, had been discharged from her service.

The year before Catharine's execution, Henry had raised Ireland to the rank of a kingdom, to the entire satisfaction of the native Irish, many of whose chiefs he created peers. The English kings had hitherto been called only Lords of Ireland.

CHAPTER LIII.

CONCLUSION OF THE REIGN OF HENRY THE EIGHTH.—A.D. 1542—1547.

ENRY tried to forget the mortification his queen's misconduct had caused him, by again turning his attention to the religious disputes which harassed both his clergy and people. Every liberty or benefit to which a nation has not been accustomed is sure to be abused at first. The immediate consequence of the Bible being generally read was, that an immense number of strange sects and opinions in religion had sprung up. There were Anabaptists, Antinomians, Fifth-Monarchy-men, Davidians, or Members of the Family of Love; Predestinarians, Arians, Unitarians, Libertines, and many others. The disorders thus produced, and the licentiousness which prevailed in religious matters, were very great; and it was some time before the establishment of the Anglican church in any degree checked the evils.

After the lapse of 300 years we can talk sensibly enough about the effects of the Reformation; but King Henry and his councillors did not understand them then. They regarded the spread of many sects and opinions as pernicious heresies, dangerous to the cause of religion; and the king set to work, as he had done before, to make all his subjects think alike on this sublime theme—a result which appears to be unattainable, though it is so much to be desired; for that the difference of opinion amongst Christians upon important points of doctrine greatly strengthens the cause of infidelity, cannot be doubted. With a view to produce unanimity, the king, soon after the publication of the English edition of the Bible, had ordered the bishops to write a book, in which they were to inculcate all his ideas on the subject of religion. This work appeared, and was called The Institution of a Christian Man; or, the Bishop's Book. It leant towards the principles of the Reformation; and the whole nation was to receive it as an infallible standard of faith. But, in 1543, he ordered another book to be written, called The Erudition of a Christian Man. The new volume favoured the doctrines of the Romish church; but, without observing his own inconsistency, or perhaps without caring about it, he commanded this also to be received as an unerring rule of faith. Thus people knew not what to believe; and the parliament had even gone so far in its miserable degradation, as to pass a law that all the tenets agreed to by a commission of bishops, chosen by the king, should be received as binding on the nation.

In 1541, a dispute had arisen between Henry and James V., King of Scotland; and the former had the absurdity to revive the claim of the English monarchs to the sovereignty of that country. After several border skirmishes, Sir James Bowes, with a small army, entered Teviotdale; but he was stopped at Haddenrig by the Earl of Huntley and Lord Home. There a battle took place, and the Scots were the victors. King Henry was very much mortified at this disgrace; and having raised an army of 40,000 men, he sent it to invade Scotland, under the command of the Duke of Norfolk. That nobleman, in 1542, crossed the borders, burnt twenty villages on the banks of the Tweed, and continued to desolate the country, till King James collected an army of 30,000 men, and marched to meet the English invaders. Awed by his approach, Norfolk and his army retreated back to their own country. James immediately gave an order for pursuing them; and thus carrying the war into English ground. But winter was approaching; the Scottish nobles were disaffected towards their king, and they refused to follow him.

James was compelled, for the time, to give up the war, and return to his capital; but a month afterwards, he sent forward an army of 10,000 men, who crossed the English borders at Solway Moss; while he himself prepared to follow. Suspecting the fidelity of Lord Maxwell, to whom he had entrusted the command of this army, he sent his favourite, Oliver Sinclair, to take the place of that nobleman. He arrived at the camp on the 25th of November; and having mounted a platform, raised on the shoulders of the soldiers, he read his commission to the army. No sooner had he concluded than a violent contention took place: the haughty Scottish chiefs declared that they would not serve under any such leader; and the troops broke out into mutiny and confusion. While this was going on, it so happened that a body of not more than 300 English horsemen, who had been sent forward to reconnoitre, approached on a neighbouring height, and saw with astonishment the riot and disorder of the Scottish camp. Having resolved to take advantage of it, they rushed suddenly on the Scots, who, taking them to be the van of Norfolk's army, were seized with a sudden panic, and fled without striking a blow. Numbers were killed, and many others, including several nobles, taken prisoners. When King James heard of this disgraceful defeat, he was a broken-hearted man. He shut himself up in his palace at Falkland, and passed hours without speaking a word. He had been a strong, healthy man; but he pined away, and died soon after the battle, of a slow fever, brought on by extreme grief.

When Henry heard of the death of his nephew, James, he thought of uniting Scotland to England by marrying the little fatherless Princess Mary to his son, Prince Edward, afterwards Edward VI. This was an excellent plan, and might have succeeded; but the greedy and absolute English monarch wanted to get instant possession of Scotland; and, by so doing, he overreached himself, as people who grasp at too much frequently do. To further his purpose, he released the Scottish nobles who had been taken prisoners at the rout at Solway Moss, on condition of their seconding his views with respect to the marriage; and he also bought the assent of other nobles of that country. These gentlemen, however, disagreed amongst themselves. After the death of James, Cardinal Beaton produced a will, by which he was declared regent during the minority of the infant princess. This will was pronounced a forgery; and the Earl of Arran caused the cardinal to be arrested, and then assumed the regency himself. Beaton and the people of Scotland generally, who were mostly Catholics, were opposed to any alliance with the heretical King Henry; but the new regent, who was inclined to the principles of the Reformation, favoured the views of the English monarch.

The Earl of Arran assembled the Scottish parliament, which proposed to enter into a treaty with England. By this agreement the estates of the northern kingdom consented to the marriage, but would not allow the little princess to be sent into England until she was ten years of age; and they made some jealous regulations for preserving the independence of their country. Before it was finally concluded, the cardinal obtained his liberty, and opposed the measure so skilfully, that the proposed treaty ended in a new quarrel between Scotland and England, in which the Scots were assisted by their old allies, the French.

For this and some other reasons, Henry resolved to make war on France; and for that purpose he sought a reconciliation with his old enemy, Charles, the Emperor of Germany. That monarch consented to forgive and forget the insults which had been offered to his aunt Catharine, Henry's first wife; and Henry, by an act of parliament, restored her daughter Mary, and Anne Boleyn's daughter, Elizabeth, to their right to succeed him on the throne. An alliance was then formed between Charles and Henry against France. It was agreed that each of them should invade that country with an army of 25,000 men. These forces were to march from different points, and meet at Paris, where the two monarchs arranged to dispose of the French monarchy between them. Though he had promised to head his army, Henry broke his word on that occasion, as he had so frequently done before. He sent only a small force to assist the emperor, and staid at home to marry his sixth wife. This lady, whom he wedded on the 12th of July, 1543, was Catharine Parr, the widow of Neville, Lord Latimer. She was a matronly and prudent woman, exceedingly well educated, and greatly inclined to the reformed religion. The reformers hoped that this marriage would induce the king to regard their principles more favourably; but it was impossible to reckon on the whims of this capricious tyrant; and, a fortnight after his wedding, he caused three Protestants to be burnt to death at Smithfield, as heretics.

The next year (1544) Henry roused himself from his loving fit, and resolved once more to take part in a military campaign. Always in extremes, though he had but little money and few soldiers, he resolved upon conquering both France and Scotland at once. By great efforts he contrived to raise an army of 30,000 men. With these he sailed over to Calais; and, marching to Boulogne, laid siege to that city. He also sent an English fleet, and an army of 10,000 men, into Scotland, under the command of Viscount Lisle and the Earl of Hereford. After a two months' siege, Boulogne surrendered, on condition that its garrison should be permitted to march out with bag and baggage. Henry then rode into the town to the sound of trumpets, and thought himself as great a conqueror as Alexander or Julius Cæsar. He was soon, however, to discover his mistake. His ally, the Emperor Charles, made peace with the French king, and left Henry to conduct the war by himself. This the latter did not relish; so, after having gone to an immense expense, and done nothing more than take Boulogne, he returned into England with more disgrace than honour.

The army that had been sent to Scotland took and plundered Leith, attacked Edinburgh, and set that town on fire; but was compelled to retreat by the well-directed artillery of the castle. The instructions to the English were, to destroy as much as possible, to burn every town and village in their way, and to spare neither man, woman, nor child. In consequence of these barbarous orders, they burnt all the towns and villages round Edinburgh, and laid the country desolate; but they were at length stopped by a Scottish army, under Cardinal Beaton. Then these men—who must be deemed marauders, not soldiers—retreated to their ships, and sailed away, after having destroyed every Scotch vessel they could lay their hands upon.

The next year (1545), Sir Ralph Evre ravaged the Scottish borders with merciless fury: Scotland was rent by factions at home, and many of its chieftains were secretly in the pay of Henry. The unhappy people, therefore, had no trust in their leaders, and fell ready victims to the English, whose ferocious excesses roused the national spirit of the Earl of Angus, and made him, for a time, true to his country. Collecting all his vassals, he joined the regent, Arran, and opposed the invaders at Ancram Moor. A brief but fierce battle took place on the 17th of February, which ended in the defeat of the English, and the death of their leader.

The French king was anxious to get back the city of Boulogne, which Henry had so lately taken, and he collected a great fleet for that purpose. Besides laying siege to Boulogne, he attacked the Isle of Wight, and attempted to take and destroy Portsmouth. Henry was alarmed: the banks of the Thames were fortified, together with the coasts of Kent, Sussex, and Hampshire; and a fleet of sixty English ships of war was collected at Portsmouth. The French fleet, consisting of 136 vessels, sailed triumphantly about the Channel, insulting the English, and burning villages and farm-houses along the coast. King Henry himself went to Portsmouth; and the French admiral, sailing up to the harbour, challenged the English to come out and fight him. At Henry's command they did not accept this challenge; but a distant cannonading took place between the fleets, which ended in the sinking of a large English vessel, called the Mary Rose. The French, however, would not attack the English while under the shelter of the land-batteries of Portsmouth, but returned to Brest; and all this expense and preparation on both sides ended in nothing.

All that Henry did by his wars was to get into difficulties; and, therefore, he summoned a parliament to grant him more money. After voting him a certain sum, this slavish body of men actually bestowed upon the king all the revenues of the universities, chauntries, free chapels, and hospitals. Henry smiled graciously at their contemptible humiliation, but told them that he had no intention to rob learning of all her endowments; and he informed the universities that he did not mean to touch their revenues.

The king's strength was now failing him: he got more unwieldy and incapable of exertion, and he desired repose. In this condition he was glad to make peace with France. An arrangement was, therefore, entered into between him and Francis, called the treaty of Campes, by which Henry agreed to give up Boulogne, and Francis promised in return to pay him a large sum of money. The French king, who had also entered into an alliance with the Scots, insisted that they should be included in the treaty. Henry's wars, therefore, left matters exactly as they were when hostilities commenced.

As the king's health declined, he became (1546) subject to violent gusts of passion, which made it dangerous to offend him ever so slightly, even by accident. He suffered great pain from his infirmity, and became very gloomy and morose. His only amusements were gluttonous eating and drinking, and talking upon disputed doctrines in religion. His queen frequently discoursed with him, and ventured, in the warmth of conversation, to speak her mind freely, and dispute some of his opinions. Henry was greatly offended. "A good hearing this," said he, "when women become such clerks; and a thing much to my comfort, to come in mine old age to be taught by my wife." The crafty Bishop Gardiner did his best further to incense the king; and Wriothesley, the chancellor, received orders to prepare articles of impeachment against the queen.

Catharine Parr found out what was going on, and she shaped her conduct accordingly. The next evening the king entered on his usual subject of conversation, and seemed to invite her to argue with him on divinity. In a submissive manner she declined, saying that such profound topics were not suited to the natural weakness of her sex. "Not so! By St. Mary," replied the king, "you are now become a doctor, Kate; and better fitted to give than to receive instruction." With assumed humility, the queen answered, that she knew how little she was entitled to these praises: that though she usually entered on any conversation, when proposed by his majesty, it was only to give him a little momentary amusement; that she found the conversation apt to languish when not revived by some opposition; and she had ventured sometimes to feign a contradiction of sentiment only to give him the pleasure of correcting her. She also purposed, by this innocent artifice, to engage him to talk upon subjects from which she reaped both profit and instruction. Henry was soothed and convinced. "Ah!" he exclaimed, "is it so, sweetheart? Then we are friends again; and it doth me more good to hear these words of thine own mouth, than it would have done had I heard that £100,000 had fallen unto me." The next day, when Catharine and Henry were talking together in the garden, Wriothesley, the chancellor, approached with a guard of forty men to take the queen into custody. Bursting into anger against the officious chancellor, the king called him a knave, a fool, and a beast, and dismissed him from his presence.

Although Catharine thus escaped the wrath of the king for her secret attachment to the reformed doctrines of religion, there was another lady, younger and more heroic, that was not so fortunate. This was Anne Askew, the daughter of a country gentleman, who was arrested and brought before Bishop Bonner on a charge of heresy. The bishop intimidated her into a sort of recantation; but, after being released from prison, she felt she had acted timidly, and continued to teach the reformed religion to her friends. Being again arrested, she was sent to the Tower, and examined by Wriothesley, the chancellor, and Rich, one of the council, as to whether any of the ladies of the court held her opinions; but she bravely refused to criminate any one. Then they ordered her to be put on the rack to make her confess, and kept her stretched upon that dreadful instrument for a length of time. But the suffering and heroic girl would not even cry out on account of the anguish she felt, much less speak any word that should involve others in her sad fate. The lieutenant of the Tower went to release her from the engine of torture, but the chancellor and his companions interfered, and commanded him to rack the unhappy girl again. Used as he was to sights of misery, the lieutenant was touched, and refused to obey. On this, the chancellor and his companion applied their own hands to the instrument, and wrenched it so severely that the poor girl's limbs were all dislocated, and she was obliged to be carried away on a chair in a state of insensibility. As her cruel tormentors could not make her conform to their opinions, they condemned her to perish at the stake. Still her noble constancy remained unshaken; and as she was yet unable to stand, on account of the frightful manner in which she had been stretched upon the rack, she was carried to Smithfield in a chair, and with three other victims burnt to ashes.

The last act of the tyrant's reign was the arrest of the old Duke of Norfolk and his accomplished son, the Earl of Surrey. To gratify a jealous whim, the king caused them to be tried as traitors; and although their only crime was that of having offended him, the slavish nobles condemned them to death. The Earl of Surrey was beheaded on the 19th of January, 1547, and the day also fixed for the execution of the father. But before that morning dawned, a great blessing had descended upon the country. In the course of the night the tyrant breathed his last; and this long reign of horror was at an end!

When informed that his last hour was at hand, the king regretted the news, but expressed himself resigned to what was inevitable. Looking back on his past life, he greatly condemned it; but he declared the mercy of Christ was able to pardon him all his sins, even had they been greater than they were. In this faith he died, on the 28th of January, 1547, in the 56th year of his age, and after a reign of thirty-seven years and nine months.

There is no English sovereign whose character it is so difficult to describe as that of Henry VIII. By some it is depicted in colours so repulsive that it seems scarcely human; but they appear to have brought all his vices, his bad qualities, and his unjust and wicked acts prominently forward, and to have completely ignored what few virtues he possessed. Good and evil were, however, mixed up in Henry as they are in most persons, though there can be no doubt that the latter greatly predominated. Much of the difficulty of rightly appreciating the merits or demerits of this sovereign, arises from the position in which he was placed by his breach with Rome. By the Protestant writers he is praised for many things, and his amiable propensities are put prominently forward: whilst the Roman Catholics vilify him without scruple. He certainly was violent, cruel, rapacious, tyrannical, and unjust; and also insincere. In religious matters, no doubt, he was frequently dishonest: he quarrelled with the Pope, not because he dissented from the doctrines of the Romish church, but because the exercise of the Pope's authority interfered with his own; and he could not induce the pontiffs to sanction acts which they deemed irreligious and unjust. But, as a modern historian (Charles Duke Yonge) observes, "the great, the ineffaceable stain upon his memory is the ruthless manner in which he shed blood, and the blood which should have been dearest to him, for the gratification of his most trifling caprices. No tyrant in modern history has approached him in this respect." On the other hand, as the author of The Student's Hume affirms, he was, at times, "open, gallant, liberal, and capable at least of temporary friendship and attachment." He had, also, "great vigour of mind, which qualified him for exercising dominion over men;" and "he had great political ability, though he can hardly be called a successful statesman." His exterior qualities were attractive. "In his manners," remarks Mr. Yonge, "especially in the early part of his reign, he was courteous, generous, and affable; and so engaging are these qualities, and even the recollection of them, that to the end of his life he was popular with the generality of the nation." With posterity, who are strangers to his urbanity, courtesy, and good-nature, it is different; no English king is, in the opinion of moderns, so unpopular as Henry VIII. They mostly agree with Sir Walter Raleigh, that, "if all the patterns of a merciless tyrant had been lost to the world, they might have been found in this prince." Before closing these few remarks upon the subject of Henry's character, it is right to add, that he possessed a talent for literature and the arts, both of which he encouraged and patronised. In 1540, he established Trinity College, Cambridge, which he amply endowed; and he also finished what Wolsey left incomplete with respect to Christ Church, Oxford.

CHAPTER LIV.

THE REIGN OF EDWARD THE SIXTH.—A.D. 1547—1549.

DWARD VI. was little more than nine years old at the death of his father. No son could be more unlike a parent than he was to the late king; indeed, he was so gentle and amiable, so fond of his studies, and so forward in them, that he has been described as a perfect prodigy of learning for his age. Great care had been taken with his education; and, before he was eight years old, he is said to have written letters in Latin to his father. He was also very religious, and greatly attached to the reformed doctrines; for Archbishop Cranmer had taken care to appoint him tutors of sound Protestant principles. His love and reverence for the Bible were remarkable; and, at one time, he was extremely offended because a person about him, in order to reach something hastily, laid a Bible on the floor to stand upon.

The late king had, in his will, named sixteen persons as his executors, to whom he entrusted the care both of his son and the kingdom, until the former should have reached the age of eighteen. Amongst these executors were Archbishop Cranmer, Wriothesley (the chancellor), and Edward's uncle, Edward Seymour, Earl of Hertford. The latter was a man of great ambition and considerable talents; and he got one of the sixteen executors to propose that he should be chosen protector of the realm and of the king's person, though without the power to do anything except with the sanction of the council. This proposal was opposed by the chancellor, who hoped to get the chief power of the state into his own hands. Hertford, also, was looked upon as the head of the Protestant party, and Wriothesley as that of the Catholic one; so there was a natural enmity between them. But the courtiers knew very well that the young king had been educated to love the reformed doctrines; Protestant opinions, therefore, suddenly became very fashionable: Wriothesley stood alone in his opposition, and the Earl of Hertford was made protector, until the young king should come of age.

The protector and the executors then proceeded to reward themselves for the trouble they had taken in the affairs of the kingdom. The late king, in his will, required them to make good all his promises; but what these promises were it seems the executors did not know. In this difficulty, they called Sir William Paget, Sir Antony Denny, and Sir William Herbert, gentlemen with whom Henry had been accustomed to converse with familiarity, and questioned them upon the subject. These parties said, that the promises the late king had mentioned, referred to some pensions and titles which, in his last illness, he desired should be given to such as he named to them. Accordingly, the Earl of Hertford was made Duke of Somerset; his brother, Sir Thomas Seymour, was made Baron Seymour and Lord-Admiral; Wriothesley, the chancellor, became Lord Southampton; and many other titles and pensions were bestowed without any apparent reason for the gift. The people were discontented with these proceedings: they said the courtiers had drained the dead king of his treasures, and that the first step in their new trust was to provide honours and estates for themselves. Some even declared that the whole story was a forgery, and that Henry had never left any such directions at all.

The body of the deceased king, which had been lying in state at Whitehall, was buried at Windsor, on the 16th of February, 1547. It was deposited near that of Jane Seymour; the funeral service being read, and the sermon preached, by Gardiner, Bishop of Winchester. The funeral of the late king was succeeded by the coronation of the new one, which took place four days afterwards. On this occasion the ceremony was shortened, that it might not fatigue the young monarch; and some alterations were made in it, to suit the great changes which had taken place in the religion of the country. After the coronation, all state prisoners were released except a few. The old Duke of Norfolk, who had committed no crime at all, was one of the exceptions, and he remained in prison until Queen Mary ascended the throne.

Wriothesley, the chancellor, now Lord Southampton, determined to ruin the protector if he could; but his zeal led to his own fall. Having committed some irregularity in his office, the council decided that the great seal should be taken from him, and that he should be for a time committed to prison. The Duke of Somerset had then no one to oppose him, and he first turned his attention to the affairs of Scotland.

A peace had been concluded between England and that country during the latter part of Henry's reign; but it had never been strictly observed. The protector, Somerset, was resolved, by fair means or foul, to carry out Henry's wish of uniting the two kingdoms by marrying the infant Princess of Scotland to the young King of England. For this purpose he collected an army and a fleet for the invasion of Scotland; but before he proceeded to hostilities, he sent a manifesto to the nobles of that country. In it he said that nature seemed originally to have intended this island for one empire; and having cut it off from all communication with foreign states, and guarded it by the ocean, she had pointed out to the inhabitants the road to happiness and security. That the people of both countries had the same language, laws, and manners; that everything invited them to an union; and that an incident had occurred which would enable such an union to be effected, without any jealousy or dishonour on either side. The crown of Scotland having fallen to a princess, and that of England to a prince, who were of a very suitable age for each other, their marriage would end all ill-feeling between the two nations, and unite them in a state of happy tranquillity unknown to their ancestors.

These arguments had no effect upon the Scots, who were resolved to marry the young Princess Mary to a French prince, and who regarded the English as a nation of heretics, and their natural enemies. Somerset, therefore, on the 2nd of September, crossed the borders with an army of 20,000 men, which he had previously collected at Newcastle; and placed a fleet, consisting of sixty-five vessels, under the command of Lord Clinton.

The Scots had summoned an immense army, double in number to that of the English, and taken up their ground on the banks of the Esk, about four miles from Edinburgh. On the 8th of September, the English had advanced to Preston-pans, and encamped between that place and Edinburgh, the distance between the two armies being little more than two miles.—On the 9th, a skirmish took place between the Scottish and English cavalry, which was very fatal to the former; for while 1,300 of them were killed, the loss of the English is said to have amounted to no more than four! After this engagement, Somerset and 300 horsemen rode out to reconnoitre the position of the enemy, which was a remarkably strong one, as it was protected by the ridge of Falside, which ran between the two armies. The Scottish army consisted of four long rows of troops, not unlike, says an eye-witness who wrote an account of the battle, "to four great ridges of ripe barley." On returning to his own camp, Somerset was overtaken by a Scottish herald and a trumpeter. The herald said that he came from the governor of Scotland, who, wishing to avoid the shedding of Christian blood (which must result if a battle took place), was willing to allow the English to return home, if they would retreat without doing any further injury. Then the trumpeter stepping forward, said that his master, the Earl of Huntley, had directed him to say that he was ready to encounter the Duke of Somerset, twenty to twenty, or ten to ten, or, if he preferred it, in single combat.

Somerset rejected both offers. To the herald, he said, he had not come so far to march back without doing anything, and that his object was to obtain a lasting peace for both countries. He added, that his quarrel was just, and God would prosper it; and since so many conditions had been offered in vain, it must now be decided by an appeal to arms. Then, turning to the trumpeter, he said, haughtily—"Tell thy master that he seems to be somewhat wanting in discretion (seeing that he is himself so much inferior in dignity), to send his challenge to one who has the whole government of a kingdom placed in his hands; though, if I had been my own master, and not the bearer of so important a charge, I would not have refused a personal encounter. Meanwhile, there are many in my army who are equal in nobility and rank to Huntley; whom, if he thinks fit to challenge, he will find, perhaps, readier to fight than he wishes."

Somerset, not approving of his position, on the 10th of September led his army towards the sea, his fleet being at anchor near Leith. The Scots, supposing that he wished to escape them, left their strong position, crossed the river Esk, and approached rapidly to encounter him. As they advanced they were fired upon by the English ships; many Scots were killed, and the Highland archers thrown into confusion. Lord Grey, on seeing this, thought, by attacking the Scottish infantry with his heavy-armed horse, that he should decide the day, and gain the honour of the victory. In this he was fatally mistaken: the Scottish infantry presented an impenetrable bank of bristling spears; about 200 of the English were thrown from their horses, and despatched with the daggers which the Scots carried in their girdles; Lord Grey himself was wounded in the mouth, and his standard nearly taken. The rest of the English were glad to save themselves by galloping back again. At that moment the whole army was in extreme danger; and had not great efforts been made to restore it to order, a defeat would have followed.

The coolness of the English saved them. A body of Spanish carabineers advanced, and fired their pieces in the faces of the Scots: the English harquebussiers followed their example. The ships, also, galled the Scots with their broadsides; and the English archers shot amongst them so thickly, that the arrows fell like hailstones. Such steady, combined, and murderous attacks threw the Scots into confusion; which was increased by the want of discipline among the Highlanders, who, being unused to obey, had broken from their ranks, robbed the dead, and then, believing the day to be lost, fled to secure their plunder. In a very short time the panic became general; the Scottish army dispersed and fled, pursued hotly by the English cavalry, eager to avenge the disgrace they had experienced in the early part of the day. The flight lasted from one o'clock P.M. until six in the evening; and for five miles the ground was thickly strewed with mangled bodies, and the river Esk looked as if it had been turned into blood. Some tried to save themselves from death by standing up to their necks among the rushes in the water; but many of them were discovered, dragged out, and butchered. The number of those slain in the Scottish army has been differently estimated—some saying 10,000, others, 13,000; very few were spared and taken prisoners; altogether, not more than 1,500. The Scotch artillery, baggage, camp, and many standards of colours, were also taken by the victors. The loss of the English was comparatively trifling; for the fearful massacre took place not so much in the fight as in the pursuit.

Thus ended the famous battle of Pinkie—the greatest defeat that Scotland had suffered since the fatal conflict at Flodden Field. It was fought on Saturday, the 10th of September, 1547—a day that was long afterwards remembered by the Scots as the Black Saturday.

After the battle, the English occupied Leith, which was burned; and, in other quarters, several castles were captured, and the country ravaged in the most cruel manner. These barbarities were put a stop to by the information Somerset received, that his younger brother was conspiring to overthrow his authority. On the 18th of September, therefore, he ordered his army to commence its march back to England. Thus his great success in Scotland was not followed up; and the only result of this shocking sacrifice of human life, was to incense the Scots still further against the English, and to destroy all hopes of the marriage between the young King of England and the Scottish Princess Mary—to bring about which, the campaign had been entered upon. Even those of the Scots who were inclined to think an alliance with England would be an advantage, objected to having that alliance forced upon them. The Earl of Huntley said it was not that he disliked the match, but that he hated the manner of wooing. To protect themselves against the further attempts of the English, the Scots very naturally entered into a closer friendship with France, and sent the young Princess Mary for safety to the court of the French king, where she was, in August, 1548, betrothed to the dauphin, the son of the then King of France, Henry II.; Francis I. having died on the 31st of March.

On the protector's return to England, he summoned a parliament, which met on the 4th of November, and sat till the 24th of December. It passed the Act for the Repeal of certain Acts concerning Treasons, Felonies, &c.—a piece of legislation which abolished the act giving to the king's proclamation the same power as a law; that of the Six Articles, or the Bloody Statute; and all the harsh enactments on the subject of treason. Unhappily, the cruel, unjust law which condemned heretics to death by fire was still retained. Other useful laws were passed, and also one which was both useful and merciless. It was called "An Act for the Punishment of Vagabonds, and for the Relief of the Poor and Impotent Persons." When the monasteries were put down, feeble old people and beggars were left without any means of support. They had been fed daily by the monks; and, in the latter years of the reign of Henry VIII., they swarmed about the country, starving or thieving, and became a terrible nuisance. The new law declared, that all the helpless and aged poor should have houses provided for them at the expense of the parish in which they were born, or where they had lived for the last three years—a humane provision, accompanied with others that were both cruel and tyrannical. All persons who loitered about the country, and had no honest means of getting a livelihood, were to be branded on the breast with a hot iron as vagabonds, and condemned for two years to be the slaves of the person who informed against them. Their masters were not required to give them any better food than bread and water; and, if they would not work, were allowed to beat or chain them up like dogs. Should any poor wretch run away from this severity, he was to be burnt on the forehead, and condemned to be a slave for the whole of his life. If he ran away a second time, he was to be put to death.

Since the death of Henry, Cranmer, being enabled to act more in accordance with his own views, took some decided steps in the cause of the Reformation. He was supported by the protector Somerset; the young king himself was favourable to the Protestant doctrines; and several of the bishops wished the Reformation to be fairly completed: but Cranmer was a prudent man. He saw the danger of great and sudden changes, and resolved to proceed by degrees, and to explain the reasons for every advance so fully, that he hoped to convince the nation of the justness of it, and to prevent that dangerous opposition which might otherwise be expected.

Acting in unison with the council, the archbishop began by appointing visitors to all the dioceses in England, like those which had been nominated by Cromwell in the last reign. The duty of those visitors was to enforce the Protestant doctrines, and examine any clergyman, or even bishop, upon the points of his belief. To prevent the clergy from preaching the doctrines of the Roman church, a book of homilies, or sermons, was written, and given them to read in their pulpits. From this arose the present practice of the clergy reading their sermons: before that time discourses from the pulpit were generally delivered extemporaneously — that is, they were composed and spoken at the moment, and not delivered from a written paper. In these homilies the people were taught to disregard the superstitions of the church of Rome; to depend, instead, on the sufferings of the Saviour; and to lead their lives according to the rules of the Gospel.

The visitors were also to see that a copy of the Bible was placed in every church; for although Henry had recommended this to be done, the priests, who were attached to the ancient form of religion, had neglected to do it. They resolved that their parishioners should not read the Bible if they could help it; but they could help it no longer, and were obliged to submit. Besides the Bible, a paraphrase of the New Testament, by a famous Dutch scholar, named Erasmus, was placed in the churches, to enable the people to understand the Scriptures. Directions were also given for a stricter observance of the Sunday: it was explained to the people, that it was not sufficient for them to hear mass in the morning, and then spend the rest of the day in drunkenness and revelling, as was commonly practised; but that the whole of the day should be occupied in acts of devotion or charity. Besides this, the visitors were ordered to remove all idolatrous images out of the churches; and a great number of absurd-looking wooden saints were chopped to pieces, and burnt for firewood.

Bonner, the Bishop of London, and Gardiner, Bishop of Winchester, stood out against the visitors. Bonner said that he would obey the injunctions if they were not contrary to the laws of God; and Gardiner declared that he would not have the homilies preached in his diocese; and that, if he must either quit his bishopric or sin against his conscience, he resolved to choose the former. In consequence of this, they were both committed to the Fleet prison, and thus the two greatest enemies of the Reformation were kept out of the way. This was but a mild form of persecution for those days; but still it was imprisonment for opinion's sake; and shows that the Catholics were not the only people who persecuted those who differed from them.

The parliament broke up on the 24th of December, having passed an act for the liberation of state prisoners; under the provisions of which, Bishops Bonner and Gardiner were liberated on the 5th of January, 1548. The latter bishop, however, was an active, troublesome man; and he offered so much opposition to the reformed religion, that many complaints were made against him. He was accordingly summoned before the council, and there offered to explain himself openly in a sermon before the king. He was ordered to do so at St. Paul's Cross, on St. Peter's Day, the 29th of June, 1549. On that occasion, he had the candour to approve of many of the changes that had been made; but when he came to speak of the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, he contended so strongly that the consecrated bread was actually turned into the body of the Saviour, that a great disturbance took place; and the affair ended by his being, on the 30th, again sent to the Tower, where he remained during the rest of Edward's reign.

The prorogation of parliament was till April, 1548, but it did not reassemble for more than twelve months. Cranmer, during that time, induced the council to issue an order forbidding candles to be carried about on Candlemas Day; ashes, on Ash Wednesday; or palms, on Palm Sunday. These, he said, were superstitious customs, contrary to the simplicity and dignity of the Christian religion. The people, especially in the country, very much regretted this change. They loved the cheerful shows, and looked for them as holidays. Many other gay ceremonies were put down, to the grief of great numbers of ignorant people, who understood so little of the real nature of religion, that they thought going to church merely to pray to God, and be instructed in their duties towards Him, was a very dull affair. The elevation of the host, or consecrated wafer, was forbidden. The host had been originally held up to remind the people of Christ's elevation and sufferings on the cross; but it came at last to be raised that it might be worshipped. The council also decreed that the service of the church should be read in English; and Cranmer published an English catechism, for the instruction of the people in the principles of their religion.

A great part of the year 1548 was occupied by petty wars in Scotland, in which the English got by no means the best of it. To relate all these little skirmishes and sieges is very tedious and uninstructive; for they are nearly all alike. The English ravaged the borders of Scotland, and took some castles; while the Scots and French retook, and, in their turn, ravaged the northern counties of England. Thus many people were murdered and ruined; many a village left a smoking heap of rubbish; and no one gained any advantage by it. Wars to resist an invader, or defend a nation's freedom, are defensible and just; but paltry, irritating, meaningless wars, like that then carried on between England and Scotland, are infamous national crimes. Somerset, who had begun the war as a means of enforcing the treaty of marriage between King Edward and Mary, certainly wished for peace, and offered to enter into a ten years' truce; but, as the Scots would not consent to it unless he restored all the places taken from them by the English, the proposal ended in nothing.

The protector, Somerset, had for some time been much annoyed by the conduct of his brother, who had been made Baron Seymour and High-Admiral. The baron was a bold, ambitious, profligate, and reckless man, who wished to supplant his elder brother's power. He was remarkably handsome; and within a very short time after the death of the late king, had married his widow, the Lady Catharine Parr. Somerset and the council were much offended at this match; but the admiral paid no attention to them. He had obtained great wealth and consideration by it, and also a familiar access to the young king, whose affection, and that of those around him, he endeavoured to win by making presents, and other means. His aim seems to have been the ruin of his brother, and the attainment of the chief power of the state for himself. He represented, that formerly, during the minority of a king, the office of governor of his person had always been kept separate from that of protector of the kingdom, and that it ought to be so now. His brother held both those offices, and one of them, at least, Admiral Seymour resolved, if possible, to obtain for himself. Somerset and the council expostulated with him on his conduct: but he treated their expostulations with contempt; and it was not until they threatened to send him to the Tower that he submitted, and promised to give up his turbulent practices. A hollow reconciliation then took place between the two brothers; but it was not destined to last long.

On the 7th of September, 1548, the queen-dowager, Catharine, the wife of Admiral Seymour, died, after giving birth to a daughter. She had married her second husband for ambition, and her third for love; but she had not been happy with either. She complained, on her death-bed, that the admiral had ill-treated her; and no sooner was she laid in her grave than he turned his attention to the Princess Elizabeth, afterwards Queen Elizabeth, who was then a fair, cheerful, high-spirited girl, in her sixteenth year. The princess seems to have been attached to him; and a sort of flirtation had been carried on between them even during the life of Catharine: indeed, so much so, that that lady was occasionally jealous of her daughter-in-law; and it seems not without some reason.

Parliament met on the 2nd of January, 1549. Soon after the two houses assembled, the young king—led to take that step, no doubt, by the persuasions of Seymour—sent a letter to both houses, requesting that the admiral might be appointed his governor. Somerset was enraged at his brother's ambition; and taking advantage of his advances to the king's sister, the protector threatened that if he presumed to follow the Lady Elizabeth, he should be sent to the Tower. The late king had declared, in his will, that if either of his daughters married without the consent of the council, they should be excluded from the succession to the crown. This was much against the admiral's wishes; for, in becoming the husband of the princess, he looked forward to the possibility of some day being the husband of the English sovereign. As he could never expect to obtain the consent of the council, and as he did not abandon his pursuit, it was rumoured that he was endeavouring to accomplish his design in a treasonable manner; that he intended to seize the young king and carry him away to his castle in Denbighshire; that he had brought over many nobles to his purpose; and had surrounded himself with so large a number of followers, that he could raise an army of 10,000 men. Seymour met these rumours against himself by accusing his brother of endeavouring to enslave the nation, and of engaging foreign troops to put down its liberties, and to make himself master of everything. Whilst the dispute between the two brothers was at its height, Sharington, the Master of the Mint in Bristol, was arrested on a charge of clipping the coin of the realm. The admiral, who was in Sharington's debt £3,000—a debt from which he would have been liberated by his creditor's conviction—nevertheless defended him. But the prisoner, to save his own life, impeached Seymour, whom he charged with employing him to coin money, in order that he might raise an army, carry off the king, and change the government. In consequence, Seymour was arrested on the 16th of January, 1549, on a charge of high treason, and sent to the Tower.

The proceedings against the admiral were irregular. Thirty-three articles were drawn up; and he was several times privately examined by deputations from the council, and urged to make a confession of his guilt, and submit to the mercy of the protector and his colleagues. He protested that he had committed no treason; refused to answer questions put for the purpose of criminating him; and demanded a fair and open trial by his peers. On the 23rd of February, the council went in a body to the Tower, but failed in making any impression on the prisoner. The council then proceeded to the king, and requested that a bill of attainder might be presented to parliament. Edward, under the advice of Somerset—who professed that "it was a sorrowful business to him," but "he must prefer his majesty's safety" to any regard for those of his own blood—gave his consent; and the thirty-three articles were made the basis of the measure. Seymour again demanded to be brought face to face with his accusers, but the demand was refused; the Lords examined witnesses in support of the charges, and then passed the bill. The Commons, when it came before them, objected to condemn a man in his absence, and unheard; but after the witnesses who had been examined in the upper house (chiefly members of that house), had given their evidence, the bill was passed—not unanimously, but with a very trivial minority.—On the 5th of March, the royal assent was given; and on the 20th, the ambitious admiral, the uncle of his sovereign, and the favoured lover of the Princess Elizabeth, was led to a scaffold upon Tower Hill, and publicly beheaded. He was attended, in his last moments, by the eccentric preacher and sturdy reformer, Bishop Latimer; and died courageously, protesting to the last that he had never meant any treason against the king or kingdom.

The parliament which condemned Seymour to the scaffold, made another blow at the existence of the Catholic religion in England by permitting the clergy to marry, the same as other people, instead of condemning them to live a single, solitary life, as they long had done. It was justly said, by the supporters of this measure, that the priests mentioned in the Old Testament were not only married, but that the sacred office descended by inheritance from father to son; while, in the New Testament, marriage was declared honourable in every one; and that to be the husband of but one wife, was reckoned as one of the qualifications of bishops and deacons. Other reasonable changes were made; most of the peculiar doctrines and practices of the Catholic churches were abolished; and that gigantic revolution, so famous under the name of the Reformation, was almost complete.

CHAPTER LV.

CONCLUSION OF THE REIGN OF EDWARD THE SIXTH.—A.D. 1549—1553.

IN the summer of 1549, insurrections among the populace broke out in many counties of England; and a cry was raised against the Reformation, against the use of the new church service, and against the gentry.

There is an old proverb which says, "where there is smoke there is fire;" and, in the same way, we may say, that where there are insurrections there is generally a substantial grievance. The people were in a state of great poverty: the price of food had risen; while the price of labour remained the same, or even sank lower than it had been; for so much ground was turned from arable to pasture, that a number of labourers were thrown out of employment. The English people knew very little about manufactures, which were not much followed among them; and as hands were constantly increasing, while employment for them was at a standstill, there was of course a great deal of misery. All these evils were greatly increased by the depreciation of the coinage during the latter part of the reign of Henry VIII.; and although the act for the punishment of vagabonds, and the relief of the poor, had a good effect as far as the helpless and aged were concerned, who were relieved by their parishes, it was so harsh with respect to the wanderers, that it increased the discontent during the two years it remained on the statute-book. Besides this, people's minds were in a state of great excitement: they did not understand the many rapid changes which had been made in their religion: some few were violently in favour of the new doctrines; but the majority loved the old religion, and regretted not only the suppression of the monks, but also the holidays, shows, and ceremonies they had been deprived of. This excitement on the subject of religion had also the effect of unsettling men's minds, and preventing them from quietly following their usual occupations.

The protector, Somerset, loved popularity; and although he had acted so cruelly towards his own brother, he was generally kind to the people. A complaint had long been made by them that gentlemen had railed round the commons and waste lands, and converted to their own private uses what had been meant for the general benefit of all. Pitying the sufferings of the people, and wishing to obtain their love, Somerset issued a proclamation "against enclosures, and taking-in of fields and commons that were accustomed to lie open for the behoof of the inhabitants dwelling near to the same." Commissioners were also appointed, and sent about the country, to hear and decide all causes concerning such enclosures. Instead of pacifying the people, this only added to the mischief; for they were encouraged by the proclamation to take the matter into their own hands; and mobs of ignorant, riotous men set to work to break down the fences and hedges of gentlemen's estates, to kill the deer in their parks, and commit many other outrages.

These petty riots were soon followed by open rebellion. Historians differ as to the county in which the insurrections first took place; but, in a very short time, the people were in arms over more than half England. At first, complaints against the gentry and the enclosures only were made; but, in Devonshire, a cry arose for the restoration of the ancient religion. Humphrey Arundel, a gentleman, and governor of St. Michael's Mount, was the leader of the insurgents; and they had a number of Catholic priests also for their captains. On the 20th of June (Whit-Monday), these Devonshire rebels rose to the number of 10,000 men, and formed themselves into a regular army. Lord Russell was sent against them; but, as his troops were too few to risk any encounter, he kept at some distance, and sent word to know what were their complaints, which he promised to lay before the government. Arundel and the rebels drew up their demands in writing: the chief of them were, that the statute of the Six Articles should be restored; that the mass should be said in Latin; that the host should be held up, and those who refused to worship it, punished as heretics; that images should be set up again; that the Bible should no longer be permitted to be read by the people; that holy bread, holy water, holy candles, holy palms, and holy ashes should be again used; and that half of the abbey lands should be restored to the church. It is obvious that the priests were at the bottom of this insurrection; and their influence over the people is evident from the nature of the demands.

Cranmer wrote a long letter in reply to the insurgents; and a message was sent to them by the young king, commanding them to disperse immediately, and granting his pardon to all who should do so. But the men of Devonshire were too much excited to submit so quietly; and they marched towards Exeter, carrying before them crosses, banners, holy water, candlesticks, the consecrated host, and other things used in the ceremonies of the Roman church. The people of Exeter shut their gates, and refused to admit the rebels, who were so much enraged, that, on the 2nd of July, they laid siege to the city. The inhabitants were reduced to great distress; but the besiegers were foiled in their attempt. After five weeks of delay, the town was saved by the king's troops, and the rebels attacked and defeated. Numbers were slain in the encounter, and a great many taken prisoners. Amongst the latter was Humphrey Arundel, their leader, who was sent to London, and there executed. Many of the captives were hanged on the spot without any trial; and the vicar of St. Thomas, a sort of captain among them, was suspended by the neck, on the top of his own steeple, dressed as a Romish priest, with his beads hanging at his girdle. About 4,000 of these poor ignorant wretches perished either in the fight or by the hands of the executioner; and thus the insurrection in Devonshire was put down.

The rebellion in many other parts of the country was extinguished without much bloodshed; but that in Norfolk was very formidable. It broke out in July, and was headed by a tanner, named Robert Ket, who, in a short time, collected no less than 16,000 men around him. He exercised great authority amongst them, and summoned those who had committed any offence to take their trial. On these occasions he sat beneath the broad branches of a noble old oak-tree, which stood on Moushold Hill, near Norwich. This tree, from its being the place where justice was administered, obtained the name of the Tree of Reformation. The rebel orators addressed the people from beneath its shades; and the mayor of Norwich and other persons were also permitted to speak from it, and urge them to give up their foolish enterprise, and go peaceably home.

As the protector, Somerset, did not at first interfere, the rebels became very bold. They demanded that there should be no gentlemen at all; and proceeded to rob the wealthy houses and parks in the neighbourhood. They not only killed all the deer they could find, but drove away herds of cattle, flocks of sheep, and immense quantities of poultry, with which they made themselves merry in their camp. At length a herald came from the king, and standing before the Tree of Reformation, proclaimed the royal pardon to all that would disperse to their homes; but threatening death to those who refused to do so. The rioters told the herald to go about his business, for they did not require any pardon. The Marquis of Northampton, with a small army, was then sent against them. Taking up his quarters in Norwich, he drove all the rebels out of the town; but the next day they came back, and returned the compliment by driving him out, and setting Norwich on fire. The action was a fierce one; many of the royal troops were slain, and Lord Sheffield amongst them. The beaten marquis hurried back to London; and then the Earl of Warwick, a very brave and skilful soldier, was sent against the rebels with an army of 6,000 men. After several skirmishes, Warwick, on the 27th of August, made a fierce attack on them in a valley called Dussingdale, and routed them utterly. Ket and the rebels took to their heels; but they were pursued by the horsemen for more than three miles, and massacred in heaps. The roads were covered with the corpses of these unhappy men, and it was calculated that as many as 3,500 of them perished. Ket was found, the next day, hid in a barn; and being tried and condemned as a traitor, he was hanged in chains on the top of Norwich Castle. His brother also shared his fate; and nine of the other leaders were hanged on the nine branches of the Tree of Reformation. The rebels in Yorkshire were so discouraged by this sad ending of the insurrection at Norfolk, that they accepted the royal pardon and dispersed. Thus, after a fearful sacrifice of human life, the rebellion was extinguished, and peace restored.

These troubles in England had drawn the Duke of Somerset's attention away from Scotland; indeed, there was no longer any reason for carrying on hostilities against that country, now that the young Princess Mary was safely lodged in the court of France. The French king had also taken advantage of the disturbed state of the English, and endeavoured to recover Boulogne. Somerset wished to enter into an alliance with the Emperor of Germany; but Charles declined an alliance with heretics, and the protector was then anxious to make peace with both France and Scotland, finding he could not collect a sufficient force to carry on the war with success, the Scotch having recovered many of their strong places, including Haddington, which had been taken by Lord Grey de Wilton in 1548. To make peace was the wisest thing the protector could do; but that step was violently opposed by the members of the council.

A conspiracy had been formed in that body against the protector, who, since he had risen to the lofty situation which he occupied, had been extremely arrogant, and paid no attention to the opinion of his colleagues. All the councillors who were not entirely devoted to his service were sure to be neglected; while whoever opposed him was treated with anger and contempt. This conduct made him many enemies, who were secretly headed by the Earl of Warwick, a clever and ambitious man, who wished to ruin Somerset and obtain his place. The protector had been building a magnificent palace in the Strand, upon the ground on which Somerset House now stands; and, to complete it, he had pulled down several churches merely for the sake of the materials. Many of the sacred monuments in these churches were broken to pieces, and the bones of the dead treated with disrespect. This increased the envy and bitter feeling against him, and his ruin was determined upon.

Accordingly, the Earl of Warwick, and some other members of the council, met, towards the end of September, at Ely Place, in London, and represented Somerset as the cause of every public misfortune that had lately occurred. They wrote letters to the chief nobility and gentry in England, informing them of their intentions against him, and desiring their assistance; they also sent for the Lord Mayor and aldermen of London, and for the lieutenant of the Tower, and enjoined them to obey their commands, without paying attention to any contrary orders that might be given by the duke. The mayor, the aldermen, the citizens of London, and the lieutenant of the Tower, all deserted the cause of the protector, and promised obedience to the council.

When the news of these proceedings reached Somerset, he issued a proclamation on the 1st of October, calling upon all the king's subjects to repair, armed, to Hampton Court, where Edward then resided, to defend him, "and his most entirely beloved ruler, the lord protector," from a dangerous conspiracy. This appeal met with no response. On the 6th of October, the protector removed the young king to Windsor Castle, where, for a few days, he maintained his power. But his enemies were too strong for him. Finding resistance useless, on the 12th of October he consented that his household should be broken up. On the 13th he was arrested, and the letters patent appointing him protector and governor of the king's person, were revoked; and on the 14th he was brought to London, and imprisoned in the Tower, where he remained till February 6th, 1550, when, his estates being partly confiscated, and a fine of £10,000 imposed, he was released. The king forgave him the fine; and, soon after, he again became one, though not the most prominent, of his majesty's councillors.

Somerset in prison, the Earl of Warwick became the chief man in the state, very much to the joy of the Catholics, who hoped that the ancient religion would be restored. But Warwick cared nothing at all for religion, either of one kind or the other; and finding that the young king was strongly attached to the Protestant doctrines, he embraced them himself; and though he was supposed rather to favour the Catholics in his heart, became, apparently, as zealous a Protestant as any one in the kingdom. On the 4th of November, 1549, the parliament again met, when the act by which beggars and vagabonds were permitted to be seized and sold for slaves, was repealed, because it was found too severe to be put into practice. Acts were also passed to prevent unlawful assemblies of the people; and—the late insurrections having been greatly promoted by some mischievous and impudent prediction that there should soon be no king in England, and that all the nobility and gentry would be destroyed—to forbid pretended prophecies respecting the king or his council. Foreign affairs also called for the attention of Warwick. He and the council had violently opposed Somerset when he wished to conclude a peace with France; but they soon found themselves in exactly the same difficulties that had puzzled the late protector. Though the insurrection had been put down, the people were still discontented, and the treasury was empty. Warwick and the council, therefore, agreed to sell Boulogne to the French king for 400,000 crowns, and to abandon a claim for tribute which they had upon that monarch. Scotland, also, was included in this treaty; and peace was made, chiefly because all parties were too poor to go to war.

Meantime the work of reformation in the church proceeded favourably; but it is very sad to reflect that the Protestants were tainted with that intolerant and persecuting spirit which had disgraced the church of Rome. Some persons in London were accused of holding heretical opinions, because they had said that a regenerate man (that is, one born anew by grace to a Christian life) could not sin, and that the body of Christ was not born of the Virgin Mary, but that the word of God was made flesh. This notion seems as harmless as it is unintelligible; but the council did not think so. Those who held it were arrested; but as they consented to abjure their opinions, they were dismissed. Shortly afterwards, a young woman named Joan Bocher, and commonly called the Maid of Kent, was arrested for holding the same heresy. Joan was a young woman of some education, and exceedingly zealous on behalf of the strange doctrine she entertained: she was arrested in 1549; and as neither arguments nor threats had any effect upon her, she was condemned to be burnt to death at the stake, as an incorrigible heretic. The execution of the sentence was delayed a year, in hopes of her conversion; but as she remained firm in her belief, on the 27th of April, 1550, the council issued a warrant to the Lord Chancellor, directing him to make out a writ to the sheriff of London for her execution, which took place on the 2nd of May. Foxe, in his Book of Martyrs, states, that the delay in the execution of Joan was on account of the compassionate scruples of Edward, who was extremely reluctant to sign the warrant, though repeatedly pressed to do so by Cranmer. At last his majesty complied, saying, "with tears, to the archbishop, 'If I do wrong, since I do it by your authority, you must answer for it to God.'" The minutes of the council, brought to light since Foxe's time, prove that there is no foundation for this statement. It is very probable, however, Cranmer approved of the burning of Joan, though he was not present at the council on the 27th of April; and does not appear to have interfered on the subject.

At the period of the cruel martyrdom of Joan Bocher, a Dutch surgeon, named George von Paris, who had been living in London, was burnt in Smithfield for saying that Jesus was not the Son of God. Paris appears to have been a crazy enthusiast; for he not only seemed to despise the horrible torture to which he had been condemned, but even hugged and caressed the burning faggots which were consuming him.

Although the nation, generally, received the Protestant religion, there was one person of high rank who refused to conform to it. This was the Princess Mary, the king's eldest sister. In the beginning of Edward's reign, she had written to the protector, that it was proper no further changes should be made in religion until her brother was of age. Somerset, in reply, said he believed some mischievous person had set her on to write that letter, and implored her not to "esteem true religion and the knowledge of the Scriptures to be newfangledness and fantasy," but to examine the subject fairly, and without prejudice. This answer had no effect on the princess; and she continued steadily attached to the Roman form of religion. At last, the council sent her word that they could not permit mass to be performed, even in her own private chapel. Mary resented this interference, and wished to leave the country, and take refuge in the court of her cousin, the Catholic Emperor of Germany; but the council sent a fleet to sea, to prevent her escape; though, if she had gone, and never come back, it would have been a great blessing for England.

In the December of 1550, two of Mary's chaplains were indicted for performing mass; and, on the 18th of March, 1551, the princess appeared before the council and her brother, the king, who were unable to shake her faith in the doctrines of the ancient religion. On he 19th of March, the emperor's ambassador sent a message to the council, from his master, to the effect that, if the Princess Mary were interfered with on the subject of religion, he should declare war against England. This message, as the country was not prepared for war, led to a temporary suspension of proceedings against Mary's household; and a mission was sent to the emperor to remonstrate against his interference in the internal concerns of England. But liberty of conscience was not long permitted to the princess. Again the officers of her household were commanded to prevent the use of the Roman Liturgy in her family; and, on refusing to do so, they were sent to the Tower. Several members of the council (in August) visited the princess, to reason with her on religion; but they were unable to make the least impression. She told them that when the king came to be of age, so that he could order these things for himself, she would obey his commands in religion: for though he—good, sweet king—had more knowledge than any of his years, yet he was not a fit judge in religious matters; for if ships were to be sent to sea, or any matter of policy to be determined, they would not think him fit for it; much less could he be able to resolve points of divinity. As for her chaplains, if they would say no mass, she could hear none; and for her servants, she knew they all desired to hear mass. Her chaplains might do as they would; it was but a short imprisonment: but, for the new service, it should never be said in her house; and if any were forced to say it, she would no longer remain: and so things continued.

Though Somerset, after his release from prison in February, 1550, was a very insignificant person, in comparison with what he had been, he still enjoyed favour at the hands of his nephew; and, before March expired, he was made a lord of the bed-chamber. He had also been so far reconciled to Warwick, that, in June, one of his daughters, Lady Anne Seymour, was married to Lord Lisle, the earl's eldest son. Much of his former grandeur was also regained; for, in the following December, whilst Warwick and other nobles were permitted to have only fifty guards, he had 100 assigned him. In 1551, however, there were quarrels between the retainers of Somerset and those of Warwick; and some of the former were sent to the Tower. Peace again prevailed for a time; and on the 11th of October, Percy, Duke of Northumberland, having died without heirs, his title and estates were conferred on Warwick, who will hereafter be called by this title. A few days after this accession of rank and wealth to his enemy—on the 16th of October—Somerset was a second time arrested, and sent to the Tower, on a charge of conspiracy and high treason. He was charged, on the authority of Sir Thomas Palmer (who had acted as a spy on him), with having intended to seize the person of the king; to raise an insurrection in the north of England; to attack the royal troops on a muster-day; to seize the Tower; to raise a rebellion in London; and to invite the Duke of Northumberland, with his friends, the Earls of Pembroke and Northampton, to a banquet, and there murder them. These charges, except the last, are generally supposed to have been got up against him, or, at the worst, to have been founded on some thoughtless expressions. As no proper record of the trial exists, it is impossible to say how far he was really guilty.

On the 1st of December the fallen duke was placed on his trial at Westminster Hall, before a jury of twenty-seven peers, amongst whom were Northumberland, Pembroke, and Northampton—the very persons he was accused of designing to murder; so that they were both complainants and judges also. Somerset defended himself so well from the charges of treason that were brought against him, that he was acquitted on that head. He confessed, however, that he had spoken about murdering the Duke of Northumberland and the rest; but that, on reflection, he had abandoned his wicked intention; and he begged their pardon for the malice he had borne towards them. This was considered sufficient; and, though acquitted as a traitor, he was condemned to death as a felon. The unhappy duke was guilty of a great offence in the sight of God, in contemplating murder; but as he had never committed it, he had not broken the laws of man; and to sentence him to a violent and ignominious death, was a flagrant injustice. But, in those cruel times, the favourites and ministers of kings played a desperate game, in which failure too often led to the scaffold.

Northumberland had convinced Edward that his uncle was guilty; and the young monarch made no effort to save the life of his near relative. Indeed, he seems to have spent a more than usually merry Christmas, while his mother's brother lay in the Tower, waiting for the sad morning that should consign him to the darkness of a blood-stained and dishonoured grave.

On the 22nd of January, 1552, the duke was led to the scaffold on Tower Hill, where an immense crowd of people had assembled to see him die. Somerset, who loved popularity, had always been kind to the poor; and now that he had fallen into such trouble, they implored blessings on him, and trusted that he would receive the royal pardon. He himself was composed, and seemed perfectly resigned to his fate. After he had delivered a speech to the multitude, a great noise was heard, which some said was like a violent storm, or an explosion of gunpowder Others thought it was like the tramp of a multitude of horsemen; but nothing was to be seen. The people were alarmed, and cried, "Jesus, save us!" while others, seeing a gentleman, named Sir Antony Brown, riding towards the scaffold, shouted—"Pardon! pardon is come! God save the king!" The duke himself calmly told them they were mistaken, and continued his dying address, which he thus concluded:—"If there be any who hath been offended and injured by me, I most humbly require and ask him forgiveness; but especially Almighty God, whom, throughout all my life, I have most grievously offended; and all others, whosoever they be, that have offended me, I do, with my whole heart, forgive them. Now, I once again require you, dearly beloved in the Lord, that you will keep yourselves quiet and still, lest, through your tumult, you might trouble me. For, albeit the spirit be willing and ready, the flesh is frail and wavering; and through your quietness, I shall be much more composed. Above all, I desire you to bear me witness, that I die here in the faith of Jesus Christ; desiring you to help me with your prayers, that I may persevere constant in the same unto my end." Having finished this address, and spent some time in prayer, he laid his head upon the block, and, while he was uttering the name of Jesus, it was at one blow struck from his body. Many of the spectators rushed forward, and dipped their handkerchiefs in the blood, which they preserved as a sacred relic. Though very far from being a blameless character, Somerset was, without doubt, unjustly put to death; and his memory was revered by the people. The worst act of his life was the unnatural part he took in the death of his own brother, Lord Admiral Seymour. Sir Thomas Arundel, Sir Michael Stanhope, Sir Miles Partridge, and Sir Ralph Vane, friends of the unfortunate duke, were condemned, as being sharers in the offences imputed to him, and put to death. They all protested their innocence of any design either against the king, or the lives of any of the council; and Vane declared, that as often as Northumberland laid his head upon his pillow, he would find it wet with their blood.

The day after the execution of Somerset, the parliament again met, and discovered some symptoms of a returning love of justice and liberty. It passed an act for enforcing the Book of Common Prayer, as amended by a committee of bishops and divines; it altered the law against treason, and declared that no one should be convicted of that offence, unless it was proved by the oaths of two witnesses confronted with the prisoner. It also made some regulations for the use of the poor, and for the stricter observance of fast-days and holidays: and confirmed the act of a former parliament, declaring it lawful for priests to marry.

This parliament, also, acted in a very resolute and manly way, in opposing an attempted tyranny of the Duke of Northumberland. Tunstal, the Bishop of Durham, though attached to the old religion, was much respected as a learned and pious man. He had always opposed all changes in the church; but submitted to them when they were made. His high character had protected him from any severity during the rule of the late Duke of Somerset; but when Northumberland gained the chief power of the state, Tunstal was sent to prison. Northumberland's object was, to seize the revenues of the bishop; and, for this purpose, he brought in a bill of attainder against that prelate, on a pretence that he had possessed a guilty knowledge of the treasons charged against the Duke of Somerset. The House of Lords passed the unjust bill; only Archbishop Cranmer and one nobleman opposing it. But the Commons desired that the witnesses against Tunstal should be examined in his presence, and that he should be allowed to defend himself. This was merely an act of simple justice; Northumberland refused it, and then the Commons very properly rejected the bill of attainder. English parliaments, during the reign of Henry VIII., had been so base and grovelling, that the tyrannical Northumberland was astonished at the independent spirit of this one; and dissolving it in disgust, resolved to call another.

The duke exerted himself to the utmost to get a parliament which would be merely the instrument of his ambition. He even induced the king, who knew no better, to send a circular letter to the sheriffs, commanding them, where the privy council "recommended men of learning and wisdom," to see that "their directions were regarded and followed!" and sixteen of his courtiers were expressly nominated and returned as the "knights" of eight counties. The parliament thus elected was devoted to the views of Northumberland, who induced it to suppress the bishopric of Durham, and turn it into a royal property, which he intended, soon afterwards, to beg from the king.

Edward was a lad of very delicate health; and, in the spring of the year 1552, he had been attacked, first by the measles, and then by the small-pox. From that time he had gradually declined; and in the beginning of 1553 he was seized with a troublesome cough, which no medicines could cure. It was commonly suspected that some slow poison had been given to him; and the Duke of Northumberland was so much hated by the people, that they said, in low whispers, he was the would-be assassin of their king. But the accusation was unjust; the hectic flush, the unnatural brightness of the eye, the wasting form, and the precocious intellect of the young king, betrayed the presence of that curse of our climate—consumption. During his illness, Bishop Ridley preached before him, and spoke very eloquently of charity, and the duty of the great to be eminent in good works. Edward was touched with the sermon; and when it was over, sent for the bishop, and desired his opinion how he should do his duty on that point. Ridley took some time to consider; and, after consulting the Lord Mayor and aldermen of London, he suggested that the king should build three hospitals;—one for the recovery of those who were ill or had met with accidents; another for the correction of wilfully-idle and vicious people; and a third for the maintenance and education of poor orphan children. Edward joyfully took the bishop's advice; and, without delay, endowed St. Thomas's Hospital for the first, Bridewell for the second, and Christ's Church, or the Blue-coat School, as it is called, for the third. These three institutions are still in existence, and flourishing; though, it must be confessed, that the governors of the last—the Christ's Church, or Blue-coat School—appear to have sadly forgotten for what class of boys it was intended. The benevolent Edward, languishing in illness, and feeling the slow but sure approach of death, wished not to descend to the grave before he had given to his country some benefits which should bless and cheer the friendless and suffering, even of unborn generations of his people. The death-smitten prince thought of the future orphans of the greatest city of England: he was himself an orphan, and had never known a mother's love; for she had died in the hour which gave him birth; and his sympathetic heart yearned to cast some stray flowers across their rugged, weary path of life. He wished to rescue them from that lonely desolation of the spirit which breeds despair, and to snatch them from ignorance, misery, and crime. So he raised a noble building, which should be at once a college and a home for the orphans of London. Alas! how little are the intentions of the generous dead respected: the school and home, built for the orphans, have been usurped, to a large extent, by the sons of wealthy tradesmen and retired citizens! The youthful king had, before his illness, taken an interest in the education of youth. Between 1551 and 1553 he founded twelve grammar schools, in twelve of the most important cities and towns of that day. These institutions still exist, and are known as King Edward's Schools.

The ambitious Duke of Northumberland resolved to profit by the illness and expected death of Edward; and to forward his purpose, he was constantly about the king's person; and endeavoured, by every kindness and attention, to win his affection. He had lately married his fourth son, Lord Guildford Dudley, to the beautiful and accomplished Lady Jane Grey; and, by this alliance, he hoped to place his family upon the throne of England; that lady being of royal descent.

The Princess Mary, sister of Henry VIII., was first married to Louis XII., King of France; and, after his death, to her handsome and chivalrous lover, Charles Brandon, Duke of Suffolk. She left two children, both daughters; the eldest of whom was married to the Marquis of Dorset, and she and her husband became Duke and Duchess of Suffolk. Lady Jane Grey was their daughter, and consequently great-grand-daughter to Henry VII. Thus, after the Princesses Mary and Elizabeth, and the daughter of Margaret Tudor, the widow of James VII. of Scotland, the Lady Jane would have the right of succeeding to the crown. She was, it will be seen, a lineal descendant from Henry VII.; but the Princess Mary, the Princess Elizabeth, and Mary Queen of Scots, stood before her in the line of succession.

Northumberland, after marrying his son to the Lady Jane, sought to induce the dying King Edward to settle the crown upon that lady. He drew a terrible picture to the feeble and susceptible young monarch, of the dangers to which the Protestant religion would be exposed, and the persecutions to which the reformers would be subjected, if the Princess Mary, an avowed papist, became sovereign of England. He reminded him, that both she and her sister Elizabeth had been declared illegitimate by acts of parliament, which had never been repealed; and that, as it would seem insulting and irregular to pass by one and not the other, on that account, the better and safer way would be, to exclude them both from royalty, and to declare his cousin, the Protestant Lady Jane, as his successor. As to the Queen of Scots, he said she was excluded by the late king's will, and being an alien, had lost all right of inheritance to the regal power of England; not to mention, that as she was betrothed to the dauphin of France, she would make England merely a province of that country.

Edward was convinced by this reasoning, and himself wrote out a rough draft of the legal instrument necessary for the purpose. Sir Edward Montague, Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, two other judges, and the attorney and solicitor-general, were summoned to the council. The minutes of the intended deed being read, the king desired them to draw it up in a proper legal form. The judges were astonished, hesitated to obey, and desired time for consideration. An act of parliament already existed which settled the succession; and they said, unless that act were repealed, no deed, such as the king wished, would have any power.

After having consulted together for some days, Montague and the judges returned, and said, that upon examining the statutes, they found that such a deed would not only be entirely useless, but that it would subject the judges who drew it, and every member of the council who signed it, to the risk of being proceeded against as traitors. They added, that the only proper way of changing the succession, and giving a lawful sanction to the new settlement, was by summoning a parliament, and obtaining the consent of that assembly. The king was still resolute; and Northumberland, rushing into the room where the judges were, flew into a violent passion; called Montague a traitor, and said that he was ready to fight any man in so just a cause as that of Lady Jane's succession. In the end, the judges were bullied into drawing up the deed, the king telling them that he intended to have it confirmed by the parliament as soon as it met, agreeing to give them a warrant under the great seal to do it, and a pardon for having done it. After this, it was signed by all the lords of the council, and most of the judges.

This deed of settlement, or will, was signed on the 21st of June, 1553; and early in the following month, it was evident that Edward was dying. When his physicians declared that they were unable to save him, he was confided to the care of an ignorant woman, who undertook to restore him to health. As might have been expected, he got worse under her treatment, and the fatal symptoms of his disease increased. He breathed and spoke with great difficulty; his pulse seemed scarcely to beat; his legs swelled; and his complexion became livid. The foolish old quack was then dismissed, and the doctors recalled; but the time when medical skill could have saved him was past: he sank gradually, and expired at Greenwich on the 6th of July, 1553, in the sixteenth year of his age.—He had reigned six years and a-half.

An account of his last moments is very affecting. Just before his death, he prayed fervently that God would release him from this wretched life; that He would bless the people of England, preserve the country from popery, and maintain His true religion in the land. Then, after a pause, he turned his face towards his attendants, and said, "Are ye so nigh? I thought ye had been further off." Dr. Owen answered, "We heard you speaking to yourself; but what you said, we know not." The patient sufferer smiled faintly, as he murmured, "I was praying to God." His last words were, "I am faint;—Lord have mercy upon me, and take my spirit." Sir Henry Sydney supported him in his arms: the poor lad rested his head on the bosom of the courtier, and sighed gently. For some moments he remained motionless. Sir Henry guessed what had occurred, and raised him tenderly. His suspicion was too true; the silver cord was loosed; the bowl was broken at the fountain; the royal boy was dead.

It is pleasant to speak of the character of this good young king; a virtuous mind being always a beautiful and improving thing to contemplate. Had Edward VI. lived till he became a man, he would, most likely, have been one of the best of our English kings. His love of learning and his actual accomplishments were wonderful. Some of his Protestant admirers called him the wonder of his age; others named him their Josiah, or Edward the Saint; and others, again, the phœnix that rose from the ashes of his mother. He was acquainted with several languages, with the general outlines of science, and with the state of his kingdom. He kept a journal, in which he wrote an account of many of the events of his reign; and he took notes, in Greek, of all he heard that interested him. His love for religion, and his zeal for the Protestant form of it, were remarkable: nor did he, like his father, constantly talk about religion, and act in forgetfulness or opposition to its precepts. He was gentle and merciful; as his conduct, in so long refusing to sign the warrant for the death of Bocher, will show. He was also honest and prudent; careful to have his debts paid; and anxious that his people should not be oppressed by heavy taxes. He certainly ought to have shown more concern for the fate of his two uncles, each of whom he suffered to be executed on an unjust charge. It would have been more in unison with the natural tenderness of youth, if he had interfered to spare their lives; but when his uncle, Lord Admiral Seymour, was condemned, he was very young; and when the Duke of Somerset shared his fate, Northumberland wickedly made the still youthful king, who trusted in his adviser's wisdom and truth, believe that the duke was a dangerous and guilty man.

Generally, his disposition was mild, even to sweetness, and his affability of manner endeared him to his people. He was commonly distinguished by a gravity and quietness not often to be found in one so young; but sometimes he would be both cheerful and playful, as the following anecdote will show. One St. George's Day, after he had returned from hearing divine service, he suddenly said to the noblemen by whom he was surrounded, "My lords, I pray you, what saint is St. George, that we here so honour him?" It seems that none of these learned courtiers were able to give any information upon the subject; and they looked at each other in a rather stupid sort of silence. Well they might do so! for a day was expressly set apart in honour of the memory of St. George; and these very noblemen had just come from a service instituted to keep alive a remembrance of him, and yet none of them knew who he was, or whether there was ever such a saint at all. At last, the treasurer answered, "If it please your majesty, I never read in any history of St. George, but only in Legenda aurea, where it is thus set down: 'St. George out with his sword, and ran the dragon through with his spear.'" At this odd description the young king laughed so heartily, that for some time he was unable to speak; but on recovering his breath, he humorously inquired, "I pray you, my lord, and what did he with his sword the while?"

CHAPTER LVI.

THE REIGN OF QUEEN MARY.—A.D. 1553, 1554.

IN order to get the crown for Lady Jane Grey, the Duke of Northumberland concealed the death of Edward, and sent messages to the Princesses Mary and Elizabeth to hasten them to court. His object was to make them prisoners: but in this he was disappointed; for both the ladies were secretly informed of their brother's death, and of the duke's sinister intentions.

Mary, who was living at Hunsdon, in Hertfordshire, had arrived within half a day's journey of the court when she heard of this conspiracy against her, and hurried away to Framlingham, in Suffolk; from which place she could easily embark and escape to Flanders, in case of her being unable to obtain the crown. Elizabeth, who was also in Hertfordshire, very wisely remained where she was. Though Mary had fled, it was not from fear, but for safety; and she immediately sent letters to the nobility and the principal gentlemen of the country, commanding them to help her to obtain that crown which had descended to her from her father. She also, on the 9th of July, wrote to the council, telling the members of that assembly that she was aware of her brother's death, promising a pardon for their present conduct, and giving them directions for proclaiming her as queen.

For two days the ambitious Duke of Northumberland and his friends debated what was best to be done. On the 8th of July, the duke summoned the Lord Mayor, six aldermen, and many of the principal citizens, and showing them the king's will, by which Lady Jane Grey was declared his successor, induced them to swear allegiance to her as their queen. All this had been done without the knowledge of Jane, who was one of the most retiring and least ambitious persons in the world. She had no wish to be a queen, and was perfectly happy in the society of her young husband, and the enjoyment of her books. She had been educated with the late king; and though not yet seventeen, had made an astonishing progress in her studies. She was familiar with the Greek, Latin, French, and Italian languages, and well acquainted with all the elegant literature then esteemed. Much of her time was passed in intellectual pursuits; and she was quite indifferent to the little frivolities with which so many young ladies chiefly occupy themselves. A famous scholar, named Roger Ascham, having paid her a visit at Bradgate Hall, a residence of her father's, when she was but fourteen years of age, was astonished to find her reading Plato's Dialogue on the Immortality of the Soul, in the original Greek, while the rest of the family were out hunting. On expressing his surprise at her choice, she told him that she received more pleasure from reading Plato than the others could reap from their sport and gaiety.

When Northumberland and her father, the Duke of Suffolk, saluted her as queen, she wisely refused to accept the title, and reminded them of the superior right of the Princesses Mary and Elizabeth. She even expressed her fear of the consequences of an act which, she observed, was dangerous, if not criminal; but in the end she was overcome by their entreaties, and consented to their wishes. She was, in consequence, on the 10th of July, proclaimed in London and other places as Queen of England; but no shouts were raised: the people looked coldly on, and many feared that this important act might lead to a civil war. Some of the spectators even expressed their contempt; and a young man, named Gilbert Pot, a vintner's apprentice, was nailed by both his ears to the pillory, for some insulting words uttered on the occasion. This punishment was ordered by the Duke of Northumberland, and it helped to destroy the little favour with the people which his daughter-in-law possessed. In the meantime the Earl of Bath and many other noblemen joined the Princess Mary, and the governing council secretly favoured her cause; but they could not declare for her, because the rough-fighting Northumberland kept them all like prisoners in the Tower, where the Lady Jane held her court. Ridley, Bishop of London, who was a zealous Protestant, preached from St. Paul's Cross, to convince the people of the justice of Jane's title; but he was unable to make any impression upon them.

Mary had become very powerful: the people of Suffolk declared for her; the nobles and gentry daily joined her with their retainers; and a small fleet and a body of troops raised by Northumberland had deserted to her. When she had written to the council to demand the throne, they were compelled by Northumberland to answer, that her claim was opposed by her illegitimate birth, by custom, by the will of the late king, and by the general voice of the people: but now they saw how powerful she was getting, they regretted having done so, and watched for an opportunity of declaring for her.

That opportunity soon presented itself; for it was necessary for some one to lead the troops to oppose the Princess Mary. Northumberland wished the Duke of Suffolk to perform this hazardous enterprise, while he himself remained with Lady Jane to uphold her authority. The council wanted Northumberland to go, that they might be rid of his tyrannical domineering, and they worked upon the fears of Jane by telling her of the great danger to which her father would be exposed; so that lady, with many tears, implored that he might be permitted to remain with her. They then represented to Northumberland that he was the bravest and most experienced soldier in the country, and by far the fittest to command an army. As he knew Suffolk was a man of no talent at all, he consented to do so; and having reminded the council of their oaths of allegiance to the Lady Jane, he left London, on the 13th of July, with a little army of 6,000 men. As he led his forces through the city, he was discouraged by the coldness of the people, who thronged the streets to gaze on his soldiers, but uttered no shout, and spoke no word of encouragement. "Many," said he to Lord Grey, "come out to look at us; but I find not one who cries, 'God speed you!'"

Northumberland had forced the council into proclaiming Jane; but no sooner was he gone than they contrived to get out of the Tower, and declare for Mary, whom, on the 19th of July, they proclaimed as queen in Cheapside, to the great satisfaction of most of the people. A few Protestants shook their heads with mournful forebodings; but the citizens generally shouted with joy at the triumph of their rightful hereditary queen; who, with her sister Elizabeth riding by her side, entered the metropolis on the 3rd of August, amidst the enthusiasm of the citizens. This expression of feeling was so general and decided, that even Lady Jane's father, who commanded at the Tower, thought further resistance useless; and throwing open the gates of that fortress, declared for Queen Mary himself. He then entered his daughter's apartment, and told her that she must be a queen no longer. That amiable young lady, who had worn the crown only ten days, expressed no regret, but said that she trusted her willing abandonment of the honour that had been thrust upon her, would procure a pardon for the error she had committed.

Northumberland, whose grasping ambition was the cause of this conspiracy, had gone to Cambridge, where he learnt that the council had declared for Mary. Seeing that his troops also were continually deserting, and that the cause of Lady Jane was unpopular everywhere, he became alarmed for his own safety. So—though he had gone out with an army to fight Mary, and, if possible, take her a prisoner—when he found his cause hopeless, he turned with the rest, and, on the 20th of July, actually proclaimed her as queen in the market-place at Cambridge. This hypocrisy did him no good; for a stern message was sent to him from the queen and council, commanding him to lay down his arms. As he hesitated to do so (for he scarcely knew whether to trust to the queen's mercy or to fly for his life), he was arrested by the Earl of Arundel, on a charge of treason, and conveyed to the Tower. This blustering lord, the moment that he found himself in trouble, behaved in a very undignified and cowardly manner, and even fell on his kness before the earl and begged his life. It would have been better to have spared himself this humiliation; for Arundel was his bitterest enemy, and rejoiced in his fall.

Had Northumberland himself been the only victim of his insane ambition, few or none would have regretted it; but it too often happens that the innocent are punished with the guilty. The amiable Lady Jane and her youthful husband were also sent as prisoners to the Tower, as well as the other sons of the duke, and several of his friends. On the 18th of August, Northumberland, his eldest son, the Earl of Warwick, and the Earl of Northampton, were placed on their trial at Westminster Hall as traitors. The duke said, very truly, that all he had done was with the consent of the council, and under the warrant of the great seal of England; and he asked, whether those who had acted with him could properly sit in judgment on him for offences in which they had shared? The members of the council replied, that they had been compelled to act as they did through fear of him; and they condemned him to death all the more readily for reminding them of their inconsistency. He tried, by submissive conduct, and by hinting that he was ready to return to the Catholic faith, to procure the royal pardon; but the stern Mary was not the woman to forgive one who had offended her so deeply. The Earls of Warwick and Northampton received sentence with him; and, on the following day, Sir John Gates and Sir Thomas Palmer were also condemned.

On the 22nd of August, these two unfortunate gentlemen and the Duke of Northumberland were beheaded on Tower Hill. The duke made a long and penitent speech upon the scaffold, in which he prayed that it might please God to grant Mary a long reign; and declared that he died in the Catholic faith. So much was he disliked, that some of the bystanders insulted him while he stood upon the scaffold, holding up handkerchiefs stained with the blood of the Duke of Somerset, and reproaching him as the murderer of that nobleman. Northumberland, once so bold, seemed utterly humbled and crushed in spirit, and declared, that if he had a thousand lives he deserved to lose them all. Then laying his head upon the block, the axe fell, and the bleeding, quivering head fell with a dull, hollow sound upon the boards. Sir John Gates was the next victim; and after him Sir Thomas Palmer suffered. He was a man of great nerve and courage, and beheld the companions of his misery die before his face without showing any sign of agitation. In his dying speech, he thanked God that He had caused him to know more in his cell in the Tower, than he had learnt in all his travels. "There," said he, "I have seen what God is and what I am: I have beheld the bitterness and vanity of the world, and learnt to despise death." He added, that not even that violent end, nor the sight of the blood-stained axe, could impress him with fear: then, desiring their prayers, he submitted himself to the headsman.

A short time before these executions, the body of the young King Edward had been committed to the earth. He was buried at Westminster Abbey, according to the rites of the Protestant church, on the 9th of August; though Mary, on the same day, had his obsequies performed at the Tower, in the Catholic fashion, a dirge being sung in Latin, and mass performed for the good of his soul. Her intention of restoring the ancient religion had been shown on her first arrival in London, by the liberation of all the state captives who had been imprisoned for their attachment to the Roman church. Among them were Tunstal and Bonner, the late Bishops of Durham and London, and the old Duke of Norfolk, who had been in prison ever since the death of Henry VIII.

On the 1st of October, the coronation of Mary took place at Westminster Abbey. It was celebrated with great magnificence, and with all the ancient ceremonies. In the procession, after the queen's chariot, came another, covered with white cloth of silver, and containing the Princess Elizabeth and Anne of Cleves, the good-tempered Flemish princess, whom Henry had married and then so contemptuously cast off. Mary was no longer a young woman: she was thirty-seven years of age at the time when she became queen. This with many ladies would be still the flower of life but persecution, disease, ill-temper, and a bigoted attachment to a gloomy, superstitious form of religion had made Mary much older in mind and person than in years. She remembered that Cranmer and the Protestants had driven her mother to an early grave, by annulling her marriage with King Henry. She herself, also, had been declared illegitimate; had been kept in fear of her life, and worried by the Protestant preachers to abjure the religion in which she had been educated; and she hated the Protestants with an intense bitterness.

Mary had been good-looking; but at the time of her coronation the bloom of youth was utterly gone. She was pale and sickly; and a few wrinkles, caused more by sorrow than by time, were to be seen upon her forehead. She was rather short and thin, but had a loud harsh voice—a thing which seems to have been common to Henry VIII. and his family. Though very short-sighted, her eyes were remarkably piercing, and when she was angry, seemed to glare like those of a tigress.

Mary, on her accession, wished to acquire the attachment of her people; and issued a proclamation that all persons should be permitted to worship God in the manner in which they thought best; and she very properly commanded her subjects not to irritate each other by the use of such offensive names as heretic and papist. She had, however, no intention of permitting the toleration she talked about; but she had been advised to proceed cautiously in restoring the old form of religion, lest she should drive her subjects to rebellion. As might be expected, Archbishop Cranmer was the earliest to feel the rod; but it was his own indiscretion that first brought him into trouble. A report having been spread that he was ready to desert the reformed religion, and had offered to restore the rites of the ancient church, he published a manifesto in his own defence. In it he said, that as the devil was a liar from the beginning, and the father of lies, he had stirred up his servants to persecute Christ and His true religion; that this infernal spirit was endeavouring to restore the Latin satisfactory-masses (a thing of his own invention and device); and that, the better to effect his purpose, the fiend had made use of his (Cranmer's) name and authority: that the mass was not only without foundation, either in the Scriptures or the practice of the primitive church; but was also a plain contradiction to antiquity and the inspired writings; besides being full of horrid blasphemies.

It is strange how the generally timid Cranmer had the courage to publish such a declaration as this; but perhaps he thought his case was desperate, and could not well be made worse. Some have said that he did not make it public himself, but merely wrote it to keep by him, and that some treacherous person contrived to obtain and show it to the queen. However that may be, Mary did see it; and she caused the archbishop to be arrested on the 14th of November, and sent to the Tower, to take his trial for favouring the views of Lady Jane Grey, and opposing the queen's accession. Of this he was no more guilty than all the rest of the council had been; yet he was condemned to suffer the death of a traitor. But Mary pardoned his treason, as it was called, and sent him back to the Tower on the still more fearful charge of heresy, where he remained for more than two years a prisoner.—Bishop Latimer had been sent to the Tower the day before Cranmer was imprisoned; and Bishops Bonner and Gardiner were liberated, and restored to their sees. The latter was made chancellor.

The parliament assembled on the 5th of October, and was opened by a celebration of the mass of the Holy Ghost in Latin. When the host, or consecrated wafer, was raised for the adoration of the members, they all fell down upon their knees before it. One man only had the courage to refuse to do what the whole of that assembly had lately declared to be impious and unlawful: this was Taylor, the Bishop of Lincoln; and he was instantly hustled, as if he had been among a gang of thieves, and violently thrust out of the House of Lords. This parliament abolished every sort of treason not contained in the statute of Edward III., and every sort of felony not in the statute-book before the time of Henry VIII.; for, since those periods, a number of trifling and frivolous offences had been declared to be treasons and felonies. It then pronounced the queen to be legitimate: ratified the marriage of Henry with her mother, Catharine; and annulled the divorce pronounced by Cranmer, whom they severely censured for his conduct in that matter. Then, with one vote, they repealed all the statutes made in the reign of King Edward with respect to religion. But the queen still kept the title of Supreme Head of the Church—a title very shocking to the ears of Catholics; and although she declared herself willing to restore all the church land which had been forfeited to the crown, she did not press her nobles upon that tender point.

After the parliament met, a convocation of the clergy also assembled, in which the Catholic bishops had it entirely their own way; for the Protestant ones scarcely dared to utter a word. The new Book of Common Prayer was voted an abomination; the reformed English Catechism was declared to be equally wicked; and it was recommended, that all clergymen that would not turn their wives out of doors, and believe in the doctrine of transubstantiation, should be severely punished. In consequence of these measures of both parliament and convocation, the old form of religion began rapidly to reappear over the land, and great numbers of priests returned to their holy wafers, holy water, holy candles, confession, and mass. But there were many sincere good men in the church, who preferred ruin to apostasy; and some of these were thrown into prison, and others driven out of their livings, to beg or starve upon the highways. Of the bishops, about half of them consented to return to the rites of the Romish church; and most of those who did not, were deprived of their sees, and sent to prison: others voluntarily resigned. Holgate, the Archbishop of York, was sent to the Tower, for being married; Ridley, of London, for preaching in favour of the title of Lady Jane; Poynet, of Winchester, for having a wife; Taylor, of Lincoln, for not believing properly about the holy wafer; Hooper, of Worcester and Gloucester, and Harley of Hereford, for marriage and heresy; Ferrar, of St. David's; Bird, of Chester; and Coverdale, of Exeter, for no heavier offences.

The church service was, soon after the parliament and convocation met, performed in Latin throughout the kingdom; and the queen hit on a plan to put an end to the preaching of the reformed doctrines. Under pretence of discouraging disputes and bitterness on religious subjects, she issued a proclamation, forbidding any one to preach without a licence. Of course, no one suspected of any leaning to the Protestant opinions was able to obtain one. The inhabitants of Suffolk, who were the first to recognise her as queen, when she was but a fugitive, ventured to address a remonstrance to her upon this point; but they received an insulting answer; and one, who was bolder than the rest, was set in the pillory. Judge Hale, who had resolutely contended for the queen's title, was also thrown into prison for opposing this illegal conduct, and treated with such severity that he became insane and destroyed himself.

The queen, at an early period, turned her attention to the question of her marriage. First she thought of her young and handsome cousin, Edward Courtney, the Earl of Devonshire, to whom she gave many proofs of her favour and attachment. But the earl was not tempted by her grandeur; and he preferred her more lively and pleasing sister, the Princess Elizabeth. Disappointed of the earl, she turned her attention to another kinsman, the eloquent Cardinal Pole, who, as he had never taken priest's orders, was at liberty to marry, had he wished to do so. But the cardinal had no idea of the kind; and was living in pleasant retirement with his books, in a lovely Italian monastery, declining to quit it when the pope appointed him his legate. He was also fifty-three years of age; and, upon reflection, Mary seems to have thought that she would like a younger husband. She then cast her eyes towards Philip of Spain, the eldest son of the powerful emperor, Charles V. The ambitious emperor was very anxious that this match should take place; for he hoped, by that means, to make England a province of Spain. His son Philip was a widower, and eleven years younger than the queen; but that Mary was not likely to object to. The emperor, therefore, sent ambassadors to England; and Mary, who wanted very little persuasion, consented, even without the knowledge of her council, to marry the Spanish prince.

As soon as this proposed match was known in England, there was a general outcry against it: the Catholics were displeased, and the Protestants thrown into a perfect fury. The former feared that England was to be subjected to Spain, and the latter that the dreaded and infamous tribunal of the Inquisition would be introduced into this country. At that time Gardiner was averse to this marriage, and joined the council in remonstrating against it. The House of Commons, also, sent their Speaker, and a deputation of twenty members, to present an address, praying her majesty not to marry a foreigner. The address was presented on the 17th of November. The queen rebuked the deputation for presuming to dictate to her on the subject of her marriage; those of her predecessors having always been free—a privilege she was determined to maintain, while she would make such a choice as would contribute to her own and her people's happiness.

On the 6th of December the queen dissolved the parliament; and soon after an embassy left Brussels for London, where it arrived on the 2nd of January, 1554: its purpose being to arrange the terms of the matrimonial alliance between Mary and Philip.—On the 11th of January, the chancellor, Bishop Gardiner (who had withdrawn his opposition), met a numerous assembly of nobility, prelates, and courtiers, in the queen's presence-chamber, to explain the terms of the treaty which had been entered into; and which were very fair and moderate. Though Philip was to have the title of King of England, the royal power was to rest entirely in the hands of the queen. It was agreed that no Spaniard should possess any office in this country; that no alterations should be made in the national laws, customs, or privileges; that Philip should not take the queen abroad without her consent, nor any of her children without the consent of the nobility; and that if the queen outlived Philip, she should receive a jointure of £60,000 per annum, secured on lands in France and Flanders. It was also arranged, that if the queen had a son, he should inherit, besides England, both Burgundy and the Low Countries; and that, if Don Carlos, Philip's son by his former marriage, should die, Mary's children, whether male or female, should inherit Spain, Sicily, Milan, and all the other dominions of Philip. The courtiers approved of these articles, as a matter of course, but the aversion of the people was not to be overcome. They said that the Spaniards were the most tyrannical and cruel people in the whole world; and that Philip was a sullen, proud, overbearing barbarian, whose object was to make England merely a province of Rome. They admitted the conditions were reasonable enough; but they would not believe that Philip had any intention of observing them after he had obtained the title of king.

These feelings were so strong and so general throughout the country, that insurrections broke out, at the same time (January, 1554), both in Kent and Devonshire. The one in Kent was headed by Sir Thomas Wyatt; that in Devonshire by Sir Peter Carew. Their object was to resist the landing of Philip in England, and thus prevent his marriage with the queen. Carew's insurrection was soon suppressed by the Earl of Bedford; and he himself was glad to save his life by escaping into France. Wyatt was a bolder and more able man, and a great multitude flocked to his standard. The queen sent the old Duke of Norfolk against the rebels, who had taken Rochester Castle. When the duke reached Rochester Bridge, he found it so well defended, that instead of fighting, he sent a herald with a proclamation of pardon to all who would go quietly to their homes. But Wyatt was too wise a leader to permit this proclamation to be read; and Norfolk ordered his troops to advance to the assault. Amongst them were 500 Londoners, led by Captain Brett, who, when his troops had reached the bridge, suddenly stopped short, and thus addressed them:—"Masters! we go about to fight against our native countrymen of England, and our friends, in a quarrel unrightful and wicked; for they, considering the great miseries which are like to fall upon us, if we should be under the rule of the proud Spaniards, are here assembled to make resistance to their coming; for the avoiding of the great mischiefs likely to alight, not only upon themselves, but upon each of us and the whole realm; wherefore I think no English heart ought to say against them."

This speech had the intended effect: the Londoners shouted, "A Wyatt! a Wyatt!" and went over in a body to the rebels. The old duke was so much astonished at this unexpected desertion, that he turned and fled, while many of the royal troops followed the example of the Londoners, and joined the insurgents.

In the meantime Sir Thomas Wyatt marched on towards London, in hopes that the citizens would rise in his favour. The rebels reached Deptford on the 1st of February, and advanced to Southwark on the 3rd, where they rested, and did no mischief except plundering Bishop Gardiner's house there. The people were kindly disposed towards them; but the Londoners drew up the draw-bridge, and would not admit them into the city. The queen then, with great courage and determination, went to the Guildhall, attended by a numerous train, and declared, before the Lord Mayor, and a body of the citizens, that she had no intention of marrying in any other way than her council should consider honourable and advantageous to the country; and therefore she hoped all her true subjects would enable her to repress any rebellion on that account.

After the rebels had remained two days in Southwark, the Tower guns opened a fire upon that place, and the people implored Wyatt to go somewhere else. Not wishing them to be hurt on his account, he led his followers, on the 6th of February, to Kingston, and crossing the bridge there, turned back to London on the left bank of the Thames. Many of the rebels, despairing of success, deserted him and returned to their homes; and by the time he reached Hyde Park, a royal army had been collected there to oppose him. This force was greatly superior to Wyatt's, whose men were fatigued and dispirited. Still he determined to fight his way through the queen's troops, and get to London, the inhabitants of which city he yet vainly hoped would declare in his favour. He and about 400 of the rebels succeeded in this bold attempt, but the rest fled; and notwithstanding that he fought with the courage of desperation, he was taken prisoner, and his followers put to flight; though some hundreds of them were afterwards captured.

Wyatt was executed as a traitor, but not till the 11th of April. The saddest part of the business was, that no less than 400 other persons were hanged for being concerned in this rebellion. A number of others were led into the presence of the queen, with halters round their necks; but her thirst for revenge was satisfied, and she pardoned them. It had been rumoured that the Princess Elizabeth and the Earl of Courtney were secretly connected with this insurrection, and Mary gave orders for their arrest. Perhaps, as no evidence could be obtained against the former, and Sir Thomas Wyatt declared, upon the scaffold, that she had no share or knowledge of his rebellion, it was thought better to restore her to liberty; but she had to remain a long time at Woodstock, under surveillance. Courtney, after an imprisonment of some weeks in the Tower, was removed to Fotheringay Castle.

Though Elizabeth escaped, this rebellion sealed the doom of Lady Jane Grey and her husband, Lord Guildford Dudley. This hapless young couple had been tried as traitors, on the 13th of November, by a special commission at Guildhall. Cranmer was tried at the same time, and all pleaded guilty. Condemned to death, Mary granted them a respite, and Dudley and Lady Jane were treated with lenity and even kindness. Indeed, their lives would, no doubt, have been spared, but that Jane's incapable and foolish father, who had been released from the Tower and pardoned by the queen, had the folly and ingratitude to rise in arms the moment he heard of Wyatt's rebellion. His object was to depose Mary and restore his daughter to the throne; but he was soon captured, tried, condemned, and finally executed. The rebellion, instead of raising his daughter to the throne, sent her to the scaffold; for Mary now thought that Jane's death was the only means of preventing insurrection and disorder upon her account. Accordingly, the queen signed a warrant for the execution both of her and her husband. Lady Jane received the warning to prepare for death with heroic resignation: she had been expecting it, and was prepared. The bigoted Mary sent Fecknam, afterwards Abbot of Winchester, to disturb the last hours of her victim, by attempting to convert her to the Catholic church; but Jane argued with him with much sense and spirit, and was not to be moved. Fecknam at last left her, saying he was sorry for her fate, for he was sure that they would never meet in heaven. The spirited girl replied, that was certainly true, unless it pleased God to turn his heart.

The 12th of February, 1554, was the day appointed for the execution; that of Lady Jane being directed to take place within the walls of the Tower, on account of the compassion it was expected her fate would excite among the people. On that sad morning her husband desired to see her, that they might speak to each other for the last time. Jane would not consent to this interview; but sent him word that the pain of parting would overcome their fortitude. She added, that their separation would be but momentary, and that they would soon rejoin each other in a place where neither death, disappointment, or misfortune could disturb their eternal happiness.

Lord Guildford was first led to execution on Tower Hill: he was taken past Jane's window, from which she handed him some little token of affectionate remembrance. She even beheld his dead body brought back in a cart, not only without fear, but without apparent emotion: for her the bitterness of death was past; and she longed for that repose which was only to be reached through the dark passage of the grave. Sir John Gage, the constable of the Tower, then led her to the scaffold prepared for her death on the green within the walls of the fortress. The ladies who attended her wept bitterly; but she was calm. Sir John shared in the general sympathy for her fate, and begged some little present, which he might keep as a memorial of her. She gave him her table-book, in which she had just written three sentiments, on seeing the headless body of her husband; one in Greek, another in Latin, and a third in English. The meaning of them was, that though human justice was against his body, divine mercy would be favourable to his soul; that if her fault deserved punishment, her youth and her inexperience were excuses for it; and that God and posterity, she trusted, would show her favour. After ascending the scaffold, she addressed the spectators in a brief speech, making no complaint against any one; but declaring that she was innocent of any treasonable desires. She said she had sinned in loving herself and the world, on which account she was brought to so sad an end; but she thanked God, who had given her time for repentance, and desired the people around to assist her with their prayers. She then tied a handkerchief over her eyes, and groping forward to the block, exclaimed, "What shall I do? where is it?" An attendant guided her to it, when she laid down her beautiful head, and had just time to say, "Lord, into thy hands I commend my spirit," when the axe fell, and her troubles were at an end for ever. She had not completed her seventeenth year. "Her death," says an old writer then living, "was as much lamented as her life had been admired. It affected Judge Morgan, who had pronounced the sentence, so much, that he became insane, and thought she perpetually followed him. The queen herself was troubled at it; for it was rather a reason of state than private resentment that induced her to sign the death-warrant of one whose virtues she must have envied and admired."

Other executions arose out of Sir Thomas Wyatt's fatal insurrection, which it is not necessary to particularise; and it also led to an act of great tyranny. A certain gentleman, named Sir Nicholas Throckmorton, who had been a friend of Wyatt's, was tried on the 17th of April, at Guildhall, on suspicion of being concerned in the rebellion; but he defended himself so well that the jury acquitted him of the charge. The servile judge who sat upon the bench knew that the queen desired to put Throckmorton to death, and he refused to receive the verdict; and even when the jury confirmed their verdict, notwithstanding the threats of the judge, that wicked officer, instead of liberating the prisoner, sent him back to the Tower, to see if something else could not be got up against him. The upright jury were then summoned before the arbitrary court of the Star-Chamber, to answer for having honestly discharged their duty as Englishmen. Four of them having been terrified into asking pardon, were permitted to depart; but the other eight, after having been kept six months in prison, were fined, six of them, £1,000, and the other two, who spoke more boldly than the rest, £2,000 each. These fines were afterwards reduced, because the victims were unable to pay them; but it seems wonderful that such wicked injustice and extortion did not provoke another insurrection.

All this violence did not make the people submit quietly to the queen's approaching marriage with Philip of Spain, or to her arbitrary proceedings in restoring the Romish church. The feeling of the nation broke out in various ways. One morning, a cat, with its head shaved, and dressed in imitation of a priest ready to say mass, was discovered hanging on a miniature gallows at the Cross in Cheapside. The two forefeet of the animal were tied over its head, and a bit of round paper, like a consecrated wafer, placed between them, as though it were in the act of elevating the host. This silly, ridiculous, and useless frivolity, made the queen and bishops very angry: and Mary offered twenty nobles for the arrest of the offender, but without discovering him. Shortly afterwards, one Dr. Pendleton, a Catholic priest, was shot at and nearly killed while he was preaching at St. Paul's Cross; but no one would reveal the offender. Another strange event happened about this time. A poor girl, named Elizabeth Croft, used to lay concealed in the wall of a house at Aldersgate, in such a manner that she could speak to the passers-by without being seen. The citizens were astonished at hearing strange sounds come from the wall; and some of them said it was an angel, and others a voice from heaven. It used first to attract attention by an odd sort of whistling, and then, when a crowd was assembled, uttered some threatening predictions against the Romish church, the queen, and the Prince of Spain. The listeners, who quite believed this whistling and talking to be supernatural, gave it the name of the Spirit in the Wall. Elizabeth Croft, however, was detected, and very properly punished, by being made publicly to confess her imposition.

Mary was now eagerly expecting the arrival of her future husband, Don Philip. Though they had never yet seen each other, she was struck with a violent affection for him: she complained of his cold delay, and said, that although she brought him a kingdom as a dowry, he had been so neglectful as never to have sent her a single letter. This woman, who was so indifferent to the sufferings of others, worried herself ill with her anxious fears for the safety, and her desire for the arrival, of her careless lover. On perceiving that her nervous anxiefy was adding to the wrinkles that already appeared upon her pallid brow, she was filled with a new fear that when Philip met her he might entertain a dislike for one whose good looks were not only impaired by grief and time, but were still further injured by sickness. She went so far as to fit out an English squadron to fetch Philip from Spain; but the admiral appointed to command it, told her that he feared the life of the hated Spanish prince would not be safe in the hands of her sailors. Mary dismissed the idea therefore, and left Philip to proceed to England in his own ships.

CHAPTER LVII.

CONCLUSION OF THE REIGN OF QUEEN MARY.—A.D. 1554—1558.

AT length, on the 19th of July, 1554, the queen's expected bridegroom arrived at Southampton. On the 23rd, Mary met him at Winchester, where they were married, on the 25th, by Gardiner. They remained in that city a few days; and, on the 5th of August, were at Windsor, where a meeting of the Knights of the Garter was held; and Philip, having received the insignia, took his place as sovereign of the order. They entered London in great state, in August; but the chroniclers do not agree as to the day; and there, at Whitehall, they held their court. It soon appeared that Philip was not the sort of man to win the affections of the English: he was exceedingly proud and haughty; and so cold and reserved in his manners that he scarcely deigned to take any notice even of the most distinguished nobles of the land. To this Mary had no objection; for she was so fond of him that she scarcely liked him to be out of her sight; and so extremely jealous that she could hardly bear him to speak to any other woman. Philip, however, cared very little for her: ambition was his ruling passion; and his object in marrying was, that he might become sole master of England.

On the 12th of November, the queen assembled a parliament, which she took great pains to have made up of persons quite devoted to her will. The first thing this parliament did, was to repeal the act by which the King or Queen of England was made supreme head of the church. Neither Lords nor Commons had any objection to that, so long as those who had obtained possession of the church lands were allowed to keep them. They were ready to pass any act the queen required, if she did not touch their pockets. Cruel and bigoted as Mary was, she was far better than her degraded nobles and parliament. She was sincere in her religious professions, and they were not. She restored to the church all the abbey lands which had been seized and annexed to the crown by her father, although the sacrifice threw her into a state of extreme poverty; but her nobles would not give up a rood of the land that had been stolen from the church, though they were quite ready to change from Protestants to Catholics to win the smiles of their superstitious queen.

After Mary had resigned her title as supreme head of the church, the parliament, on the 27th of November, presented an address to her, in which they declared that they were exceedingly sorry for the state of heresy they had been living in, and implored her and Cardinal Pole (who, on the 14th, had arrived in England as the pope's legate, and was then seated under the same canopy with Mary and Philip) to intercede with their holy father, the pope, for their forgiveness and absolution.—As England had been very profitable to the pope, he was glad enough to grant his pardon; and, accordingly, he directed Cardinal Pole to revoke all papal curses that had been pronounced upon the parliament and the people, and to receive them back again as penitent members of the church.

Being thus reconciled to the pope, the parliament proceeded to revive all the old savage laws against heretics which had been repealed during the reign of young King Edward; and it was also made treason either to imagine or attempt the death of the queen's husband, Philip. But when Mary wished the parliament to permit Philip to wear the crown with her, or to declare him king in case of her death, it refused consent. Though so pliant on almost everything else, the parliament hated the Spaniards bitterly, and was as firm as a rock upon that point.

Mary was very anxious to have a son to succeed her; for she thought that, by having him educated as a strict papist, she could bind the nation to the church of Rome, even after she was dead. At length, in April, 1555, she fancied she was about to present her husband with an heir, and public thanks were offered up to the Almighty for so great a blessing—as it was called. A magnificent cradle was prepared for the little stranger, and arrangements made for his education; but, after some time, it was found out that no little prince was coming, and that the queen was only ill of the dropsy.

The spirit of the English people, though terribly sunk and degraded, was not actually crushed; and several members of the House of Commons, who were too honest to approve of the acts of that assembly, and too weak to oppose them with any success, kept away from the parliament altogether. This the queen considered as obstinate disloyalty; and when the parliament was dissolved, she ordered these members to be proceeded against. Some of them submitted, and were pardoned after the payment of heavy fines: but the others defended themselves; and the queen died before the long law proceedings, which arose out of the affair, were ended.

In the year 1555, Queen Mary began to show the cruel bigotry of her nature in earnest. She had sent, the previous year, ambassadors to Rome to confirm the reconciliation of England with the pope; and then appointed a commission of priests to search out and punish all Protestants, or, as she termed them, heretics. This commission was opened on the 28th of January, in the church of St. Mary Overy, Southwark, and at the head of it was the bitter, passionate Gardiner, Bishop of Winchester. John Rogers, a prebendary of St. Paul's, who had been in prison for more than a year, was first brought before the commission. Bishop Gardiner took great pains to make him recant, but without being successful. "My lord," said Rogers, "I cannot believe that you yourselves think in your hearts that the pope is supreme head in forgiving of sin, seeing that you and all the bishops of the realm have now for twenty years preached to the contrary." Rogers was examined three times before the court, and as he remained true to the principles of the reformed church, he was condemned to be burnt to death as a heretic.

Early in the morning of the 4th of February, 1555, Rogers was aroused from his sleep by the wife of his gaoler, and warned to prepare himself for death, as he was to be burnt that day. Instead of showing any fear, he answered, that then he need not take pains in dressing himself. On his way to Smithfield, Woodroofe, one of the sheriffs, asked him if he would revoke his abominable doctrines; to which he answered, "That which I have preached I will seal with my blood." "Then," continued the sheriff, "thou art an heretic." "That will be known," replied the martyr,

"at the day of judment." "Well," continued this pitiless sheriff, "I will never pray for thee." "But I will for thee," was the noble and touching answer. At the stake, Rogers' wife and eleven children (the youngest a little infant yet clinging to its mother's breast, and smiling in happy ignorance of its father's cruel fate) were brought before him, and a pardon was offered him if he would recant. Even in that awful moment, and under such temptations, he subdued the pleadings of nature, and preferred death to apostasy.

Rogers was the first who was burnt in Mary's reign for holding Protestant opinions; being the earliest victim of a long and terrible list of martyrs. On the 8th of February, Laurence Saunders was burnt at Coventry; and, on the 9th, the learned Bishop Hooper was led to the stake, in his own diocese at Gloucester. While he was on his knees in prayer, a box was placed before him, and his pardon laid upon it, which he was told he might have if he would recant; but he answered, "If you love my soul, away with it—away with it." His sufferings were very great; for by some accident there were not sufficient faggots, and the wind blew the flames away from his body. Three times was the fire relighted, and for three-quarters of an hour did this good man remain in mortal agony. The description of his sufferings is too shocking for repetition. May the Almighty restrain our rulers from ever again committing a crime so awful!

The day that Bishop Hooper was thus cruelly put to death, Dr. Rowland Taylor was burned in the town of Hadleigh, in Suffolk. When he was brought before Bishop Gardiner on a charge of heresy, that stern bitter man said to him, "Art thou come, thou villain? How darest thou look me in the face for shame? Knowest thou not who I am?" "Yes," replied the courageous preacher, "I know who you are: you are Dr. Stephen Gardiner, Bishop of Winchester, Lord Chancellor, and yet but a mortal man. But if I should be afraid of your lordly looks, why fear you not God, the Lord of us all? How dare ye, for shame, look any Christian man in the face, seeing ye have forsaken the truth, denied our Saviour Christ and his word, and done contrary to your own oath and writing? With what countenance will ye appear before the judgment-seat of Christ, and answer to your oath, made first to King Henry VIII., of famous memory, and afterwards to blessed King Edward VI.?" Bishop Gardiner must have blushed at this reproof; but he pretended that he did not mind it, and answered, "Tush! tush! that was Herod's oath, unlawful, and therefore worthy to be broken. I have done well in breaking it; and I thank God I am come home again to our mother, the Catholic church of Rome; and I wish thou shouldest do so also."

Dr. Taylor was not to be moved either by the abuse or persuasions of Bishop Gardiner, nor by the promises both of pardon and promotion in the church, if he would recant his opinions. When bound to the stake, just as the flames were rising up around him, a brutal fellow threw a faggot at his face, upon which this truly Christian martyr meekly exclaimed, "O friend, I have harm enough; what needed that?" He then began to repeat the 51st Psalm in English, when Sir John Shelton, who was standing by, struck him on the lips, saying, "Ye knave, speak in Latin, or I will make thee." Taylor then bore his sufferings in silence; and soon one of the guards, in mercy, gave him a blow on the head with his halberd, and ended his agony.

Instead of this horrible severity putting down heresy, as it was called, it served only to increase it; and the fires of martyrdom were lighted all over the kingdom. Bishop Gardiner, disgusted with the butcher's work he had taken up, resigned his task into the hands of Bishop Bonner, of London, a man of so brutal a character, that he seemed to delight in the infliction of torture and death. Among other atrocities, he whipped a poor child (the son of a tailor, accused of heresy) in so unmerciful a manner, that it died a few days afterwards. During this year (1555), in England, as many as seventy-one persons, of various ranks of life, were burnt to death at the stake for opinion's sake. To relate many of these shocking events would be only to excite feelings of pain and horror; and the sad fate of a few of the most distinguished victims only will be alluded to, that the reader may have some idea of the atrocities which, in that age, were perpetrated under the name of religion.

Robert Farrar, Bishop of St. David's, was burned at the town of Carmarthen, in Wales. His supposed offences were, his being married, and denying the doctrine of transubstantiation. His courage and trust in God for support were so great, that he told a person who lamented his fate, that if he saw him shrink from the fire that was to consume him, to give no credit to his teaching. Accordingly he stood amidst the flames like a statue, and neither uttered any cry, nor gave any sign of suffering. This so provoked one of his tormentors, that the fellow struck him on the head with a staff, and the heroic bishop fell dead amidst the fire.

But the two most famous victims of priestly intolerance, during this year, were Bishops Ridley and Latimer. The former had been Bishop of London, and the latter, Bishop of Winchester; but for some time they had been living in prison, because they would not deny the truth. They were put to death at Oxford, on the 16th of October, 1555, a day which has been, in consequence, regarded with a certain reverence by all admirers of patient heroism and true piety. Ridley walked to the place of execution in a black furred gown with a velvet tippet, such as he used to wear when he was a bishop. Latimer, who was a white-haired and very old man, tottered along in a shroud which had been made for the occasion, and which he wore outside his ordinary dress. On arriving at the stake, Ridley embraced his fellow-sufferer, and tenderly said to him, "Be of good cheer, brother, for God will either assuage the fury of the flame, or else strengthen us to abide it." One Dr. Smith then preached a sermon, exhorting them to recant and be saved, taking for his text the words, "Though I give my body to be burned, and have not charity, it profiteth me nothing." It was a cruel mockery in this bigoted man even to utter the name of charity at such a time; that sacred spirit was far, very far away. As the executioner approached with a lighted faggot, the venerable old Bishop Latimer said to his companion, "Be of good comfort, brother Ridley, and play the man; we shall this day light such a candle in England, as I trust shall never be put out." On the fire being applied, Latimer soon expired: but Ridley suffered for a long time; for the faggots which surrounded him would not burn freely. Many of the spectators shed tears, as well they might; and hundreds went away, secretly hating a church which could sanction such barbarities. Indeed, Mary and her priestly advisers may be truly said to have burnt a love and respect for the Roman religion out of England.

The month following these cruel persecutions, Bishop Gardiner, who had been the chief enemy of the reformed religion, went to his last account, "hated," says an old writer, "of all good men." He had attempted to put down Protestantism with severity, and to terrify the people of England into a blind unreasoning submission to popery. But the human mind is not to be controlled, and truth cannot be hid for ever. Gardiner heaped sin after sin upon his soul; made his memory infamous for ever; and yet helped the very cause he laboured all his life to destroy.

Queen Mary's husband, Philip, was hated very much on account of the constant burnings of the best and most conscientious Protestants. At first he pretended they were done without his wish; but, as nobody believed this, he threw off the mask, and he and his miserable and gloomy wife endeavoured to bring the Inquisition, with all its horrors, into England. The bishops' court, over which Gardiner had presided, did not do its work of terror quickly enough; and in spite of imprisonment and burnings, the number of Protestants was increasing faster than ever. A sort of Inquisition was therefore appointed, which, had Mary lived long enough, might have grown as hideous and fearful as the horrible tribunal of that name which existed in Spain. Twenty-one priests were named as an ecclesiastical commission, to inquire into and punish heresy. Their duties were—to arrest all persons who sold or had any books about the reformed doctrines; to punish every one who was guilty of any misbehaviour or negligence at church or chapel; to try all priests that dared to preach any principles except those of the church of Rome; and all persons that did not hear mass, or come to their parish church to service, or that would not walk in religious processions, or objected to take holy bread or holy water.

In order to obtain information, spies and informers were encouraged; and directions were given to the justices of the peace to send men watching and prying about, that they might get up accusations against any one who was incautious enough to say a word against the papal tyranny which ground the people into the dust. Commands were also given to put all accused persons to the torture if they would not confess! Every villain who hated his neighbour might accuse him of some act of heresy, and betray him to imprisonment or even death. But it is to the credit of the English of that age, that all this spying and treachery was against their nature; and justices and others stood aloof, and avoided executing the orders of the council. During the year 1556, the number of martyrs who suffered at the stake amounted to eighty-three; in the following year, eighty-eight; and in 1558, forty more perished in this shocking manner, besides those who were punished by imprisonment, fines, and confiscations. Indeed, at this time, a horrible fashion for religious persecution prevailed throughout Europe; and shocking as were the deeds done in England, worse were performed elsewhere. In a few years, in the Netherlands alone, the awful number of 50,000 persons were hanged, beheaded, burnt, or buried alive on account of religion. In Germany, and in France also, martyrs were to be counted by thousands. Still, in England, criminals were terribly on the increase, and executions for robbery and murder very frequent.

In August, 1555, before persecution had got to such a height in this country, Philip returned to his native land. Soon after, his father, the Emperor Charles V., who, for forty years, had been the greatest sovereign in Europe, becoming sick of power and royalty, resigned his kingdom to his son, and retired to spend the remaining years of his life in tranquil retirement at the monastery of St. Just, on the frontiers of Castile and Portugal. It is said, that when he gave his regal authority into the hands of Philip, he shed tears as he thought of the awful resposibility he had imposed upon him. In his retirement he spent his time in cultivating a little garden, in reading works on religion, and in making clocks. Although he had, all his life, sternly resisted the progress of the Reformation, in his solitude he is supposed to have become rather favourable to its principles. Having observed that he could never make two watches that would go exactly alike, he was grieved at the blood he had shed in the vain attempt to make all mankind think alike on the subject of religion.

The English parliament, which met on the 21st of October, 1555, offended by the terrible persecutions inflicted on the people, refused the queen a part of the supplies she demanded, and showed so much dissatisfaction that she dissolved it. She then fell into a deep melancholy, in consequence of the absence of her husband; and she passed her time in writing letters to him, which he seldom answered; in weeping over her own wretchedness; and in urging on the cruelty practised against her Protestant subjects. She felt that almost every one hated her, and she began to hate almost every one. God will not permit tyrants and bloodshedders to be happy or tranquil: a dreadful sense of weary heaviness hung upon the occupant of England's throne, poisoned every enjoyment, and slowly wasted away her hateful life. Indeed, throughout England, there was scarcely one poor labourer's or mechanic's wife that was not happier than her queen.

Mary was very poor; and she adopted harsh and arbitrary ways of getting money; most of which she sent to her husband, or the priests at Rome. Her rapacity interfered with commerce, and made the merchants afraid to engage in speculation; so that trade languished; many rich men became poor, and poor men became destitute; and yet this was a time when the queen had very little need of money, for England was at peace with all neighbouring countries.

Though Cranmer had been kept in prison when Bishops Ridley and Latimer were sent to the stake, the queen had no intention of sparing his life. She hated him too bitterly for that; for, besides being the chief Protestant of the kingdom, he had pronounced the divorce of her mother, Queen Catharine, from the fickle Henry VIII. She and the priests, by whom she was surrounded, wished to cover him with disgrace and contempt, and then send him to a horrible death. For this purpose, say the Protestant writers, they practised upon him in a shockingly treacherous manner. After degrading him from the priesthood, they placed him in easier confinement, and surrounded him with persons who constantly argued with him, and entreated him to recant and save his life. They gave him hopes that he should be restored to his dignity as archbishop, and said, that if he would only put his name to a paper, confessing the errors of his faith, the queen would easily grant him either riches or dignity, or a private life in retirement. They told him he was not so old but that many years might yet remain to him of this life; and they exhorted him to accept a pardon while it was offered him, as he might afterwards seek for it when he could not obtain it. Finally, they told him, that if he cared little for life, he should remember that to die is grievous at all times, especially in the ripeness of age and flower of dignity; but that to die in fire and torment was most grievous of all. These entreaties so prevailed upon the fallen archbishop, and the fear of a hideous death so appalled him, that he signed a recantation of the Protestant faith, and an acknowledgment that the pope was the only supreme head of the church, and that the bread and wine in the sacrament was really transformed into the body and blood of the Saviour. According to Strype, none of these interviews with priests took place; and when it was proposed, in the council, to offer Cranmer a pardon, on recantation, as well as Latimer and Ridley, it was refused, as he had brought so much evil on the church. The recantation was voluntarily penned in the hope of pardon.

Whichever of these accounts be the true one, the recantation was written, and sent to Cardinal Pole, who had it immediately printed and distributed, to the great sorrow of all good Protestants, who were much grieved that Cranmer should fall away from the truth; and to the joy of the papists, who looked upon it as a triumph over heresy. Their writers say that the archbishop even signed six recantations, at different times. The denial of the truth did not save his life. His execution was determined upon; Mary signed the fatal warrant; and sent orders to Dr. Cole, of Eton College, to prepare the archbishop's condemned sermon. On the 21st of March, 1556, Cranmer was brought, in an old ragged gown, into St. Mary's church at Oxford, and placed on a platform near the pulpit. Dr. Cole then commenced his sermon, and explained, that repentance did not do away with all punishment; and that Cranmer's offences were so great, that he must suffer death both as a traitor and a heretic. He then attempted to comfort the wretched primate, telling him to die with patience and with hope; for that he would soon receive the same reward as did the crucified thief, to whom the expiring Saviour said, "This day shalt thou be with me in Paradise." Then, out of St. Paul, he armed the archbishop against the terror of the fire by saying, "The Lord is faithful, and will not suffer you to be tempted above your strength." He also spoke of the three children to whom God made the flame to seem like a pleasant dew, of the rejoicing of St. Andrew on his cross, of the patience of St. Lawrence on his bed of fire; and assured Cranmer, that if he died in the Roman faith, the Lord, if he called upon him, would abate the fury of the flame, or give him strength to abide it. He then thanked God for the archbishop's conversion, which, he said, had been quite willing and voluntary; and assured him that, after his death, there should be dirges and masses performed in all the churches of Oxford for the succour of his soul.

During this sermon, Cranmer, who had believed that, having recanted, he should be permitted to spend the remainder of his life in peace, sat the very image of misery. Sometimes he raised his hands and eyes to heaven, as if imploring for that mercy which seemed to be banished from the earth, and then, letting them fall again to the ground, shed floods of tears. At the end of the sermon, he was required to confess his errors to the congregation before he was carried away to death. This was too much: the old prelate had lived for years in fear of the dreadful fate which had overtaken him; but now that he saw it was unavoidable, he mustered courage, and met it boldly. Instead of declaring his submission to the pope, and his belief that the reformed religion was a heresy, he said that his recantation was forced from him by fear; that his principles were unchanged; that the pope was Antichrist; and that his offending hand which had signed the recantation, should be first consumed in the fire in which he was to perish.

The popish priests were disappointed and vexed enough at this unexpected change. They burst into a storm of indignation; and Dr. Cole roared out, "Stop the heretic's mouth, and take him away." Accordingly, Cranmer was hurried off to the same place where Ridley and Latimer had suffered, and where preparations had been made for his execution. Stripping himself to his shirt, he was bound to the stake with a chain of iron, and the pile of faggots lighted. Timidly as he had lived, he died like a hero. He did not even flinch from the flames, but held forth his right hand, with which he had signed his recantation, in the midst of them, until it was all consumed, frequently exclaiming, "This unworthy right hand!" At length the fire crackled and blazed around him with great fury; and raising his eyes, he exclaimed, in the words of the first martyr, Stephen, "Lord Jesus, receive my spirit!" and expired. Thus died Cranmer, in his sixty-seventh year; and his death, instead of being a triumph to the papists, was a blow to their principles. His martyrdom purified his fame, and made men forget his weakness and duplicity, and esteem his memory as that of a champion of the Protestant cause. Men would have thought more honourably of him, if, in the time of his prosperity, he himself had not been a persecutor; but when we think of his sufferings, it is difficult to forget those of John Lambert and Joan Bocher.

The day after Cranmer's martyrdom, the queen's relative, Cardinal Pole, was made Archbishop of Canterbury; but though he was a man of a gentle disposition, he was unable to check the fury of the queen's advisers against heretics. In less than three months after that legal murder, as many as thirteen persons were burnt to death together, at Stratford-le-Bow, on account of their religious opinions.

Early in the year 1557, Mary's husband, King Philip, returned to England for a short time. His object was to persuade the queen to assist his plans by declaring war against France. Though willing to oblige him in almost anything, Mary hesitated in this, especially as all her ministers were against it. Philip then told her, that unless she consented, he would never look upon her face again. Mary was terrified, and threatened to dismiss her councillors: but still they remained firm. Chance, however, brought about the fulfilment of the queen's wishes. An English gentleman, named Thomas Stafford, who had fled from his native country, and taken refuge in France, landed at Scarborough in April, 1557, with only thirty-two persons, and attacked the castle there. He entertained the mad idea of producing a revolution; but, as may be supposed, he and all his comrades were taken prisoners. Stafford and a few others were executed on the 25th of May, and the rest pardoned. Before his death, he confessed that he had been set on by the French king: this was considered sufficient; and war was accordingly declared against France on the 6th of June.

Mary was so poor that she scarcely knew how to collect an army. First, she compelled the citizens of London to lend her £60,000—very much against their will: then she extorted other loans from her people; and, because she had not provisions for her troops, seized, without payment, upon all the corn she could find in Suffolk and Norfolk. At length she managed to collect about 10,000 men, who joined the Spanish army; and Philip having got what he wanted, left England on the 6th of July, never to return.

Philip's army, altogether, amounted to 60,000 men; and with it he gained a great victory over the French at St. Quentin. When the news reached England there was much rejoicing; and Mary especially was delighted at the success of her husband. She had, however, very little cause for gladness. The French general, the Duke de Guise, though foiled by King Philip, was a brave man, and he resolved on a plan which should restore the honour of his troops, and inflict a blow upon the English. This was no less than retaking Calais; which it had cost the warlike Edward III. nearly a year to become master of, and which had been in the possession of the English for more than two centuries.

Calais was considered impregnable; and as wars were never carried on during the winter, the garrison at that season was always reduced. Though the attack of the Duke de Guise was sudden, Mary had warning of it; but her treasury was empty: she had no soldiers; her fleet was in ruins; and her people had been fleeced so much already, that they would pay no more. Calais, therefore, was left to its fate. The Duke de Guise set down before the town about the last day of 1557. On the 2nd of January, 1558, the castle of Ruysbach, and on the 3rd, the castle of Newenham Bridge, were taken. On the 6th the citadel was bombarded; on the 7th the town surrendered. To the mortification and disgrace of the English, and the joy of the French, the lilies again floated over the walls, and the 4,000 English inhabitants were expelled. Struck with shame, Mary sent a few ships to attempt to recover the town; but the very elements seemed bent against her; the vessels were dispersed by a storm, and compelled to return home without doing anything.

Soon after the loss of Calais, Mary Stuart, the young and beautiful Queen of Scots, was married to Francis, the eldest son of the French king. The ceremony took place at Paris, on the 24th of April, 1558, Mary being only in her 16th year, and Francis a few months younger.

When the English parliament met, on the 20th of January, 1558, Queen Mary applied for money, that she might make another attempt to recover Calais, or else revenge its loss. Poor as the nation was, the parliament liberally responded to the queen's demand, and she fitted out a considerable fleet of English and Flemings. This fleet, after plundering and burning many places on the coast of Brittany, and causing a great deal of misery to the unoffending people who lived there, assisted an army of Spaniards at the seaport town of Gravelines, in Flanders, and enabled them to obtain a decided victory over the French. A great slaughter occurred; and the English fleet, satisfied with the revenge it had taken, returned home.

The Princess Elizabeth, during all this time, had resided principally at Woodstock. She lived in retirement, saw very little company, meddled in no business, spent her time in reading and study, and appeared to be a sincere Catholic. She had a little chapel in her house, where the service of the Roman church was constantly performed. She kept several priests among her attendants; had a large crucifix hung up in her bed-room; and even worked garments for saints and Madonnas; and whenever she visited the court, she attended the queen in all her religious processions.

It is impossible to say whether Elizabeth was really, at this time, a papist or Protestant in her belief. Her conduct was very doubtful; and although she afterwards restored the Protestant religion, it must be remembered, that as the pope refused to acknowledge her as queen, it was her interest to do so, and that she found the nation generally leaning to the reformed doctrines. On many occasions she showed an attachment to the ceremonies of the Romish church; and if she could have had her own way, would probably have followed a religion half-way between that and Protestantism. Indeed, cruelly as she afterwards persecuted the Catholics, she was never herself a very sincere Protestant. It has been supposed that she would have remained an adherent of Rome, had she thought that religion would retain its influence on the minds of the people. Perhaps she did not attach much importance to the forms of either side, but believed that a sincere and devout prayer, or a grateful thanksgiving, would be equally acceptable to the Almighty, either from a papist or Protestant. A curious story is related of her, which, if true, seems to imply that, at least on the important subject of the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, she held the reformed opinions. It is said, that some one who had been set to trap her in her speech on the subject of religion, inquired what she thought of the words of Christ—"This is my body!" and whether it was the real body of the Saviour that was in the sacrament. It is reported, that after a little reflection, she replied in the following cautious and ingenious lines:—

"Christ was the word that spake it:
He took the bread, and brake it;
And what the word did make it,
That I believe and take it."

The time was now fast approaching for the termination of Mary's short inglorious reign—a reign terrific from the persecution which raged throughout a great part of it.—The queen had long been in a declining state of health; and about the beginning of September, 1558, she was confined to her room. What her exact disorder was, is not known: some said it was a tympany—a kind of flatulent disease that puffs up the body like a distended bladder; and which caused the queen, in October, again to think she was enceinte. Others said it was a hot and cold fever—a name given to an illness then very prevalent. Whatever it was, she lay in her bed in a sad state, continually sighing. Her council begged to know the reason of her sorrow, and asked, if it was on account of the absence of her husband, King Philip? Her answer was—"Indeed that may be one cause; but that is not the greatest wound that pierces my oppressed mind." What that wound really was she would not reveal; though afterwards, when some of her favourite attendants told her that they feared she grieved on account of King Philip's absence from her, she exclaimed, "Not that only; but when I am dead and opened you shall find Calais lying in my heart."

Mary was prematurely old: she had always been of a delicate constitution; and now her strength was consumed by her gloomy temper.—On the 5th of November, parliament assembled; and on the 7th, the Speaker was summoned to her chamber, when she informed him that negotiations for a peace between England, France, and Spain, were opened at Cambray. She languished a few days longer, in pain and sadness; and on the morning of the 17th of November, between the hours of five and six o'clock, expired. She was nearly forty-four years old, and had reigned for five years, four months, and a few days. In her last moments mass was performed in her chamber, and she expired in a vain endeavour to bow at the elevation of the consecrated wafer. During her reign, nearly 300 persons perished in the flames on account of their religion. Foxe, in his Book of Martyrs, says there were 284; a second old writer says 277; and a third calculates them at 290. Some historians, however, suppose that many other victims perished, whose fate has not been recorded.

Mary's persecution of the Protestants has obtained for her the familiar soubriquet of the "Bloody Queen." There can be no doubt, however, as a modern writer, William Howitt, observes, that, "with all her bigotry, and the horrors to which her concession to the persecuting spirit of her Spanish husband brought upon the country, she had many good and amiable qualities; and had she reached the throne when no religious strife existed, would, probably, have left a name regarded with much kindness by posterity." She was certainly obstinate, bigoted, and superstitious; but she was also firm, courageous, and sincere; and merciful, where religion was not concerned. She was generous to her own, which she believed to be the true, church; charitable to the poor; and careful to avoid burthening her people for her personal expenditure. She was also very anxious that the law should be honestly administered; and was attentive to the interests of trade. Her understanding was narrow, but her education had been liberal, for she was mistress of five languages—English, Latin, French, Spanish, and Italian. She was also fond of music; and, before she came to the throne, played upon three instruments—the virginal, the regal, and the lute. Inexpensive in her habits, her court was strictly moral; and her few personal attendants appear to have been attached to her. All her unpopularity with posterity arises from the terrible religious persecutions of her reign; and the persecuting spirit was, unfortunately, not confined to Mary, nor to those who professed her creed. It was the spirit of the age; and when the Protestants were in power, they were not free from it. In Mary's case, the sea of blood that spirit caused to be shed, has done much to efface the memory of her good qualities; and has caused her to be regarded, unjustly we firmly believe, as one of the worst sovereigns that ever sat on the throne.

CHAPTER LVIII.

THE REIGN OF QUEEN ELIZABETH.—A.D. 1558, 1559.

IT is pleasant to turn away from the dreadful horrors which were perpetrated in England during the time of Mary, to become acquainted with the events which took place in the long reign of Elizabeth, who was a great and wise ruler; though, as will be seen in the course of the narrative, she was not a good and amiable woman. But England progressed so much under her reign, that she has been considered one of our best and greatest sovereigns.

The parliament was sitting at the time that Mary died; and Heath, the Archbishop of York, and Chancellor of England, attended to inform the members of that event on the day it took place. They looked a little serious at first, just for form's sake, and then burst into a shout of "God save Queen Elizabeth!—long and happy may she reign!" The council had her accession proclaimed on the same day; and the people showed much greater joy than the parliament: the air rang with cheerful shouts, and the streets were lit by the blaze of bonfires.

Elizabeth was living in retirement at Hatfield when she received the news of the death of her sister, under whom she had lived in constant fear. Her delight was too great for concealment, and, falling upon her knees, she exclaimed, "It is the Lord's doing, and it is marvellous in our eyes." This was the only allusion she made to her past fears and sufferings. She was generous and prudent enough to forget all offences received from the late queen. Her first act, after her arrival in London, was to order the relief of all prisoners confined for religious offences.

At first, Elizabeth was very cautious about religion, and took care not to let anybody see whether she was a Catholic or a Protestant. It was fortunate for her that she did so, or the Catholics might have offered a powerful opposition to her accession to the throne. As it was, both sides courted her, in the hope that she might promote their peculiar views. Although the Protestants believed that she had a secret attachment to the reformed church, the papists seemed to have had very little suspicion that she was not a devout Catholic, especially as she commanded the funeral of her sister Mary to be conducted according to the solemn and gorgeous rites of the Roman church.

On her accession, Elizabeth was in her twenty-fourth year; and although not beautiful, she was loved for the graces, insinuations, and condescending familiarity of her manner. Her coronation took place on the 15th of January, 1559. It was a very magnificent ceremony; but what was much better, there was a great deal of honest rejoicing on the part of the people. One thing, however, attending the ceremony was very remarkable; all the bishops, except one, refused to crown her. That one was Dr. Oglethorpe, the Bishop of Carlisle. She had been declared illegitimate by the church of Rome; and that, it has been supposed, was the reason of the strange conduct of the bishops, or that they were acting under secret orders from the pope. Perhaps they suspected she intended to declare against the Roman church, and so wished to prevent her from ascending the throne. At any rate, their refusal to crown Elizabeth was the most unwise thing they could do; as it was calculated to cause her to imbibe a dislike to the Catholic form of religion, if she did not already entertain it.

Elizabeth retained the services of eleven of the late queen's councillors; but she appointed eight new ones of her own choice. These men were all secretly in favour of the Protestant religion, though they had been prudent enough to remain silent upon that point, and go with the times. Amongst them was that wise statesman Sir William Cecil, who had long been Elizabeth's adviser, and whom she now created her Secretary of State. He afterwards became very famous under the name of Lord Burleigh. Another was Sir Nicholas Bacon, an eminent lawyer, who, besides being a member of the council, was made keeper of the great seal. His name has been rendered illustrious by the wonderful talents of his son Francis, afterwards Lord Bacon, the profound thinker, and reformer of modern philosophy. Indeed, Elizabeth always had the discernment to appoint men of talent and great business qualities for her advisers; and she had the tact never to let them gain an ascendancy over her. By her shrewd sense and strong will she kept them her servants, and never permitted them to assume a tone of equality. A good deal of the stern dictatorial character of her father, Henry VIII., is to be seen in the conduct of this remarkable queen.

She frequently consulted with her new councillors, but particularly with Sir William Cecil, about the national religion; and that sagacious minister assured her, that the greater part of the nation was inclined to the Reformation, and was constantly becoming more and more so. Although pressed by her Protestant subjects to declare her opinions on the subject of religion, Elizabeth still hesitated to do so. An incident soon occurred, however, which decided her upon this point. Having sent news of her coronation to the pope at Rome, that pontiff, who was a very haughty and obstinate old man, returned an insolent message, that he considered her as illegitimate, and that she ought to lay down her crown, and await his decision as to whether she should be queen or not. This conduct, added to that of her bishops, made Elizabeth turn her back on the church of Rome, and resolve to establish the reformed religion in England.

The queen assembled her first parliament on the 21st of January, 1559. To that parliament she very wisely left the settlement of the national religion; merely giving them to understand what were her wishes upon the subject. It was soon seen that the Commons, at least, were attached to the Protestant faith. They passed an act for suppressing the monasteries erected in Mary's time, and for restoring tenths and first-fruits (taxes paid to the Romish church out of the clerical revenues, by the priests of that church) to the crown. They declared that the queen, and not the pope, should be supreme head of the English church; though they gave her the milder and much more appropriate title of governess. To enable her to exercise her ecclesiastical authority, her majesty was authorised, by one clause of this act, to appoint a commission of either laymen or clergymen, or both—a clause which led, some years after, to the establishment of the Court of High Commission; a tribunal which became as obnoxious as the Star-Chamber, from its arbitrary proceedings. The bishops opposed this law with all their might; but it was carried in spite of them. Then all the laws made for the regulation of religion in the reign of Edward VI. were restored; the mass was abolished; and it was decreed that the Book of Common Prayer, in English, should be used in all churches, to the exclusion of any other. Some parts, however, of that book that were very offensive to the Catholics were softened down a little. Thus, as far as parliament was concerned, the Protestant religion was re-established in England, and the Romish form once more overthrown. There was to be much struggling, and a good deal of persecution yet, before the nation would altogether submit to the change. Upon the Catholics rests the odium of being the most savage and bitter persecutors; but the Protestants are by no means free from that shocking taint, or rather crime. It must also be admitted that there would have been a great deal more Protestant persecution, if Elizabeth and her ministers had not checked that cruel spirit.

During the time that parliament sat, a solemn discussion was appointed by the queen, to be held between the chief divines of the Protestant and those of the Catholic faith. Sir Nicholas Bacon presided, and ten bishops and doctors on each side conducted the debate. The Protestants then contended for the three following points:—"First. It is against the word of God and the custom of the ancient church to use a tongue (that is, a language) unknown to the people in common prayer, and in the administration of the sacraments. Second. Every church hath authority to appoint, take away, and change ceremonies and ecclesiastical rites, so the same be to edification. Third. It cannot be proved by the word of God, that there is in the mass offered up a sacrifice propitiatory (that is, of a conciliatory or atoning kind) for the quick and the dead." As the Catholic bishops hesitated, and would not go on with the discussion, it was declared that the Protestants were entirely triumphant, and some of the former were even punished by imprisonment. But it was almost impossible that a debate of this kind should be fairly conducted; for, as it was known that the queen and parliament were now both adverse to the papists, it was not likely that they would dare to press their opinions very vehemently; as, to deny that the queen was head of the church, as a Catholic must do, was not only to lose all chance of preferment, but to incur the charge of being a traitor.

One bitter-minded and obstinate prelate did indeed suffer the fate of a traitor, for uttering his bigoted opinions too freely. He said that he had been much talked about on account of his persecuting and burning the heretics; but instead of regretting it, he was only sorry he had not been more severe. He added, "that he had earnestly exhorted his associates on that subject, and had been not a little grieved with them; for that they laboured only about the young and little sprigs and twigs, while they should have stricken at the root, and clean have rooted it out." It was very well understood what this bold speech meant. Elizabeth was the root of the Protestant principles; and Dr. Story hinted, that if his advice had been followed, she would have been rooted out (that is, put to death) during the reign of Mary. Aware of the danger his bigotry had led him into, Dr. Story fled for safety to Antwerp; but the queen was not the woman to permit such treasonable language to pass unpunished. She employed some men to seize him by force, and bring him over to England, where he was executed as a traitor. This conduct on the part of Elizabeth was very despotic; but the queen was determined to show the Catholics, in the outset, that though she was but young, she would submit to neither intimidation nor insult.

Before the parliament was dissolved, the House of Commons sent a deputation of its members to Elizabeth, with an address, in which they begged her to marry, so that, in due time, she might have a son to succeed her on the throne. Although this address was written in very flattering language, she seemed rather displeased at it. She told the Speaker, who headed the deputation, that as the application was made in general terms, and only recommended her to marry, without pretending to direct the choice of a husband, she could not be offended at it, or consider it otherwise than as a new instance of their affectionate attachment to her. But, she added, any further interference on their part would ill become them to make as subjects, or her to bear as an independent princess. Even while she was a private person, she had always declined marriage, and regarded it as an incumbrance; but that now, when the charge of a great kingdom was committed to her, she considered it a duty to persevere in that opinion. Her life ought to be entirely devoted to promoting the interests of religion, and the happiness of her subjects. As England was her husband, so all Englishmen were her children; and while she was employed in rearing or governing such a family, she could not deem herself childless, or her life useless and unprofitable. If she ever thought of changing her condition, the care of her subjects' welfare would be uppermost in her thoughts; but should she live and die a virgin, she believed that Divine Providence would be able to settle all dispute about the succession, and send them a sovereign who would imitate her example in loving and cherishing her people. She concluded a long speech by saying, that she desired no better remembrance of her to be transmitted to posterity than that this inscription should be engraven on her tomb—"Here lies Elizabeth, who lived and died a virgin queen."

The decisions of parliament in favour of the Protestant religion were soon put into force; as the new statutes, enforcing the oath of supremacy, and the use of the Book of Common Prayer, came into operation on the 24th of June, 1559. The bishops and principal churchmen were summoned before the queen and her council, and admonished to make their clergy conform to the laws which had just been enacted. The churchmen were not inclined to comply either with the royal will, or to the changes in religion required by an aroused nation. Cardinal Pole was dead; but Archbishop Heath, who had been made primate in his stead, reminded the queen of her sister's late reconciliation with Rome; of her own promise not to change the religion which she found by law established; and added, that his conscience would not permit him to obey her present commands. What the archbishop said, all the other bishops said; but the queen and her ministers were resolved to have their own way.

The bishops were then required to take the oath by which the pope was disclaimed, and the queen acknowledged as supreme head of the church on earth—called the oath of supremacy. Nothing, however, could induce them to give up their submission to the pope: they all refused the oath except one; and all, except that one, were deprived of their sees. At that time, however, a recent sickness that had been very prevalent had reduced the number of bishops to fourteen, and small pensions were conferred upon them, that they might not be left destitute. Many other dignitaries of the church were also deprived of their livings because they would not take the oath; but the great majority of the clergy took it, and conformed to the reformed ceremonies of the church. The places of the bishops were filled up by the most learned of those divines who had been driven from the church during the reign of Queen Mary. The Protestant religion was thus actually re-established throughout the kingdom, and with much less difficulty than might have been imagined.

All this was well enough; but besides the act of parliament which obliged all clergymen to take the oath of supremacy, there was another act, called the Act of Uniformity, which was meant to extirpate the Catholic religion by making every one worship God in the same uniform way; that way, of course, being the Protestant one, which the parliament had established. It not only abolished the mass and other Romish rites, but punished those who used them as if they had been criminals. For the first offence, they were to forfeit all their property; for the second they were to be imprisoned for a year; and, for the third, condemned to pine away in prison until death released them from their sufferings. Those, also, who did not attend the Protestant church on Sundays and holidays, were to be fined 1s. for every time they omitted going. This was a petty, teasing kind of persecution, which irritated the Catholics very much. It was not politic either; for while the papists were permitted to attend their own churches, the queen could tell who were Protestants and who were papists—that is, who were loyal subjects, and who were not. Now all were mingled together; and she could no longer tell the sincere Protestant from the compelled hypocrite, or the loyal man from the would-be traitor.

Queen Elizabeth was not altogether to be blamed for this intolerant spirit on the part of the Protestants. It did not originate with her, but with the clergy and the people. Although she permitted it to a certain extent, she and her ministers took a great deal of trouble to keep it within bounds. On one occasion, two Protestant bishops wrote to the queen's council, that a priest had been apprehended in a lady's house, and that he would not take an oath to answer any questions that might be put to him, saying, naturally enough, that he would not accuse himself. These two Protestant prelates proposed to put this obstinate priest to the torture. The council very honourably refused to sanction any such proceeding. These incidents show that violent and uncharitable people, whatever be their principles, will hate and try to injure those who differ from them; and also, that, although in the matter of persecution the Catholics were as red as blood, the Protestants were far from being as white as snow.

But while Elizabeth checked the triumphant spirit of the Protestants, and prevented its running into wild excesses, she also kept down the Catholics with a hand of iron. Towards the end of the year 1559, five of the deposed bishops (among whom was Bonner, who had so often gloated over the agonies of the victims whom he had sent to the stake in Mary's time) gathered courage to present what they called a petition to Elizabeth. It was, however, much more like a reproof than a petition. After praising her sister Mary as the pattern of a religious woman, it called upon Elizabeth to follow her example, without loss of time, and prayed that God would turn her heart and preserve her life, and also make her evil advisers ashamed and repentant of their wicked heresies. Perhaps these prelates thought that, as the queen was but a young lady, not more than five-and-twenty, they could awe or intimidate her. If so, they were greatly mistaken; for they soon found that Elizabeth had temper and spirit enough for a dozen ordinary young ladies. Colouring with rage, she answered in a very stern tone, telling them to be careful what they did, lest they should provoke the punishment provided by the laws for all who impugned her royal authority and prerogative. The bishops retired: but they were not to escape so easily; for, soon after, they were all committed to prison. The infamous Bonner, who was detested by all humane persons of either religion, remained in confinement with his own dark, bitter thoughts, for nine long years, and then he died. It would have been a happy thing for the country if he had never been born. The other offending bishops were set at liberty and provided for.

During the first year of her reign, Elizabeth had received an offer of marriage from Philip of Spain, the widower of her late sister Mary. Philip was wealthy, powerful, and a king; but he was hated by the English; and although the queen took care not to offend him, she very prudently declined the alliance.

The public religion being settled, Elizabeth turned her attention to foreign affairs; and a general treaty of peace between England, France, Spain, and Scotland, was concluded at Cateau-Cambresis, on the 2nd of April. The queen was very anxious to get back the city of Calais, which had been taken by the French in the latter part of her sister's reign; but she was persuaded by her ministers to abandon it so long as she could save her honour. It was therefore agreed that the French king should restore Calais at the expiration of eight years; and that if he failed to do so, he should forfeit 500,000 crowns, and the queen's right to the city should still remain. This was, in reality, an abandonment of Calais; for statesmen believed (as it afterwards turned out) that Henry of France would find some excuse both for keeping the city and for not paying the money. However, Elizabeth's honour was saved, and peace was established in Europe. After all the dreadful scenes that had so lately occurred in England, together with the decay of commerce, and the increasing poverty of the people, peace was needed for the recovery of its prosperity; and the young, fair-haired, spirited Queen of England had acted wisely in securing it; and would have done so even if it had cost her far more than the troublesome and unnecessary city of Calais.

CHAPTER LIX.

CONTINUATION OF THE REIGN OF QUEEN ELIZABETH.—A.D. 1559—1561.

IT will now be necessary to direct our attention to Scotland, to the change of its religion, and to the affairs of its young queen, Mary Stuart, or, as she is commonly called, Mary, Queen of Scots.

Mary had a title to the English throne—a title which the Catholics said was superior to that of Elizabeth's. It was grounded upon her descent, through her father, from Margaret Tudor, one of the sisters of Henry VIII. The Princess Margaret married King James IV. of Scotland, who was killed at the battle of Flodden Field, and left his queen the mother of an infant prince. In time this prince became James V., and married a French princess, called Mary of Guise, who brought him a daughter, who grew up to be the beautiful and fascinating Mary Stuart. Had Elizabeth been illegitimate, as the Catholics pretended, Mary was the true heir to the English crown. But though Henry VIII.'s marriage with the unfortunate Anne Boleyn was somewhat irregular, and contracted in defiance of the pope's decision against its lawfulness, still, unprejudiced people must believe that it was a lawful marriage, both in the sight of God and man. This being so, Elizabeth was the legitimate daughter of Henry VIII., and consequently had an unimpeachable title to the throne.

Mary, when scarcely sixteen, was married, as already mentioned, to Francis, the eldest son of the French king. That monarch thought it would be an excellent thing if he could obtain the kingdom of England as well as that of France for his son; and he directed him and his daughter-in-law, Mary, to assume the arms and title of King and Queen of England. Elizabeth was naturally offended at this assumption, and she directed her ambassador to complain of it. The French king answered, that as the Queen of Scots was descended from the royal blood of England, she was properly entitled to assume the arms of that kingdom. This only increased Elizabeth's anger; and from that time she felt a violent jealousy of her ambitious cousin, Mary.

On the death of Henry II. of France, which took place on the 10th of July, 1559, Mary and her husband, Francis, ascended the throne of that country as king and queen; her mother, Mary of Guise, acting for her in Scotland as regent.

It is not to be supposed, while such a struggle had been taking place in England about religion, that people were indifferent or quiet upon that subject in Scotland. The reformers there were excited by the fearful tales of persecution which they heard from England, and a zealous and even bitter dislike of the Romish church spread among the people. Some of the principal Protestant nobles of Scotland had, on the 3rd of December, 1557, drawn up a bond of union, and formed an association called "The Congregation of the Lord," to distinguish them from the established church, which they named the Congregation of Satan. All the members of this association bound themselves to devote their lives and fortunes to maintain and establish the reformed religion, and to have faithful preachers truly and purely to minister Christ's gospel and sacraments to His people. Those members were termed, in the history of the times, "Lords of the Congregation."

The Catholic priests became much alarmed in consequence of the spread of this association; and Mary of Guise, the regent of Scotland, cited the most eminent of the Protestant preachers to appear at Stirling on the 10th of May, 1559, and give an account of their conduct. The preachers obeyed the summons; the nobles and their retainers accompanied them; and, when they reached Perth, one of the former—Erskine of Dun, proceeded to Stirling, to explain to the regent the motives of their assembling. Mary assured him, that if the nobles would discharge their followers, the preachers should be unmolested, and the summons to meet at Stirling discharged. The followers were immediately sent home; upon which the regent renewed the summons; and when it was not obeyed, proclaimed the preachers as rebels. This instance of bad faith enraged the people, who had nearly all embraced the reformed religion, and made them resolve to dispute the regent's authority even by force of arms, and to oppose the priests of the established religion to the very last.

Among the Scottish reformers was a bold and vehement preacher, named John Knox—an honest and sincere man, but bitter in his sentiments, and ferocious in his conduct. He had been banished from Scotland, and had resided for some time at Geneva; but had returned to his native land on the 2nd of May. On the 11th of May, he preached a sermon at Perth, against what he called the idolatry and other abominations of the church of Rome. His discourse was so fierce and eloquent that the people were excited to a strange degree of violence and enthusiasm. The sermon ended, most of the congregation left the church, but a few remained to talk upon the subjects on which the preacher had touched. A priest seized the moment to uncover a shrine by the altar, and to expose a repository of images and relics. An altercation took place between him and some of the bystanders, which ended in their attacking the priest, and breaking his images to pieces. They then overthrew the altar, tore the pictures to pieces, broke the sculptured fonts, scattered the consecrated vases, and left the church a ruin. Not satisfied with this work of destruction, they pillaged and then pulled down several magnificent neighbouring monasteries. This furious spirit soon spread to other places; and many abbeys and churches were left mere heaps of ruins. Knox encouraged all this sad havoc, saying, that the best way to prevent the crows from returning was to break up their nests. These furious destroyers of the popish monasteries and churches were called Iconoclasts, or destroyers of images, in consequence of the number of stone and wooden saints that they broke in pieces.

The queen-regent was so enraged at this violence, that she collected an army to punish the impious rebels and heretics—as she called them. The lords of the Congregation collected another army and stood on their defence. They sent an address to the regent, and another to the Catholic clergy. They told Mary of Guise, that if they were persecuted by those cruel beasts, the churchmen, they would apply to some foreign prince for assistance; that they were her faithful subjects in all things not opposed to the law of God; and they signed themselves—"The Faithful Congregation of Christ Jesus." Their address to the church was far more violent: and it was directed "to the generation of Antichrist, the pestilent prelates and their shavelings, in Scotland." In it these fierce reformers said to the priests—"As ye by tyranny intend not only to destroy our bodies, but also of the same to hold our souls in bondage of the devil, subject to idolatry; so shall we, with all the force and power which God shall grant unto us, execute just vengeance and punishment upon you: yea, we shall begin that same war which God commanded Israel to execute against the Canaanites—that is, contract of peace shall never be made till you desist from your open idolatry, and cruel persecution of God's children. And this—in the name of the eternal God, and of his Son Christ Jesus, whose verity we profess, and whose gospel we have preached, and holy sacraments rightly administered—we signify unto you to be our intent, so far as God will assist us to withstand your idolatry. Take this for warning, and be not deceived."

The queen-regent sent her forces against the insurgents; there was some fighting, generally in favour of the latter, who entered Edinburgh in triumph on the 29th of June, and the regent took shelter in the castle of Dunbar.

In this condition Mary of Guise received money and a reinforcement of troops from France; and news arrived that her brother was collecting an army in Germany to reduce the reformers to submission. The Scottish nobles were alarmed: they had not the money to support a regular army, and their followers were deserting for want of pay. Such was their position when they resolved to apply to the Protestant Queen of England for assistance.

Here was an opportunity for Elizabeth to punish Mary, who was now Queen of France, for assuming the royal arms of England. But it was not spite alone that made Elizabeth support the violent reformers of Scotland against their government and their church. It was a cautious policy, perhaps an over-cautious policy; but one which many writers have thought wise. The French had a constantly increasing army in Scotland, and were secretly aiming at obtaining the mastery of the whole country. Supposing them to be successful, a queen of both France and Scotland, who had also a claim to the crown of England, was a dangerous neighbour. If the Protestants were crushed in Scotland, there was very little doubt the Catholics would try to place Mary Stuart on the throne of England; and, in that case, the safety not only of Elizabeth, but of the Protestant religion in England, depended on the turn of affairs in Scotland.

The negotiations with Elizabeth continued through the latter half of 1559; during which time a French force arrived, and there was much fighting with varied success. At length, on the 27th of February, 1560, Elizabeth concluded a treaty at Berwick with the lords of the Congregation, for mutual defence. It was to last during the marriage of Mary Stuart with the French king, and for a year afterwards. She had, before this, sent them secret assistance, in the shape of sums of money; but she now openly sent both a fleet and an army to aid them. The fleet, which consisted of thirteen large ships of war, was sent to the Frith of Forth; and the army, consisting of 8,000 men, was assembled at Berwick. The French court offered immediately to restore the city of Calais to her, if she would not interfere in the affairs of Scotland; but Elizabeth answered proudly, that she would never put a fishing-town in competition with her dominions; and she ordered her fleet and army to commence hostilities.

The French troops in Scotland were ravaging the county of Fife, when the English made their appearance. As the French were not half so numerous as the English, they took refuge in Leith, and protected themselves by fortifications. In April, the English, assisted by an army of Scottish reformers, attacked the place with much fury; and after two skirmishes, in which the French fought bravely, they were reduced to great distress. Still they held out, and the siege was converted into a blockade; the English endeavouring to starve the garrison into a surrender. But two events that occurred induced the French garrison to yield before the grim spectre of famine made its appearance within the walls of the town. The first was the dispersion, by a storm, of a fleet which was bringing an army to their assistance; and the second was the death of Mary of Guise, the queen-regent, which took place on the 10th of June.

On the 6th of July a peace was restored by the signing of the "Treaty of Edinburgh," as it was called, and then Leith was surrendered, and abandoned by the French. By this treaty France recognised the right of Elizabeth to the English throne; and agreed that Mary and her husband should no longer assume the royal title or arms of England. The affairs of Scotland were to be placed in the hands of a council of twelve nobles of that country, of whom the Queen of Scots should choose seven, and the parliament five. No foreign troops were in future to be brought into Scotland without the full consent of the parliament; and a pardon was to be granted for all past offences. As to religion, it was agreed that the parliament should report its wishes upon that subject to Mary and her husband, and that some arrangement should be entered into respecting it. Thus, though Elizabeth obtained what she wanted, the cause for which the Scottish lords made war upon their government remained unsettled.

Immediately after the French had left Scotland, the parliament of that country assembled. It met on the 1st of August, 1560, and very memorable work it did. The lords of the Congregation immediately presented a petition, in which they demanded that their own religion should be made the established one of the country, and that the Catholics should be suppressed and punished. This was very unjust and intolerant; for they would not allow to the Catholics that liberty of conscience which they insisted on for themselves. The parliament shared the spirit of the reformers, or, as a popular writer says, they "seem to have been actuated by the same spirit of rage and persecution." They abolished the ceremony of the mass utterly, not only in all public churches and chapels, but they would not permit it to be celebrated in private houses. It was declared to be not only an error but a crime; and whoever officiated in it, or was present at it, was condemned to be punished—for the first offence with confiscation of goods and imprisonment; for the second, with banishment from Scotland; and for the third, with death. This atrocious law was almost as bad as anything the papists would have done; but it was not all that these fiery Protestants did now that they had the power. They voted that the authority of the pope in Scotland should be abolished; that bishops and the other dignitaries of the church were limbs of the devil, and agents of papal superstition and tyranny; and that, for the future, the PRESBYTERIAN form of religion should be established in Scotland. The tone of the reformers frightened all the bishops away from their seats in parliament; for they very naturally felt they were not safe there. The members, desirous that their conduct should appear quite legal, summoned the bishops to attend; and as no notice was taken of this summons, the parliament voted that the prelates were satisfied with the new constitution of the church. When the parliament had proceeded to this extent, they sent a messenger to France to tell their queen what they had done, and obtain her sanction of their measures. Mary, as a devout Catholic, was not likely to be pleased at their violent reforms; she received the messenger with coldness, and refused her assent. However, the reformers, who did not care much for her refusal, resolved to have their own way. They put their laws into practice; abolished the mass, plundered the monasteries, took possession of the greater part of the revenues of the church, and appointed their preachers to all livings.—Thus was popery destroyed in Scotland, and a new form of worship built upon its ruins. The change was a great and good one; but the manner in which it was made, unjust, furious, and unchristian.

On the 5th of December, 1560 (a few months after the change of the national religion in Scotland), Mary's husband, the young King of France, died. Thus, after a reign of seventeen months, she was no longer Queen of France; and she resolved on returning to her native land, and devoting herself to its government. Before doing so, she directed D'Oysel, her ambassador, to apply to her cousin Elizabeth for a safe-conduct across the seas into Scotland, and to permit her to pass through England, if it should be necessary. Elizabeth's jealous dislike to Mary was so extreme that she refused this trifling request; and refused it, too, in coarse and angry language—very unbecoming to her high station. The reason she gave for this rude conduct was, that Mary had declined to ratify the treaty of Edinburgh. The Scottish queen had given up wearing the royal arms of England; but she very justly refused to abandon her claim to the throne of England in the event of the death of Elizabeth.

When her cousin's answer was brought to Mary by Sir Nicholas Throckmorton, the Scottish queen was extremely indignant; and, after ordering her attendants to leave the apartment, she made the following spirited remarks, which we will insert entire, because they show something of the character of that extraordinary woman:—"How weak I may prove, or how far a woman's frailty may transport me, I cannot tell: however, I am resolved not to have so many witnesses of my infirmity as your mistress had at her audience of my ambassador, D'Oysel. There is nothing disturbs me so much as the having asked, with so much importunity, a favour which it was of no consequence for me to obtain. I can, with God's leave, return to my own country without her leave; as I came to France, in spite of all the opposition of her brother, King Edward: neither do I want friends both able and willing to conduct me home, as they have brought me hither; though I was desirous rather to make an experiment of your mistress's friendship, than of the assistance of any other person. I have often heard you say, that a good correspondence between her and myself would conduce much to the security and happiness of both our kingdoms. Were she well convinced of this truth, she would hardly have denied me so small a request. But perhaps she bears a better inclination to my rebellious subjects than to me, their sovereign—her equal in royal dignity, her near relation, and the undoubted heir of her kingdoms. Besides her friendship, I ask nothing at her hands. I neither trouble her nor concern myself in the affairs of her state: not that I am ignorant that there are in England a great many malcontents, who are no friends to the present establishment. She is pleased to upbraid me as a person little experienced in the world. I freely own it; but age will cure that defect. However, I am old enough to acquit myself honestly and courteously to my friends and relations, and to encourage no reports of your mistress which would misbecome a queen and her kinswoman. I would also say, by her leave, that I am a queen as well as she, and not altogether friendless; and perhaps I have as great a soul too; so that methinks we should be upon a level in our treatment of each other. As soon as I have consulted the states of my kingdom, I shall be ready to give her a reasonable answer; and I am the more intent on my journey, in order to make the quicker despatch in this affair. But she, it seems, intends to stop my journey; so that either she will not let me give her satisfaction, or is resolved not to be satisfied—perhaps on purpose to keep up the disagreement between us. I have not been wanting in all friendly offices to her; but she disbelieves or overlooks them. I could heartily wish that I were as nearly allied to her in affection as in blood; for that indeed would be a most valuable alliance."

Perhaps Elizabeth never received a better schooling than was contained in this biting speech; but, though it vexed her extremely, she did not profit by it. Indeed, it was not the sort of language fitted to encourage friendship, or remove the jealous feelings that already existed between the two queens.

It was during the lovely month of August, of 1561, that Mary Stuart embarked to return to her native country. France had been her home almost since her infancy, and she felt painful emotions of regret in leaving it. It is said that she kept her eyes fixed upon the coast until the night closed in and shut it from her gaze. As its dim outline was rapidly disappearing, she sat upon a couch on deck, frequently repeating, "Farewell, France, farewell! I shall never see thee more!" On arriving at Leith, where her majesty landed on the 19th of August, she was received by the people with enthusiasm; for her youth, beauty, and the gentleness of her manners won for her a general admiration. Besides, she was the only descendant of their ancient line of kings; and, on that account, the people were disposed to love her. Her first step was a very wise one: she issued a proclamation declaring her intention to maintain the Protestant form of worship which she found established, and forbidding any one to interfere with it on pain of death. She even sent for John Knox, and tried to win him to a quiet submission to her authority; but the rude zealot coarsely insulted her. He and the other reformers were resolved, not only that they would not go to mass themselves, but that their queen should not have the liberty of doing so.

The first Sunday after her arrival, there was a riot, in consequence of mass being performed in the palace at Holyrood. The people asked each other, "Shall we suffer that idol to be again erected within the realm?" One noble even shouted aloud, in the court-yard of the palace, "The idolatrous priest shall die the death!" Indeed, the uproar was so great, that it was with some difficulty the priest was prevented from being murdered at the altar's foot. While this was going on in and around the palace of the young queen, the preachers offered up prayers in the churches, that God would turn her heart, which was obstinate against him and his truth; or if his holy will was otherwise, that he would strengthen the hearts and hands of the elect stoutly to oppose the rage of all tyrants.

With much difficulty, Mary obtained from her subjects a sort of equivocal permission to hear mass in private. But the knowledge that she still adhered to the ancient religion of her ancestors, seemed to poison all feelings of affection and generosity that might otherwise have been felt for her. She was exposed to constant insults, especially from the preachers. But the violent fanaticism of John Knox was absolutely brutal: his conduct alone was sufficient to make Mary view with disgust the religion which he professed, and to make her adhere more strongly to the Catholic church. The usual name by which he alluded to her was that of Jezabel, although she was (at least as yet) a pure-minded, beautiful, and amiable girl. She tried to subdue his violence by the most gracious condescensions; but no gentleness could touch his sour, discontented, bitter nature. She promised him access to her presence whenever he desired it; and begged him, if he found her blamable, to reprehend her in private, and not vilify her in the church before all the people. The bigot only answered, that if she pleased to come to church she would hear the gospel of truth; that it was not his business to apply to every individual, nor had he leisure to do so.

Knox was indeed quite as much a rebel as a reformer. If he had been an English subject, and had acted with half as much insolence to Queen Elizabeth, she would have sent him to the pillory, if not to the scaffold. On one occasion, he told Mary that he would submit to her as Paul submitted to Nero. Another time, he had the audacity to tell her that "Samuel feared not to slay Agag, the fat and delicate King of Amalek, whom King Saul had saved: neither spared Elias Jezabel's false prophets and Baal's priests, though King Ahab was present. And so madam," he added, "your grace may see that others than chief magistrates may lawfully inflict punishment on such crimes as are condemned by the law of God." Indeed, this man and the rest of the zealous preachers filled Mary's life with bitterness and sorrow. Her temper was naturally cheerful, and she was fond of gaiety; but these men condemned all innocent pleasures as crimes, and threatened her with God's judgment for indulging in them.

On one occasion, Knox was called in question for his conduct. While Mary was absent from Edinburgh, some ruffians broke into her chapel, defiled the altar, and behaved in a very riotous manner. Two of them were arrested and indicted for this offence. Knox immediately took up their cause, and wrote circular letters to the most furious Protestant zealots in each town, to arm for the defence of the two rioters. This was treason, and he was accordingly summoned before the council to answer for it. He knew that some of the council secretly hated the queen, on account of her religion, as much as he did; and this emboldened him to defend himself with his usual audacity. He told the queen, that the pestilent papists who inflamed her against those holy men (he meant the chapel-breakers), were the sons of the devil, and must, therefore, obey the directions of their father, who had been a liar and a manslayer from the beginning. This troublesome man was acquitted, and made still more violent by the triumph he had gained.

Here, for a time, we must leave Mary Stuart, and return to the affairs of England and Elizabeth.

CHAPTER LX.

CONTINUATION OF THE REIGN OF QUEEN ELIZABETH.—A.D. 1561—1566.

ELIZABETH soon saw that she had not much to fear from the Scottish queen, who possessed little or no power over her turbulent subjects. She, therefore, turned her attention to promoting the prosperity of her kingdom, and the happiness of her people. She was very careful with her money, and soon able to pay many of the great debts of the crown. The coin had been alloyed by her predecessors, and, in 1560, she restored it to its ancient purity. She imported great quantities of arms from Germany; and introduced into England the art of making gunpowder and brass cannon. She encouraged agriculture by allowing corn to be exported; favoured trade and navigation; and built so many ships, that she began to be called the restorer of our naval glory, and the queen of the northern seas.

The fame of Elizabeth, as a wise and powerful princess, soon spread abroad; and many foreign kings and nobles made her offers of marriage. Amongst them was Eric, the King of Sweden; Charles, the Archduke of Austria; the Duke of Holstein; and the Earl of Arran, heir to the crown of Scotland. Besides these princes, several of her own subjects humbly aspired to the honour of her hand; the most favoured of whom was a handsome but profligate young nobleman—Lord Robert Dudley, afterwards the notorious Earl of Leicester. Elizabeth had resolved to remain single; for she was too ambitious to share her power with any one: but she gave all her suitors such a gentle refusal, that they still had hopes of succeeding at last. This was a wise plan; for it kept them all devoted to her service: but it is very likely that the famous queen was also fond of the attentions and professions of attachment which she was frequently receiving from her would-be husbands.

With all her greatness as a queen, Elizabeth was a cold-hearted woman, and very vindictive towards those whom she disliked; and, about this time, she committed a mean and cruel act of tyranny. Lady Catharine Grey, a sister of the unfortunate Lady Jane who was beheaded by the orders of Queen Mary, contracted, in 1561, a secret marriage with the young Earl of Hertford. They were married privately, because the queen was known to entertain a jealous feeling of every one who was of royal blood; and the Lady Catharine was the next heir to the crown after Mary, Queen of Scots. Although they had committed no crime, or even offence, Elizabeth, on discovering the marriage, sent them both as prisoners to the Tower, declared their children to be illegitimate, and inflicted on the earl a fine of £15,000. They remained in prison till 1563, when they were removed, in consequence of the plague breaking out. The lady was always subjected to surveillance, but does not appear to have been actually imprisoned again; and she died on the 11th of January, 1568, at the house of Sir Owen Hopton, at Yoxford, in Suffolk. Still, Elizabeth could act with magnanimity. In 1563, Edmund and Arthur Pole, sons of the cardinal, were condemned to death for a treasonable design to place Queen Mary upon the English throne, and to change the religion of the country. The queen generously granted them the royal pardon. As they had been led into their design by the pretended predictions of some foolish astrologer, she caused the parliament, in the same year, to pass a severe law against prophecies, conjurations, enchantments, and witchcraft.

During this time, France was distracted with civil wars between the Catholics and the Protestants, who were there called Huguenots. [The term Huguenot is a corruption of the German Eidgehossen; which means "bound together by oath."] The Catholic party was led by the Duke of Guise, and the Huguenots by the Prince of Condé; and between the two, horror reigned from one end of the land to the other. The people seemed actually mad with religious excitement, and murdered each other with such a savage ferocity, that in all directions the ground was soaked with blood. The parliament of Paris added to the general misery by passing an act giving the Catholics permission to massacre the Huguenots, who, as might be expected, retaliated in a similar manner. "Wherever," says a famous writer, "the Huguenots prevailed, the images were broken, the altars pillaged, the churches demolished, and the monasteries consumed with fire: where success attended the Catholics, they burned the Bibles, rebaptised the infants, and constrained married persons to pass anew through the nuptial ceremony; and plunder, desolation, and bloodshed attended equally the triumph of both parties."

In this dreadful state of things, the Duke of Guise, in 1562, applied to Philip, the bigoted King of Spain, for assistance; who, as he entertained a bitter hatred to the reformed religion, readily gave it. The Prince of Condé then applied to Elizabeth for help, and offered to put her in possession of the important town of Havre-de-Grace, in return for it. The English queen consented; and after sending money and men to the Prince of Condé, Havre was given up to her on the 3rd of October, and garrisoned by a body of 3,000 of her troops. Elizabeth had two reasons for this: she wished to help the Protestants abroad, lest the Catholics should become powerful enough to molest her; and she thought Havre might prove as useful to her subjects as the town of Calais, which they had so recently lost. Soon after Elizabeth had assisted the Huguenots, a battle took place between them and the Catholics at Dreux. The Huguenots were defeated; but their party still kept up the struggle; and Elizabeth sent them 100,000 crowns, and offered to be security for as much more, if they could find merchants to lend the money.

As the queen's purse was empty, she again summoned her parliament. That body met on the 13th of February, 1563: its first act was to present another address to her, entreating her to marry. She had lately been suffering so severely from the small-pox, that her life was despaired of; and the Commons desired her to marry, that, in the event of her death, she might leave a son to succeed her. They reminded her of the sad civil wars that had arisen from the contending titles of York and Lancaster, and begged her to save them from the chance of such another calamity. But they added, that if her high mind was for ever set against matrimony, they entreated that she would permit her successor to be named and appointed by act of parliament.

Elizabeth was puzzled: to declare Mary the heir to her throne, was to gratify her rival, and to encourage the Catholics to hope that their form of religion might be restored in England; while to accept a husband was to act in opposition to her own wishes. In this difficulty she had recourse to that deception of which she was such a mistress. She told the parliament, that notwithstanding what she had said at the beginning of her reign, yet she had no fixed resolution never to marry; and that, for the sake of her people, she would endeavour to lay some solid foundation for their future security. At that very time a new suitor had made his appearance—the Duke of Würtemberg, a Protestant prince. The queen received his offer in a very polite manner; said, that though she was not tired of a single life, yet the care of her kingdom counselled her to avoid it. But that, as the welfare of her people depended upon her choice, it was necessary for her to make it with great care. In the end, she thanked the duke, and promised to deserve his good opinion. By this evasion she contrived to get rid of the application of the parliament, without giving any direct answer.

Having failed to induce the queen to marry, the parliament passed a severe law against the Catholics. It was called "The assurance of the queen's royal power over all states and subjects within her dominions." It decreed, that if any one twice asserted, either by writing, word, or deed, that the pope possessed any authority in England, the offender was to be punished as a traitor. All persons in holy orders were bound to take the oath of supremacy; and so were all members of parliament, officers of the court, schoolmasters, and persons in any authority; and the penalty of their twice refusing, was the hideous death of hanging and quartering. By a strange unfairness, no nobleman was to be subject to this law; as it was rather absurdly said, that the queen could have no doubt of the fidelity of persons of such high rank. Lord Montacute opposed this bill in the House of Lords, and said it was unnecessary, as the Catholics were loyal subjects, who obeyed the queen, and caused no trouble either by preaching or disputation; but suspicions were entertained of them, and the law passed. Having settled this business, the parliament voted the queen a supply of money, and then the house was prorogued.—The convocation of the clergy also voted the queen a considerable sum, that she might assist the Huguenots in France.—In this session of that clerical body, the thirty-nine articles of the church were finally adopted, in the form in which they are now published in the Book of Common Prayer.

On the 19th of March a peace was arranged between the Catholics and Huguenots, in consequence of the death of the Duke of Guise, who was assassinated by a young gentleman of the Huguenot faction, named Poltrot de Méré, on the 24th of February. By the terms of this agreement, toleration was granted to the French Protestants; and a general pardon published for all the violence that had been committed. The French had a great desire to recover the town of Havre, which the Huguenots had surrendered to Elizabeth as the price of the assistance she had afforded them. The Huguenots had promised not to make peace with the Catholics without her consent; but they had broken this agreement, and merely offered that if she would give up Havre, the money she had lent them, and the charges she had been at, would be repaid to her by the King of France; and that, at the end of the time promised, Calais should be restored to her. Elizabeth treated these offers with disdain; and sent the Earl of Warwick commands to defend Havre to the last, even against the whole power of France.

Warwick did his best: but he had scarcely 6,000 men within the walls of Havre; while the place was besieged, during the months of May, June, and July, by an immense army. The resistance was desperate, and the place was not taken without much bloodshed; two assaults, in the month of July, being repulsed with great slaughter. But the English garrison was attacked by another enemy, against whom arms and bravery were of no avail—the plague. The fatigue of the soldiers was so great, their food so bad and scanty, and this visitation of the plague so terrible, that sometimes 100 men a day died. At length, not 1,500 soldiers were left strong enough to do their duty; and the walls were shattered by the cannon of the enemy. In this condition Warwick was compelled to surrender: the sick and feeble garrison was permitted to march out; and Havre was lost to the English.

To increase this misfortune, the wretched soldiers carried the pestilence home with them, where it spread rapidly in many parts of the kingdom. In London alone, which did not contain a fourth of the people it does now, 20,000 persons died of it in the course of the year. At the same time, England was visited by other calamities: there was a great scarcity of food; violent storms of thunder and lightning; and, during the month of September, 1563, earthquakes were felt in several places. The Catholics declared that these things were signs of the Almighty's vengeance for the changes which the Protestants had made in religion.

As Elizabeth had been so unfortunate in her first war, she readily entered into a peace with France. Accordingly a treaty was signed at Troyes on the 11th of April, 1564, in which she agreed to give up the cause of the Huguenots.—During the latter part of the war, Mary, Queen of Scots, anxious, for many reasons, to obtain the friendship of Elizabeth, yielded her opinions to those of the English queen; and, for a time, these two sovereigns lived almost like sisters. Not only did they frequently write to each other, but it was proposed that they should meet at York, for the settlement of all differences between them. But this apparent friendliness was hollow. It is very unlikely that Mary felt any really kind feelings towards Elizabeth; and it is certain that Elizabeth entertained, upon all points, a jealousy of Mary. The meeting at York did not take place; and it is supposed that one of the chief reasons was, that Elizabeth did not like to be seen face to face with her more attractive rival.

Mary was desirous of marrying again; and her French friends wished to ally her to a Catholic prince who could strengthen their interest and weaken that of Elizabeth. Mary herself would have preferred a Catholic husband: but she knew that he would be hated by the Scottish people on account of his religion; and Elizabeth declared, that a marriage of that kind would be, in the highest degree, displeasing to her. She even told Mary that nothing would satisfy her but her marrying some English or Scottish nobleman—a match which would remove all grounds of jealousy between them, and cement the union between their kingdoms; and she offered, on this condition, to have her title examined, and to declare her the successor to the English crown.

The Scottish queen was so anxious to be declared Elizabeth's successor, that she consented to take, as a husband, any nobleman whom the English queen would recommend as a fitting match. Elizabeth really wished Mary not to marry at all; therefore, after a considerable delay, she named, in 1564, her own favourite, Lord Robert Dudley, now the Earl of Leicester. This man, though handsome and accomplished, was proud, insolent, and dishonourable, and was strongly suspected of having murdered his young and beautiful wife, because he believed that Elizabeth had an intention of raising him to share her throne. Mary knew very well that her royal cousin was not sincere in this proposal, and that she had no intention of parting with her favourite. Indeed, Elizabeth acted in so deceitful and whimsical a manner in this affair, that Mary sent her a rather angry letter.

For a short time the pretended friendship of the two queens was broken off; but Mary sent an ambassador to the English court to make all well again. This ambassador was Sir James Melville, a man of very agreeable manners and great powers of conversation. He had directions to insinuate himself into Elizabeth's confidence, and discover, if possible, her real sentiments towards Mary. He succeeded so well that the artful Elizabeth was thrown off her guard; and she showed that, strong-minded as she was, she possessed as much vanity and girlish jealousy as the youngest and most frivolous of her sex. Melville talked to her about his travels; of the various dresses worn by ladies in each country he had visited, and of the sorts which he thought most becoming. The queen, who was very fond of finery, replied that she had dresses of all countries, and every day she met the ambassador in a different costume. Once she asked which of them became her best? The courtier answered, the Italian. This answer greatly pleased Elizabeth; for she was fond of showing her long hair to advantage, which, though it was rather red than yellow, she thought the finest in the world. She then asked him what colour of hair was reputed best?—whether his queen or she had the finest hair?—and which of them he considered was the fairest person? These were delicate questions; but the clever courtier evaded them by saying that her majesty was the fairest person in England, and his mistress the fairest in Scotland. But this answer would not satisfy Elizabeth, who repeated her inquiry. Melville's answer was, that her majesty was of a more delicate complexion, but that his queen was very lovely. She then asked, which of them was the tallest? He replied, his queen. Then, rejoined Elizabeth, she is too tall; for I myself am neither too high nor too low.

Having ascertained from the ambassador that Mary sometimes played upon a musical instrument called the virginals, she gave orders to a nobleman of her court, that she should lead Sir James, as if accidentally, into a room from which he might hear her play. Drawing aside a tapestry, he beheld the queen sitting at her instrument, with her back towards the door. Entering the chamber, he stood still and listened; for she played remarkably well. When she saw him she seemed surprised, and left off directly. Striking him gently, in a coquettish manner, she said she was not used to play before men, but only when she was solitary, to shun melancholy. Then she asked him how he came there? The polite courtier answered, that as he was walking with Lord Hudson, he passed the chamber-door, and heard such delightful melody that he was drawn in before he was aware. Elizabeth, then sitting down upon a cushion, asked him which of the two played the best—she or the Queen of Scots? He replied, that he must give her the preference. These petty incidents are so far interesting as they show to what frivolous jealousies the otherwise strong-minded English queen could descend. When Sir James Melville returned to Scotland, he told his mistress that she could never expect any cordial friendship from Elizabeth, and that all her professions of kindness were full of duplicity.

As two years were passed, and Elizabeth had evaded the question of Mary's marriage, the Scottish queen began to think of choosing a husband for herself. Her councillors recommended her first cousin, Henry Stuart (Lord Darnley), a tall, comely young nobleman, who was descended from the royal family of England, and was, after her, the next successor to the throne of that country. Darnley, who was in the English court, obtained permission of Elizabeth to visit Scotland, where he arrived on the 13th of February, 1565. Presenting himself before Mary, he succeeded in winning her favour, and was accepted. The seemingly fortunate young nobleman was married to her on the 29th of July; and many envied him the place he held in the heart of the lovely and fascinating Scottish queen: but it would have been far better for both of them if they had never met. Elizabeth had secretly encouraged this marriage; but she pretended to be highly offended at it, and made that an excuse for refusing to comply with her promise, and declare Mary her successor.

The Earl of Lennox (Darnley's father) was a Catholic; and although the young nobleman himself went to the reformed church, the preachers suspected his sincerity. Knox even insulted him from the pulpit, by saying that God, to punish the ingratitude and offences of the people, was wont to commit the rule over them to boys and women. The preachers, or the Assembly of the Kirk, as they were called, contrived to get up a riot in Edinburgh; after which, they demanded that Mary should, by a formal act, become a Protestant, and abolish the Roman Catholic worship from the country, not even retaining it in her own family. But the preachers were not the only persons who were dissatisfied at their queen's marriage. Several of her nobles entered into a conspiracy, and took up arms against her; and in this treasonable conduct they were secretly encouraged and assisted by the jealous and intriguing Elizabeth. Mary immediately acted with great spirit: she took the field with an army of 18,000 men, and pursued the rebels with such rapidity, that they were compelled to disband their troops, and fly for safety into England. Mary, though at first extremely enraged, was induced, by the general mildness of her nature, to pardon the traitors.

Darnley soon proved himself unworthy of the affection of his beautiful wife, and of the high station which she had bestowed upon him. In her fondness she had given him the title of king; but he speedily returned her favours with ingratitude, and insolently demanded the whole authority of government. He was vain, vulgar, arrogant, thankless, given to drinking, and to other low pleasures. Indeed, within a very few weeks after his marriage, he so neglected his wife as to turn her love into dislike and disgust. He soon saw that he had lost her affection; but, instead of attributing it to his own bad conduct, he supposed that her coldness to him arose out of an attachment for some one else.

Among Mary's attendants was a middle-aged, plain, and slightly deformed Italian, named David Rizzio. He had not been long in Scotland, having arrived there in the suite of an ambassador from the Duke of Savoy, who came to congratulate the queen upon her return from France. Rizzio was a person of humble origin, but possessed of considerable abilities. He had been educated as a musician; and Mary, finding him useful to complete her band, engaged his services, and kept him after the departure of his master. The foreigner contrived to win the favour of the queen, and she promoted him to be her French secretary. This important situation gave him frequent opportunities of being in her presence; and he displayed so much shrewdness, and made such good use of his time, that he rose to be her chief confidant and minister. The Scottish lords were exceedingly jealous that a base-born fiddler, as they called him, should be raised to a level with them; and they hated him very bitterly. Rizzio naturally had his head a little turned with all this good fortune; and he gave way to so much luxury, that his dress, furniture, attendants, and horses were superior even to those of the king. What was more, he dined with the queen each day: every one who desired any favour, was obliged to court his good-will; and, worst of all, he was a Catholic.

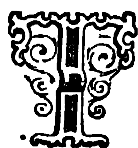
Darnley began to fancy that it was Rizzio who had supplanted him in the affections of the queen. The Italian was ugly, deformed, and no longer young; and it was scarcely likely that a youthful and beautiful woman, even if she had contracted a sinful attachment, would have selected such a man for her lover. But jealous men seldom reason about what is likely; and there were many disappointed, mischief-making people about the court, ready to whisper slanderous stories into the ready ears of Darnley. There were other reasons too why he hated the secretary: Rizzio had remonstrated with him on his neglect of the queen, and had secretly advised her never to bestow on him the matrimonial crown—that is, to give him an equal share with her in the sovereignty and government of the kingdom.

Besides the jealous hatred which the Scottish nobles bore towards Rizzio, he was suspected of being the agent of the Catholic princes in France, and of forming a scheme with them for overturning the Protestant religion, and restoring the ancient faith. This was very likely true; and would alone be sufficient to make the Scottish zealots seek his life. A conspiracy against him was soon entered into by Darnley and the Protestant nobles; and the former signed a bond, giving them authority to murder the Italian, as he impiously said, for the glory of God and the advancement of religion.

One evening (it was the 9th of March, 1566), while Queen Mary, the Countess of Argyll, and Rizzio were at supper, attended only by a few servants, a sudden noise was heard, and Darnley, raising the arras which covered a secret door, entered the room, and seated himself by the side of his wife. He was followed by the fierce Lord Ruthven, in complete armour, who had left a bed of sickness to assist in this deed of blood, and whose sallow, haggard features made him look as if he had just risen from the grave. Behind him came the other conspirators, also clad in shining steel. The queen rose from her seat in astonishment and anger; but, for a few moments, there was an ominous silence. Then the grim Ruthven bade Rizzio rise and come forth—for the place where he sat did not become him. Recovering her dignity, Mary answered that he was there by her will; and then she commanded Lord Ruthven, on pain of treason, to quit her presence. That stern noble gave no answer; but, advancing towards Rizzio, seized him by the arm, and attempted to drag him out of the apartment. Tearing from the assassin, the terrified Italian threw himself on his knees behind the queen, and, grasping her dress, screamed out—"Justice! justice! save my life, madam—save my life!"

Mary interposed her person between the wretched secretary and his assailants, and again commanded them to quit the room, saying, that if he were accused of any crime, he should be placed upon his trial, and be dealt with by the laws. Ruthven then struck at Rizzio with his dagger over the shoulder of the queen; another conspirator presented a pistol to her bosom; and Darnley, throwing his arms around her, held her while the others dragged Rizzio from the chamber. There they murdered him by stabbing him with their swords and daggers. Such was their fury, that as many as fifty-six wounds were afterwards discovered upon his corpse.

At first, Mary wept bitterly; but when she learned that her favourite was dead, she exclaimed—"If it be so, then farewell tears; we will now think of revenge!" She knew nothing of the bond which Darnley had given to the conspirators, promising to shield them from the consequences of the deed; and he contrived to make her believe that the murder was committed without his sanction, and that he was altogether innocent of it. Ruthven, Morton, and the other conspirators expected, on the death of Rizzio, to be able to grasp the chief power of the state; but as the deceitful Darnley turned against them and disowned the deed, they were compelled to provide for their safety by flying to England, where they lived in great poverty. Seven persons were arrested for being concerned in the murder of Rizzio, and two of them were executed; but the leaders in that savage crime were beyond Mary's power. The Scottish queen sent to Elizabeth, demanding that they should be delivered up; but met with a refusal. Some historians say, that to prevent the success of the Catholics, the English queen had secretly encouraged the murder of the unfortunate Italian; which we do not believe. But she solicited of Mary the pardon of the murderers, which was ultimately granted.



Though Darnley had persuaded his wife that he was innocent of the death of Rizzio, she soon afterwards obtained possession of the bond he had given to the assassins, engaging them to do the deed, and promising his protection afterwards. This confirmed the disgust she had for some time felt for him; and her anger was so great, that it is said she sent a messenger to Rome, to apply for a divorce. She would not even permit him to approach her, and encouraged her courtiers to treat him with neglect—a punishment that his ungrateful conduct well deserved.

On the 19th of June, 1566, about three months after the murder of her secretary, Mary became the mother of a prince. He was christened James, and after the death of Elizabeth, became King of England. The fright which his mother had received before his birth had such an effect upon him, that it is said, even when grown to manhood, he always trembled at the sight of a drawn sword. Elizabeth received the news of the prince's birth one evening while she was dancing at a court ball at Greenwich. She had been exceedingly cheerful; but suddenly becoming very sad, she sat down, and reclining her head upon her hand, complained to some of her ladies, that the Queen of Scots was mother of a fair son, while she herself was but a barren stock. The next day, however, she had recovered her spirits; received the ambassador from Scotland with a smiling face; expressed a great friendship for Mary, and consented to become godmother to the little stranger.

CHAPTER LXI.

CONTINUATION OF THE REIGN OF QUEEN ELIZABETH.—A.D. 1566—1568.

THE birth of Prince James created considerable hopes among the Catholics of England; and men of all opinions were anxious that, as Elizabeth was unmarried, and likely to remain so, she should name her successor. When the parliament met, in the autumn of 1566, the matter was seriously debated; and the Commons plucked up spirit enough to propose that they should vote the queen no supplies of money until she had given them a direct answer upon this subject. Elizabeth was very much annoyed, and commanded Sir William Cecil, the Secretary of State, to assure the Commons that she intended to take a husband for the good of her people. She had, however, equivocated so often upon this point, that no one believed the statement, and the Commons still urged the question of the settlement.

Finding her usual Machiavelian policy useless, Elizabeth sent a command to the Commons not to proceed any further upon that subject. But the time was now passing away when the English parliament stood abashed at the command of the sovereign and passively obeyed it. The Commons were displeased at the arbitrary conduct of the queen; and one gentleman, of the name of Wentworth, said that he thought such an interference was an infringement of the liberties and privileges of the house. This boldness aroused a similar spirit in other members; and they said that the queen was bound in duty, not only to provide for the happiness of her subjects during her own life, but also to pay regard to their future security by fixing a successor. That by not doing so, she showed herself rather as the stepmother than the natural parent of her people, and seemed desirous that England should exist only while she could enjoy the glory and satisfaction of governing it. They added, that none but timid princes or tyrants, or faint-hearted women, ever stood in fear of their successors; and that the affections of the people were a firm protection to every sovereign who, laying aside all artifice or bye-ends, had the courage and magnanimity to put entire trust in that honourable and sure defence.

Elizabeth was astonished at the spirit of the Commons; but she did not wish to give up the point. She sent to the Speaker, and repeated her former command; though she added, that if any member remained unsatisfied, he might appear before her council, and there state his reasons. But the Commons were firm, and seemed so determined to carry on their debate, that the queen submitted and recalled her command! In this sort of conduct lay half the secret of Elizabeth's greatness and power. Her conduct was extremely arbitrary; but she knew how to yield with grace before she had aroused the anger of her people.

The queen's submission at once softened the temper of the Commons, and they voted her a liberal supply, without insisting that she should either marry or name her successor. She, however, felt some difficulty in digesting her humiliation, and, on the 2nd of January, 1567, dissolved the parliament. In a speech her majesty made on that occasion, she rather sharply told the members that their proceedings had contained much dissimulation and artifice; that under the pretences of marriage and succession, many of them covered very evil intentions towards her; but that she reaped this advantage from the attempts of these men—that she could now distinguish her friends from her enemies. She concluded by saying—"But do you think that I am unmindful of your future security, or will be negligent in settling the succession? That is the chief object of my concern, as I know myself to be liable to mortality. Or do you apprehend that I meant to encroach on your liberties? No; it was never my meaning: I only intended to stop you before you approached the precipice. All things have their time; and though you may be blessed with a sovereign more wise or more learned than I, yet I assure you that no one shall ever rule over you who shall be more careful of your safety. And therefore, henceforward, whether I live to see the like assembly or no, or whoever holds the reins of government, let me warn you to beware of provoking your sovereign's patience so far as you have done mine. But I shall now conclude; that, notwithstanding the disgusts I have received (for I mean not to part with you in anger), the greater part of you may assure themselves that they go home in their prince's good graces."

As the cautious queen knew that some parts of this speech would not be acceptable to the parliament, she softened it down by an act that won greatly upon the affection of the nation. She voluntarily gave up a third of the money the Commons had voted her, wisely and nobly saying, that "money in her subjects' purses was as good to her as in her own treasury."

Elizabeth had thus again diverted the attention of the parliament from the question of the succession; but the friends of Mary Stuart were every day increasing in England; and it was certain that she would soon have been compelled to declare that princess her successor; but Mary, by her own conduct, now brought upon herself both ruin and infamy. In the Scottish court there was a nobleman of good family, but of profligate habits, called the Earl of Bothwell. He had rendered Mary some service; had always been faithful towards her, and was frequently in her society. Disgusted with her vulgar and ungrateful husband, and feeling a want of some one whom she could love, Mary, in an evil hour, bestowed her affections upon this aspiring peer. Reports began to be circulated that a closer intimacy than was proper existed between them; and these reports were confirmed by the increasing dislike which it was evident the queen bore to her husband. Darnley himself was so hurt at the neglect he received from her and her courtiers, that he thought of secretly leaving Scotland, and flying to France or Spain. It would have been better for him if he had; for a conspiracy was soon afterwards entered into by Bothwell and some other nobles to murder him, because he was, as they truly said, a fool and a tyrant—an enemy to the nobility; and had conducted himself in an unbearable manner towards the queen.

About this time (the close of 1566), Darnley became very ill, and many people said he had been poisoned by order of the queen. This was soon discovered to be an idle slander; for it was found that he was suffering from that frightful malady, the small-pox. Much as she detested her arrogant, worthless husband, Mary sent him her own physician, and, shortly afterwards, went suddenly to Glasgow, and paid him a visit herself.

The kindness of her manner, whether real or assumed, induced her husband to declare that he repented of all his faults towards her, and that he was so joyful to see her, that he was ready to die with gladness. After reproaching him gently for his misconduct, she promised to pardon him, and receive him again to her affection. Then, bidding him a kind good-night, she retired to her own apartments. It would appear that the queen was aware of the plot to assassinate Darnley, and had not forbidden the commission of the crime; for a letter is extant, written that night by her to Bothwell, in which she alluded to the projected murder, and expressed her remorse for the treacherous part she was playing, saying—"Ye make me dissemble so far that I have horror thereat; and ye cause me do almost the office of a traitress. Remember how, if it were not to obey you, I would rather be dead ere I did it: my heart bleeds at it."

Darnley did not distrust his wife, and readily consented to go with her to Edinburgh. Instead of giving him apartments in the royal palace of Holyrood, she lodged him in a lonely house in a suburb of the town, called Kirk-a-field—a dull, solitary place, occupied chiefly by gardens and a few scattered houses. The reason she gave for this was, that he would be more likely rapidly to recover his health there, than in the crowd and noise of the palace. In this place the queen visited him every day, treated him in an affectionate manner, and sometimes slept in a room just beneath his.

Mary had promoted a marriage between one of her favourite female attendants and a foreigner of her household, named Sebastian Auvernac, and this marriage took place at the palace of Holyrood, on the 9th of February, 1567. In the evening there was to be a supper and entertainment, at which the queen had promised to attend; and, after spending some time with her husband, she left him at eleven o'clock, that she might be present at the scene of mirth. The dancing in the palace of Holyrood was over: the music had ceased; the festivity was concluded; and the lights extinguished. Silence and darkness reigned over Edinburgh, and the citizens slept. But the Earl of Bothwell and a few ruffian-servants were abroad, busy in a deed of horror; and Mary Stuart lay upon her bed, with beating heart and listening ear. Suddenly, about three o'clock in the morning, the inhabitants of the city were roused in terror from their sleep by a sound like the roar of a hundred cannons. The noise was in the direction of the Kirk-a-field; and to that spot the half-dressed citizens rushed in crowds. There they beheld the house in which Darnley had slept blown to pieces, and his body and that of his valet lying dead in the garden.

The Earl of Bothwell, who pretended to be greatly astonished, said that the house had been struck by lightning; but every one saw that it had been blown up with gunpowder. Suspicion fell upon Bothwell as the perpetrator of the crime; and although no one dared publicly to accuse him, voices were soon heard in the streets, in the dead of night, proclaiming him, and even Mary herself, to be the murderers of the king. This horrible affair was surrounded by a mystery which will, perhaps, never be perfectly cleared up. It appears, from the confession of some persons who were executed for being concerned in the murder, that, before Mary left for the festivity at the palace, Bothwell's servants carried a quantity of gunpowder to the lone house in Kirk-a-field. There they were admitted by Paris, a servant of the queen, who was in the secret. The powder was then carried in bags into her chamber, which was just beneath that in which Darnley slept. It is said, Mary had, a few days before, directed this fellow Paris to bring away the coverlet of her bed, which was a very costly one, from the house in Kirk-a-field to the palace at Holyrood. If she actually remembered an article of furniture, and coolly gave directions for its preservation at the very time she was contemplating the murder of her husband, she must have been a horrible and most hardened criminal—an evil angel, beautiful to look at, but beneath whose smiles lurked treachery and death! It is hard, indeed, to believe it.

When all the powder had been placed in her room, Mary and Bothwell departed for the palace, and Darnley retired to rest. About midnight, Bothwell left the wedding banquet—went home, changed his dress, and then, with three of his servants, proceeded, by unfrequented lanes, to the lone house where Darnley lodged. Having climbed over the garden wall, they gave a signal to two other ruffians who were in the house, to light the slow-match which was at the end of the train leading to the gunpowder. According to one statement, the victim was aroused by the noise they made, and fearing some plot against him, rushed down stairs in his shirt, where he was seized, and after a violent struggle, strangled: his page, it is added, shared his fate. As the train was then on fire, and any delay might cause them to be blown to pieces, the murderers threw the bodies into the field, and made their escape. A few minutes afterwards a vivid light was seen through the windows of the house, a fearful explosion shook the ground, a vast column of smoke arose into the air, and the building was a heap of shattered ruins. Bothwell and his accomplices hurried home, and the earl went directly to bed. Shortly afterwards, when the alarm was given, he rose apparently in great surprise, as if just awakened from sleep, and hurrying to the scene of horror, caused the bodies to be removed to a neighbouring house, where none could see them. But a great crowd had already collected in that field of death: people observed that neither of the bodies were injured by fire or by lightning; and dark suspicions of treachery and murder had already arisen in their minds.

The murdered Darnley was buried privately in the chapel of Holyrood Palace, and very little trouble was taken to discover his assassins: indeed, that would have been needless; for the queen knew them well enough already. The shocking crime was committed on the morning of the 10th of February, 1567; and in the following March, Darnley's father, the Earl of Lennox, who was living at a distance from the court, wrote to the queen, naming Bothwell and others as the suspected murderers of his son, and demanding immediate justice upon them. Mary took the earl at his word; allowed him only fifteen days to arrange his charge; and summoned him to appear in court and prove the accusation he had made against Bothwell. That wicked noble was all this time not only permitted to remain at liberty, but he even frequently visited Mary, and still enjoyed her favour. The populace, however, were so convinced of his guilt, and so infuriated against him, that he never rode out without a body of armed attendants. Even Queen Elizabeth wrote a letter to Mary, urging her to purify her honour by a rigid inquiry into this dark affair. From this letter it would seem that the English queen knew nothing of the murder before it was committed: her majesty said, "How much soever my nature compels me to condole his death, still, to tell you boldly what I think, I cannot conceal that I am more grieved for you than him. Oh! madam, I should not do the duty of a faithful cousin or an affectionate friend if I studied more to please your ears than to preserve your honour; nor will I conceal from you what most people say—that you will look through your fingers at the revenge of this deed, and that you have no care to touch those who have done you so great a pleasure, as if the thing had not been committed without the murderers having known their assurance."

When the day came for the Earl of Bothwell's trial (the 12th of April), he appeared in court; but Lennox, fearing that he was not safe where the murderer of his son was treated with so much lenity, declined to come. Therefore, as there was no accuser and no witnesses, Bothwell was acquitted of the crime, though every one believed him to be guilty. Mary had previously refused an application from Lennox to have the trial postponed until he was better prepared to sustain his charge, and until he could come to Edinburgh in safety.

The guilty queen was now determined to marry the man whom she had before secretly loved, and for whom she had connived at, if she had not consented to, the murder of her former husband. This soon got rumoured abroad, and the people said such a connexion would be infamous: therefore, as an open straightforward marriage was not to be thought of, it was determined to bring it about by an artifice. One evening, Bothwell invited the principal prelates and nobility to a great supper at a tavern. When the meal was over and they were sitting at their wine, he caused the house to be surrounded by troops; and then, producing a document from his pocket, which recommended him as a fitting husband for the queen, he desired them all to sign it, at the same time assuring them that he had Mary's written consent to the union. The ecclesiastics and nobles were much surprised; but they no doubt knew that the recommendation would be agreeable to the queen, and nearly all of them put their names to it.

Soon afterwards, on the 24th of April, Mary went to Stirling to visit her infant son; and Bothwell having collected a body of 800 horsemen, waylaid her on her return, dismissed her attendants, and carried her off to Dunbar Castle. Sir James Melville remonstrated against this violence; when he was told by a follower of the earl, that it was done by the queen's consent. There can be very little doubt that this was the case, though some historians have tried very hard to clear Mary's character on this point by attempting to prove that she was actually carried off against her will. At any rate, she made no resistance.

Bothwell kept Mary for five days in Dunbar Castle; and during that time he is said to have acted towards her in a very criminal manner. Her subjects, however, made no effort to rescue her; for they believed that she remained there willingly. Some of her nobles, indeed, sent her a secret message, that if she was really kept a prisoner by force, they would rescue her. Her answer shows that she had consented to the outrage which had been perpetrated upon her. She told the messenger, with a smile, that it was true she had been brought there unwillingly, but had been treated so kindly since, she could not greatly complain of the previous injury.

The worthless man whom Mary had encouraged to aspire to her hand was already married. Two years before, he had wedded a young and noble lady, sister of the Earl of Huntley, whom he now resolved to divorce, to make way for his alliance with the queen. This divorce was hurriedly concluded in four days, and then Bothwell conducted Mary to Edinburgh, where she declared she was again entirely at liberty. It was then said by the partisans of the earl, that the only way left to clear the queen's honour, was for her to marry him. It remained for the queen to give her public consent, and this she soon did. On the 12th of May, she made her appearance before the High Court at Edinburgh, and there stated that, although she had at first been highly offended at the restraint placed on her person by Bothwell, she had since seen cause to forgive him; and that it was her intention to raise him to still higher honours. Accordingly, she created him Duke of Orkney and Shetland; and placed the coronet upon his head with her own fair hand.

Three days later, and only four months after the murder of her former husband, Darnley, Mary and Bothwell were married in the presence-chamber at Holyrood Palace, according to the Protestant ceremony. Very few of the nobility attended; and even the foreign ambassadors staid away in disgust. Mary sent to the English and French courts to excuse her conduct; but, both at home and abroad, it excited feelings of indignation and wonder. Rumours soon reached Mary that many of her nobles were banded together in a league against her; but she treated this information with contempt; and she and her husband spent their time in feasts and pageants. But though she had got all she wanted, she was far from being happy: she loved Bothwell to distraction, but he frequently quarrelled with her; and the wretched woman knew that the whole nation suspected her of being an accomplice in her former husband's murder. Bothwell even attempted to get her son, the young Prince James, into his power; and it is supposed, that if he had succeeded, the child would have followed his father to a premature grave.

The indignant Scottish nobles were now thoroughly aroused, and held a secret meeting at Stirling, where they formed themselves into an association for protecting the prince and punishing his father's murderers. They were spurred on to this step by the most bigoted of the Protestant preachers, who had never forgotten the hatred they bore to Mary for being a Catholic; and it was resolved among them to dethrone the queen, who had brought such infamy upon herself and on the nation, and to crown the infant prince instead.

An attempt was soon made by Lord Hume, a border chieftain, to seize Mary and Bothwell at Berwick Castle. As they were unprepared, they would have been easily captured; but information of the plot was conveyed to them just as they were going to bed. The earl escaped and fled to Dunbar Castle; and the queen, disguising herself as a man, soon followed him.

Dunbar was a very strong fortress, and considered almost impregnable. The army of the confederate nobles did not increase so rapidly as they expected; and the queen had summoned her subjects to her assistance. Her safest plan would have been to remain within the walls of the castle, and wait until the nobles were compelled to disband their troops from a want of provisions. But the queen was a courageous woman: a little army had assembled beneath her banner, and she and her husband led them towards Edinburgh, where the rebel lords were assembled. It was on a Sunday morning, the 15th of June, 1567, only a month after Mary's fatal marriage, that the two armies met at Carberry Hill, about six miles from Edinburgh. At first the French ambassador mediated between the queen and the associated lords, but without effect; and both sides made ready for battle. But Mary's own followers were so convinced of the badness of her cause, that they deserted in great numbers, and the rest showed no disposition to fight. Indeed, her little army was so thinned, that to go to battle with it would have been to rush on to destruction. The queen, therefore, only sought to provide for the safety of herself and husband; and desired that the laird of Grange should wait upon her to arrange an accommodation.

Fearing for the life of her husband, the queen offered to leave him, if they would allow him to escape, and then return to their allegiance to her. The lords consented; and Mary, after much hesitation, and with great anguish of mind, embraced her husband and bade him farewell. Bothwell then galloped off with a few attendants, and she never saw his face again. He hurried to Dunbar, and fitting out some small ships, set sail for the Orkneys, and supported himself for some time as a pirate. He was afterwards pursued and his ship taken, together with some of his servants, who confessed that they had been engaged in the murder of Darnley. He himself escaped and got to Denmark, where he was thrown into prison as a pirate. He remained in confinement for a period of ten years, during which time he went mad; and at length died miserably - a fitting end for his life of crime and profligacy.

After the flight of her husband, Mary surrendered to the laird of Grange, who led her towards the associated lords. These men treated her with a cold respect; but the common soldiers could scarcely be kept from coarsely insulting her. The standard of the nobles was a white banner, on which was painted the murdered body of the late king (Darnley), lying under a tree, and the little Prince James kneeling by the side of it; with the following words—"Judge and avenge my cause, O Lord!"—inscribed beneath him. The banner had been carried at the head of the army; but it was now kept continually in Mary's sight. Some of the soldiers even shouted out that she ought to be burnt as an infamous woman, a papist, and a murderess.

The nobles carried the queen to Edinburgh, where she was assailed by the mob with yells and execrations. She passed that night, strongly guarded, in the house of the provost of the town. She had expected very different treatment; and the lords had certainly grossly broken their treaty with her, which was—to return to their obedience if she would quit her husband. The wretched woman was goaded almost to madness by the horror of her situation: though she had tasted nothing for four-and-twenty hours, she refused to touch food; and fiercely upbraided her captors with their treachery. Once in the course of the night she ran to the window and cried aloud for help; but she might as well have cried to the stones of the street. When the morning broke, she fell into a violent fit of passion. Soon afterwards the soldiers reared the horrid-looking banner (on which was pictured the dead body of her husband) before her window. At this fresh insult, her despair of mind was so great that she tore her dress from her body, and rushing to the window almost in a state of nakedness, uttered an appalling scream of terror and agony.

The hearts of the queen's captors were hard enough; but many of them were touched at this pitiable scene; and several of the nobles went in to appease her. So changeable are the people, that great compassion was felt for her; and it was rumoured that an attempt would be made, in the course of the day, to rescue her from captivity. To prevent this, she was removed to the palace of Holyrood, and, when night set in, conveyed a prisoner to the lonely castle of Lochleven. This fortress, built on a small island in the middle of a lake, was considered a place from which escape was impossible; and to add to her misery, it was commanded by the ferocious Lord Lindsay, to whom she had lately declared that she would have his head. This savage noble accordingly revenged himself by treating her with extreme harshness.

Bothwell, in his sudden flight, had left among his papers in Edinburgh Castle, a silver casket, which fell into the hands of the associated nobles. This casket had belonged to Mary's first husband, Francis II., whose crown and initials were engraved upon it, and had been given to Bothwell by the queen, after the murder of her second husband, Darnley. In it were found a number of letters, written by her to her profligate lover; twelve sonnets addressed to him; and two contracts of marriage; all, except one of the latter, in the queen's handwriting. These letters Bothwell had been imprudent enough to preserve: and from them the lords obtained convincing evidence of Mary's being an accomplice in the murder of the miserable Darnley. Some authors say that these letters and sonnets were not written by Mary, but forged by the lords, to blacken her character, and to act as a justification of their severe conduct towards her. But there was no necessity for them to resort to forgery for that purpose. Mary's character was defamed enough; and the whole nation believed her guilty. The letters, also, had every appearance of being genuine, and contained facts which it was not likely any one else could have known. From the moment they had obtained these letters, the lords were so indignant at the guilt of their queen, that they resolved to dethrone her, and crown her infant son instead.

Knox and the fierce preachers even clamoured for her death, saying, that such a deed would be justified by the laws of the land, and by many examples in the Old Testament: they even declared that God would never avert his wrath from the land until he was appeased by the punishment of that murderess, the queen.

Elizabeth, who had prompt information of all these proceedings, professed to be much shocked that her cousin, even if guilty, should be ill-treated and imprisoned by her own subjects; but she did nothing to release her, except sending some expostulations to the lords, whom she was suspected of secretly encouraging. The French court, also, seemed indifferent to the fate of the fallen queen; and, feeling herself thus friendless and deserted, she, on the 24th of July, 1567, signed a deed in which she resigned her royalty to Prince James, who was then only fourteen months old. On the 29th of the same month, the baby-prince was crowned at Stirling as King of Scotland; but, as he was too young to govern, the Earl of Murray was chosen regent, and proclaimed on the 22nd of August.

In the spring of the following year, Mary attempted to escape from Lochleven Castle. She had captivated a young gentleman of rank, named George Douglas, who lived in the fortress; and he thought of a plan to set her free. Her laundress, having been won over to the scheme, came one morning at an earlier hour than usual, and was, without any suspicion, admitted into the queen's bed-room. Mary then hastily dressed herself in the woman's clothes, and, throwing her muffler over her face, took the bundle of linen, passed out without being suspected, and entered the boat which was to convey her to the opposite shore. Away the boatmen went over the clear water, and the royal captive's heart beat hurriedly at the prospect of approaching liberty. Already they were half-way over, when one of the men—a merry, rude fellow—thought he should like to have a look at the washerwoman's face, and see whether it was a pleasing or an ugly one. "Let us see what manner of dame this is," said he, and attempted to pull down her muffler. The queen, in alarm, raised her hands to protect herself; and the men, observing that they were fair and delicately made—unlike the hands of those used to labour—immediately suspected the truth.

Finding that she was discovered, she assumed an air of dignity, and commanded them, on peril of their lives, to land her on the opposite bank. This they at once refused to do; but promised that they would take her back to the castle, and say nothing about the matter—so that she could return to her room, and no one know anything of her attempt to escape. The disappointed queen was compelled to submit: she was taken back, and the boatmen were ungenerous enough to reveal her secret. In consequence of this she was more closely watched in future, and George Douglas turned out of the castle.

Mary's admirer was not discouraged by the failure of this attempt, and he soon hit upon another plan. He persuaded a sharp little page to steal the key of the castle-gate, which the castellan always had laid on the table before him as he sat at supper. The boy, in handing him a plate, dropped his napkin on the key, and picked them up both together. He then hurried to the queen, who had been informed of what was going on, and was ready waiting. She and a young girl (one of her maidens), together with the page, stole cautiously to the gate, and, having passed it, turned the key upon those within. Waving a white veil with a broad red fringe, as a signal to George Douglas and her friends on the opposite bank, Mary and her two companions stepped into the boat. Her many wild adventures had made her dexterous, and she and the lad rowed the boat over in safety. Several friendly nobles and their attendants were at hand to receive her; and, mounting a horse, she hastened to Hamilton Castle. It was on the 2nd of May, 1568, that Mary thus escaped from Lochleven.

The deposed queen had yet many friends among the Scottish nobles; and she summoned the chief of them to her assistance. The summons was instantly obeyed; and these nobles entered into a bond of association for her defence. Among them were nine earls, nine bishops, eighteen lords, nearly 100 lesser barons, and many of the principal gentlemen of Scotland. By their exertions Mary was, in a few days, at the head of an army of 6,000 men. She then offered a pardon to all her rebellious subjects, and sent a summons to the Earl of Murray, who had been made regent, to surrender the government into her hands.

Murray was a brave and politic, as well as an ambitious man, and had no intention of doing anything of the sort. He entered into negotiations to gain a little time, during which he collected an army of 4,000 men. On the 13th of May, 1568, the two armies met at a place called Langside, near Glasgow. The battle lasted but three-quarters of an hour, and ended in the total defeat of the queen's party. Mary watched the progress of the battle from the summit of a neighbouring hill; and when she saw the final rout of her army, she mounted her horse, and, dashing off in terror, never stopped until she reached the abbey of Dundreggon, sixty miles from the scene of the contest. Mary knew that she could not long remain there in safety, and she had to choose between throwing herself upon the mercy of her own subjects, or of flying for refuge either into France or England. Believing that Elizabeth would act generously towards her in her unhappy situation, she chose the latter course; and, hiring a fishing-boat, she, with a few attendants, crossed over the Frith of Solway to Workington, a small seaport town on the coast of Cumberland, where she landed on the 15th of May. From this place she wrote a touching letter to Elizabeth, in which she threw the blame of her misfortunes on the ingratitude of her subjects, who, she said, had murdered her secretary Rizzio, afterwards murdered her husband, and tried to throw the crime upon her; had imprisoned her, and, by threats of death, compelled her to sign an abdication of her crown. It ended with saying, "I implore you to send to fetch me as soon as you can; for I am in a piteous condition, not only for a queen, but for a gentlewoman. I possess nothing in the world but my person, just as I escaped—going sixty miles across the fields the first day, and having ever since ventured to travel but by night; as I hope to explain unto you, if it please you to have pity, as I hope, of my extreme ill-fortune."

Before this letter reached the English queen, Mary had been waited upon by some English gentlemen, and conducted to Carlisle Castle. Elizabeth soon, however, sent Lord Scrope and Sir Francis Knolles to wait upon her. After expressing the sympathy of their mistress for the misfortunes of the royal fugitive, they said that Elizabeth could not honourably receive her into her presence until she was cleared of all suspicion of Darnley's murder. Mary shed tears of disappointment at this cold and haughty treatment, and then desired that she might be permitted to pass safely through England and go to France, to solicit that aid which Elizabeth had denied her. This did not suit the English queen; and the royal fugitive, though treated with seeming hospitality, soon found herself a prisoner in Carlisle Castle.

CHAPTER LXII.

CONTINUATION OF THE REIGN OF QUEEN ELIZABETH.—A.D. 1568—1581.

ELIZABETH thought it prudent to keep Mary a prisoner; and, as Carlisle is on the borders of Scotland, she caused her to be removed to Bolton Castle, in Yorkshire, where it was thought she would be more secure. The unfortunate fugitive protested passionately against this removal: she was helpless, however, and compelled to submit.

But even the powerful English queen was obliged to give some reasons for detaining a foreign princess in captivity; and she was not long in adducing them. She summoned Murray, the Scottish regent, to London, to justify his conduct towards his queen. By this means she imagined that nobleman would be compelled to produce such evidence of Mary's guilt, as might serve for a sort of justification for still keeping her in confinement. The Earl of Murray agreed to obey this summons, and chose several nobles and others as his associates in the affair. Elizabeth then artfully persuaded Mary to choose commissioners to reply to the charges brought against her. This was, in reality, to submit to a kind of trial, in which her subjects were her accusers, and Elizabeth her judge. The captive princess showed great aversion to such an arrangement; but Elizabeth assured her that she did not desire to enter into the question without her consent or approbation. That she wished only as a friend to hear her justification; and that she was confident no difficulty would be found in refuting all the calumnies of her enemies. She added, that she was determined to support her cause, and that it was not meant that she should be cited to a trial merely on the accusation of her rebellious subjects; but, on the contrary, that they should be summoned to appear and justify themselves for their conduct towards her.

Mary feared that proofs of her guilt might be brought to light; but she knew that to refuse would be to confirm the suspicions against her; and she reluctantly consented. Accordingly, a commission of English and Scotch met at York on the 4th of October, to inquire into the disputes between her and her subjects. The commissioners appointed to represent Elizabeth, were the Duke of Norfolk, the Earl of Sussex, and Sir Ralph Sadler. Mary was represented by the Bishop of Ross, Lords Herries, Livingstone, and Boyd, with three other persons. The commissioners from Scotland (that is, the accusers) were Earl Murray, the regent, the Earl of Morton, the Bishop of Orkney, Lord Lindsay, and the Abbot of Dunfermline. Elizabeth gloried in this arrangement; for, however it ended, it would be to her advantage. If Mary's crimes could be proved beyond a doubt, the character of her rival would be utterly ruined; and she might, with a great show of reason, detain her a prisoner in England for ever; but if the evidence were not sufficient for that, and she was compelled to restore her to her throne, it would be with such restrictions as would make Elizabeth arbiter of all disputes between the contending factions in Scotland; and, in short, create her the real mistress of that country.

Mary's commissioners opened the business by charging Murray and the other lords with treasonable conduct towards their queen. They related the circumstances of the insurrection against her; her dethronement and imprisonment; Murray's usurpation of the regency; and declared her confident hope that Elizabeth would restore her to the quiet possession of her throne and kingdom. In reply to this, the Earl of Murray gave his account of the late troubles. He said that the Earl of Bothwell, the known murderer of Darnley, had, a short time after committing that crime, seized the queen, carried her to Dunbar Castle, and gained such influence over her as to win her consent to marry him. That this union had brought scandal and dishonour on the nation, and that, together with the danger to which the life of the infant prince was exposed from the attempts of Bothwell, had obliged the nobility to take up arms. That after the queen, in order to save her infamous husband, had surrendered herself, she still discovered such a violent attachment to him, that they found it necessary, for the public safety, to confine her until he and the other murderers of her husband could be tried and punished for their crime. That during this confinement, she had, of her own accord, resigned her crown to her infant son, and appointed the Earl of Murray regent until the prince came of age.

To this Mary's commissioners answered, for their queen, that she neither knew nor suspected Bothwell to have been the murderer of her husband. That he had not only been acquitted of that crime by a jury, but had even been recommended by all the nobility for her husband. That she desired, if he were really guilty, he should be brought to punishment; and that the resignation of the crown had been extorted from her by threats and violence.

The Scottish regent had not yet produced any direct proofs of the guilt of Mary, and he hesitated to do so on account of the danger to himself, in case Elizabeth should restore the deposed queen to her throne, which he suspected she intended to do. He therefore proposed some questions to the English commissioners, the most important of which were the following:—Whether the Queen of Scots, if found guilty, should be delivered into the hands of the regent, or be so kept in England that she should never be able to disturb the tranquillity of Scotland?—and whether Elizabeth would also, in that case, promise to acknowledge the young king, and protect the regent in his authority? When these questions were submitted to the English queen, Elizabeth threw off the mask she had worn, and openly declared that Mary should never be restored to the Scottish crown, if the regent could make good his accusations. She also sent an order that the commission should be removed from York to Westminster, that the inquiries might be continued under her own immediate direction.

Thus encouraged, the regent proceeded boldly in his accusations against Mary, and produced the fatal silver casket, containing the letters and love-sonnets she had written to Bothwell. These letters, if genuine, as there can be little doubt they were, were conclusive proofs that Mary was an accomplice in the murder of her husband, Darnley. They showed that she detested him, and that she had visited him at Glasgow when he was lying ill of the small-pox, in order to lure him to Edinburgh, that the murder might be more easily effected. One of them suggested that poison might be given to Darnley in his medicine, or perhaps mixed with the water of his bath; in another, the writer said, that all this deception made her very unhappy; but that, to obey her dear love, she spared neither honour, conscience, hazard, nor greatness.

The conduct of Mary's commissioners, on the production of these evidences against her, is a still further proof of her guilt. They refused to give any answer, on the ground that she was a sovereign princess, not subject to any tribunal, and would only condescend to justify herself in a private interview before Elizabeth. Had she been innocent, there is very little doubt she would have waived her dignity, and at once insisted that the shocking charges against her should be sifted to the very bottom, that the purity of her conduct might be brought to light, and made manifest to the world. Mary's equivocal behaviour convinced Elizabeth of her guilt; and that princess said, that as she had from the first thought it improper that Mary, after such horrid crimes were imputed to her, should be admitted to her presence until she had cleared herself from the charge; so now, when her guilt was confirmed by so many evidences, and all answers refused, she considered herself bound to persevere more steadily in that resolution. Then, sending for the Scottish commissioners, she told them that she should have considered it more decent for their mistress to continue the conference, than to demand the liberty of justifying herself only to her, and that she might send her reply to her by some trustworthy person.

To get out of the difficulty in which she was placed, Mary still refused to justify herself unless she were admitted to the presence of Elizabeth, which, by this time, she knew very well she never would be. She even tried to divert the accusations against herself by declaring that the Earl of Murray and his associates were the murderers of Darnley; but this was only regarded as an angry recrimination. As the conferences were now quite at an end, Murray, on the 10th of January, 1569, departed into Scotland; and Elizabeth gave orders for removing Mary from Bolton to Tutbury Castle—a strong fortress on the banks of the river Dove, in Staffordshire, where she arrived in the following month.

The Duke of Norfolk was, at the time at which we have arrived, one of the most powerful peers in England, and, either from motives of love or ambition, he thought of marrying the captive queen. Several nobles, both English and Scotch, entered into his views, and said that it would be an excellent match. He even wrote to Mary herself upon the subject; who replied, that she had been so unhappy in her former marriages, that she preferred a single life; yet that she would sacrifice her inclinations to the public welfare, and, as soon as she could get divorced from Bothwell, be guided by her nobility and people in the choice of another husband.

Norfolk dared not marry the Queen of Scots without the consent of Elizabeth, and he knew that consent would be difficult, if not impossible, to obtain. Accordingly he attempted first to win the approbation of the principal English nobility, and he thought that Elizabeth could not refuse the desire of such a powerful party. News of these proceedings soon came to the ears of the English queen, who took an opportunity of warning the duke to be very careful on what pillow he laid his head. He declared that he had no intention of marrying the Queen of Scots; but he soon afterwards retired very suddenly to his country house of Kenninghall. At the same time, some other nobles withdrew from court, and Elizabeth feared that a conspiracy was being formed to set the Scottish queen at liberty. Just at this time, all the particulars of Norfolk's correspondence with Mary were treacherously put into Elizabeth's hands, and she instantly summoned that noble to return to court. The duke obeyed; but before he reached London he was arrested and sent to the Tower, where he remained tilll the 4th of August, 1570.

Soon after the arrest of Norfolk, Queen Elizabeth was startled with the news of a Catholic insurrection in the north of England, headed by the Earls of Northumberland and Westmoreland. She suspected every Catholic of being a disloyal subject, and had treated them with so much severity, that they were at last actually driven into rebellion. The object of the conspirators seems to have been a very serious one—nothing less than setting Mary at liberty, placing her upon the English throne, and restoring the Catholic religion in this country. On the 16th of November, 1569, they unfurled the banner of rebellion, and called upon all good Catholics to join them. Their numbers amounted only to 4,000 foot, and 1,600 horsemen; but they expected to be joined by all the Catholics in the country.

Marching to Durham, they solemnised mass in the cathedral, and then committed the Bible and the Book of Common Prayer to the flames. The former they thought was a book only fit to be read by the priests, and the latter they considered to be full of shameful heresies. The people of England were too well satisfied with the general government of Elizabeth to look favourably on any attempt to overturn it; and even numbers of Catholic gentlemen instantly declared for her, and followed her banner. A royal army, under the command of the Earl of Sussex, marched against the rebels, who retreated to Raby Castle, and took refuge there. They then besieged and took Barnard Castle and the seaport town of Hartlepool, where they took up their quarters, in the hope of receiving assistance from the Spaniards.

This assistance, however, they did not obtain; and, after about a month's delay, the Earl of Sussex was joined by the Earl of Warwick and Lord Clinton, at the head of 12,000 men. Awed by the superior force, the rebel army broke up and took to their homes without striking a blow. Westmoreland and Northumberland, the leaders of the revolt, fled for safety into Scotland. As usual, numbers of the poor people were arrested and put to death on account of this insurrection; and Elizabeth acted with a fearful severity: sixty-six were hanged in Durham alone, and great numbers were executed in other places. After this, the queen published a proclamation, which she caused to be read in all the parish churches. In it she spoke of the late unnatural commotion which, by God's goodness, and the faithfulness of her true subjects, had been so shortly and easily suppressed and quieted. She said she had never intended to adopt a general severity in respect of opinions in religion; recalled to the memory of her people the ten quiet and happy years she had reigned over them; and directed their attention to the prosperity they had enjoyed under her rule.

Notwithstanding these declarations of the queen, the rebellion was soon followed by another, headed by a bold and desperate man named Leonard Dacres, head of the House of Gillsland; who, on the 20th of February, 1570, appeared with a large party of followers, and defied the queen's authority. He had previously pretended to act against the insurrectionists. A sharp struggle ensued, in which Dacres was defeated, and saved his life by flying into Flanders; but his wretched followers suffered bitterly. It is said that no less than 800 poor misguided people perished by the hands of the executioner.

As might be expected, the Pope of Rome (Pius V.)

viewed all Elizabeth's actions with suspicion, and even hatred. Finding it impossible to bring her back to the Catholic church, he signed a bull of excommunication against her, on the 25th of February, 1570, which declared her deprived of all title to the crown, and freed her subjects of their oaths of allegiance. It was not an easy thing to get this arrogant parchment made public in England; but at length the pope's agents found a crazy gentleman, named John Felton, who, on the 25th of April, fixed the bull on the gates of the house of the Bishop of London. The citizens were much astonished, and Elizabeth and her council seemed alarmed; but the power of the pope had perished in England: his bulls were no better than waste parchment, and his curses injured none but himself. John Felton was soon arrested; he readily confessed that he had placed the bull on the gates of the palace; but, though he was stretched upon that horrible instrument the rack, he would not reveal who had persuaded him to do so. Being placed on his trial for treason, he was found guilty, and suffered the shocking punishment of hanging and quartering. When at the place of execution, to show that he bore no malice to the queen herself, he took a magnificent diamond ring from his finger, said to have been worth £400, and sent it to her as his dying gift.

The following year (1571) the parliament again assembled on the 2nd of April; five years having passed since its last meeting. The members were nearly all of them good Protestants, and many so exceedingly loyal, as to seem, in these times, servilely submissive. After granting the queen the supply of money she required, they passed an act to still further strengthen her position, and to repress the movements of her enemies. It was declared to be treason to say, during the lifetime of the queen, that she was not the lawful sovereign; or to claim a right to the succession of the crown; or to publish that she was a heretic, a schismatic, a tyrant, an infidel, or usurper; or to deny that the descent of the crown could be regulated by a statute of parliament. Indeed, if any persons presumed to mention the successor of the queen, they were to be severely punished. The parliament also passed another act, which declared it to be high treason to obtain any bull from the pope of Rome; and enacted heavy punishments against all persons who brought into England any crosses, beads, or pictures blessed by the pope, or others appointed by him. All persons, also, except very young children, were compelled to attend the Protestant church regularly, and to receive the sacrament according to the rites of that church.

Just before this time, a new party had arisen in religion, called PURITANS—men who afterwards became so powerful as to overturn the government, and bring the king to the scaffold. They were enthusiasts in religion, and thought that the Reformation had not been carried far enough. Many of what they called the abominations of papistry were yet used in the church; and they desired to make the worship of God more rigid and simple. Pictures, statues, and crucifixes were their horror; and surplices, corner caps, and tippets, they named badges of idolatry, and the livery of the Roman beast. They even wanted to abolish the use of the sign of the cross, the wedding-ring, the observance of festivals, the chant of the psalms, the custom of bowing at the name of Jesus, and the use of musical instruments in churches, as remnants of popery. They were particularly attached to the Old Testament, which they read frequently, and quoted on all occasions, both in place and out of place. They gave their children Bible names, such as Joshua, Samuel, David, Elijah, Jeremiah, &c.; they dressed in sober colours (black or grey), wore their hair cut very short, and put on a studied seriousness of manner. Sometimes they fell into religious ecstasies or fits of rapture, and fancied they saw visions, or even thought themselves inspired. Their opinions on religion they took chiefly from the doctrines of a famous French reformer, named Calvin, who taught that the government of the church was independent of the power of the sovereign of the country; that the Saviour was really, though spiritually, present in the sacrament; and that the Deity had, from all eternity, predestinated or elected some of his creatures to everlasting happiness in heaven, and condemned others to never-ending torments in the dark pit of future punishment. This last doctrine is very shocking and gloomy, and unworthy of the Almighty Creator, who, we are told in Scripture, is a merciful God—a God of love, who desires to reclaim his erring creatures, and not to punish them.

The notions of the Puritans about government were as extravagant as their ideas on religion. They secretly loved a republican government—a government without a king, but having some wise and able person, elected from the people, to manage their affairs. They looked upon Christ as their heavenly and earthly king, and they wanted no other. Though they did not conceal their religious opinions, they were afraid to make known their political principles, which would have exposed them to danger from Elizabeth, who soon began to dislike them as much as she disliked the Catholics: in private, amongst themselves, however, they were boldly avowed. Though the Puritans were occasionally treated with ridicule, on account of their strange costume and demure conduct, yet their ideas spread widely among the people. Odd as were their manners and doctrines, they evinced an honest sincerity, and a stern daring spirit, which ensured respect; and however we may blame many of their acts, both in the age of which we are writing, and in a subsequent one, there is no doubt that to them we are indebted for exertions which assisted in making England the freest state in Europe, and one of the greatest nations in the world.

There were many Puritans in this parliament of Elizabeth's; and one of them, named Strickland, in the session of 1571, brought forward seven bills for a further reformation in religion. The queen wanted no further reformation; for she loved the show and ceremonies, the pictures, dresses, and pomp of the Catholic church. In a fit of anger she commanded Strickland to keep away from the House of Commons, and to await her orders. The Puritan party were angry in their turn: they felt that they had some influence in the country; and they said this order was a violation of the privileges of parliament, and that to submit to it would form a dangerous example. One member observed, that men did not sit in that house as private people, but as elected by their country; and though it was proper that the queen should keep her prerogative, yet that prerogative was limited by law—as she could not of herself make laws, neither could she break them merely from her own authority. The courtiers were astonished at this boldness, and a hot debate took place; but the cautious Elizabeth hesitated before she entered into a contest with her parliament: she saw the precipice upon which she stood, and drew back in time. The next morning Strickland received permission to return to his place in the house, and was received ther with loud cheers. At first the parliament seemed de termined to pass the bills which Strickland had brough forward for extending the Reformation; but, on th further interference of the queen, they were abandoned

When the parliament was dissolved, Elizabeth di not forget to show her dislike of these efforts in favou of liberty and free discussion. She commanded Si Nicholas Bacon, keeper of the great seal, to inform th members of the House of Commons, that, though mos of them had shown themselves discreet and dutiful, ye a few justly merited the reproach of being audaciou arrogant, and presumptuous, contrary to their dut and her commands. He added, that her majesty warne them not to meddle with what nowise belonged t them, and what lay beyond the compass of their under standings. After this the Puritans were treated wit great severity: their ministers were hunted down, thei books seized and suppressed, and for every slight offenc they were called before the Star-Chamber (a detestabl tyrannical court), heavily fined, and insulted.

The Duke of Norfolk, subsequent to his release fron the Tower, had entered into another plot to set Mary Queen of Scots, at liberty. To effect this, he allie himself with a Catholic conspiracy, and with th Spanish Duke of Alva. It was intended that the discontented Catholics should rise in insurrection, headed by Norfolk; and that Alva should then invade England with an army of 10,000 men, join the rebels, march directly to London, and compel the queen to submit to any terms they pleased to dictate. This plot was revealed through the treachery of one of Norfolk's servants, and the duke was seized and again committed to the Tower on the 7th of September, 1571. Being placed on his trial before a jury of twenty-five peers, on the 16th of January, 1572, he was condemned as a traitor, and, on the 2nd of June, beheaded for his crime. Elizabeth hesitated a great deal before she would send the duke to the scaffold: she countermanded two warrants she had signed for his execution, but permitted a third one to take its course.

The Queen of Scots was looked upon as the cause of the death of the Duke of Norfolk, and of the disturbances which led to it; and the Protestant part of the nation was greatly incensed against her. The House of Commons, in 1572, even applied to Elizabeth to bring her to trial, and send her to the scaffold. They said she deserved to die, because she was guilty of adultery, murder, conspiracy, treason, and idolatry; and they brought many texts and arguments from Scripture to prove that she ought no longer to be suffered to live. Elizabeth was not yet prepared to go to such a length against her wicked cousin; and she commanded the Commons to proceed no further, at present, with the affairs of the Scottish queen. Scotland had not been very tranquil since the deposition of Mary. The regent Murray, after twelve months of worry and excitement, subsequent to his return from England, was assassinated at Linlithgow on the 23rd of January, 1570, by one Hamilton, from a revengeful impulse, arising out of a private quarrel. The Earl of Lennox, the father of the murdered Darnley, succeeded Murray as regent; and, after a continued struggle with the friends of Mary, who were still numerous in Scotland, he was murdered in September, 1571. The quarrel continued between the two parties; but, on the 30th of July, 1572, a truce was agreed to between them, and advances were made on both sides, which promised a mutual agreement, when a fearful event occurred in France that startled all Europe, and produced a feeling against the Catholics, both in England and Scotland, more violent and bitter than ever.

On the 24th of August, 1572 (the festival of St. Bartholomew), an attempt was made to murder the whole of the Huguenot or Protestant party in France. This horrible crime was committed by the orders of the young king, Charles IX., instigated by his mother, the infamous Catharine de Medici. The Huguenots we obtaining more influence over Charles than was agree able to Catharine; and, says Ranke, in his History of the Popes, "with that resistless and matchless power she possessed over her children, she re-awakened all the slumbering fanaticism of her son."—In that month of August, the Huguenots flocked in great numbers to Paris, to celebrate the marriage of Henry of Navarre, then their chief, with Margaret of Valois, the king's youngest sister, which took place on the 18th. On the 22nd of August, an attempt was made to assassinate the Admiral Coligny, one of their leaders; on the 23rd, Charles was told that the Huguenots had concerted a treasonable conspiracy against him and his family, in revenge for the attack on Coligny; and their destruction was suggested. He gave his consent, and exclaimed, that he "hoped not a single Huguenot would be left alive to reproach him" hereafter. The orders were issued; bands of assassins were congregated in the streets of Paris; and when the clocks struck two, on the morning of the 24th, the signal for the commencement of the slaughter was given by the tolling of the bell of St. Germain l'Auxerrois.—The Duke de Guise led the murderous affray by heading a band, who burst into the house where Coligny slept, and killed him and his attendants. In a short time the streets of Paris were filled with assassins, who broke into the houses, dragged men, women, and children from their places of concealment, and butchered them upon the spot. Many fled shrieking into the streets, and were stabbed or shot by the crowds of ruffians whom they met in every direction. From all quarters of the city the dreadful cries resounded of "Death to the Huguenots! —kill every one of them!—kill!—kill!"

This dreadful massacre continued till nightfall, when a proclamation was made that it was the king's pleasure the slaughter should cease. But the evil passions of the murderers were too excited to be suddenly appeased; and the work of death continued all that night, and, at intervals, through the two following days. More than 10,000 people were murdered in Paris alone during those days of horror; and throughout France no less than 30,000 were slaughtered in cold blood. This fiendish crime, perpetrated by the followers of the Romish church, and sanctioned by its priests, will ever be remembered, with feelings of horror, under the name of the "Massacre of St. Bartholomew." Some authorities estimate the murdered at a much higher number than we have stated; but Dr. Lingard, the Roman Catholic historian, calculates that there were only 1,600 put to death.

When this news reached England, the people were transported with rage and sorrow, and wished for an instant war with France to avenge the fate of their brother-religionists; but neither the queen nor her ministers encouraged the popular feeling. La Mothe Fenelon, the French ambassador, was desirous of an interview with her majesty, to explain the horrible event. The queen at first refused to receive him; but at length she admitted him to a public audience at Woodstock, when he had to pass through two lines of courtiers in deep mourning before he reached the queen, who was also attired in black. Fenelon accounted for the revolting massacre by alleging, that Coligny and his party had intended to seize the Louvre and the royal family, and to put to death the Duke de Guise, and other leaders of the Catholics. Charles had given orders to the Duke de Guise and his friends to prevent the execution of this plot by putting to death the admiral and those who were to act with him; and his majesty sincerely regretted the lengths to which the ungovernable passions of the populace caused them to go. Elizabeth accepted this favourable view of the case; and said she rather pitied than blamed Charles, who, she hoped, would convince the world that the horrible catastrophe was not brought about by any premeditation of his own.—Whilst the English queen thus calmly viewed the event that so excited her subjects, the pope, Gregory XIII., who had just succeeded Pius V., celebrated it by a solemn procession; and in Venice it was made the cause of a public rejoicing.

After the first feeling of indignation, the English people dreaded that some desperate attempt would be made to restore popery in England; and a new cry was raised for the death of Mary, Queen of Scots, who was looked upon as a centre round which Catholic conspiracies gathered. Elizabeth probably wished Mary dead; but at that time she evinced no desire to become her destroyer. Some of her ministers (it appears with the queen's knowledge) opened a secret treaty with the Scottish regent, and offered to deliver Mary up to him. The death of the Earl of Mar, the regent, on the 8th of October, put an end to this negotiation.—On the 9th of November, the Earl of Morton, one of Elizabeth's partisans, was elected, through her influence, to succeed Mar as the Scottish regent.

In 1579, Elizabeth, then in her forty-seventh year, seemed suddenly to have changed her mind about dying a maiden queen, and to have resolved upon marriage. The favoured suitor was the Duke d'Anjou, a brother of the King of France. He was nearly five-and-twenty years younger than the queen, and they had never seen each other; but the duke, in May, 1579, sent over a nobleman, named Simier, who contrived to win the good graces of Elizabeth, and persuade her that his friend was dying in love with her. The queen sighed and coquetted like a young girl; but she declared that she would never agree to marry a man whom she had not seen. When the Duke d'Anjou heard that, he suddenly, in September, came over to England in disguise, and paid a visit to the queen at Greenwich. Though he was rather marked by the small-pox, she was pleased with his appearance, and so delighted with the romance of the affair, that, after he had returned home, she assembled the lords of the council on the 2nd of October, and asked their opinion concerning her marriage.

The lords did not know how to act: they thought it was useless for the queen to marry now, when it was not likely that she would have a child to succeed her on the throne; but they feared to oppose her wishes. The mature maiden even shed tears on finding that they did not present a petition begging her to marry at once. Still, it was soon agreed with the French ambassador that the wedding should take place six weeks after the settlement of all the treaties which generally precede the marriage of a sovereign.

The Duke d'Anjou, in June, 1580, visited England in state, and was received by the queen with much affection. In the presence of her whole court, she took a ring from her finger, and placed it upon his. But, one morning, after a serious talk with her council, she received the duke in tears, and told him, in an agitated manner, that she had changed her mind, and could not consent to the marriage. The duke was much annoyed: he returned to his lodgings, and, throwing the ring she had given him upon the ground, cursed the caprice of all women, but especially of Englishwomen. Though Elizabeth had resolved, from motives of ambition and policy, not to conclude the marriage, yet she was strongly attached to the duke; and there is no doubt she felt as much love for him as it was possible for her to feel for anybody. Though she had for so long governed her affections, she found that nature will have its own way; and her heart, for a time, became nearly unmanageable. When the duke returned to his own country, she went with him as far as Canterbury, and shed tears on parting with him. The stately, austere queen felt that, after all, she was but a woman; and, on one point, as weak as the youngest and most simple of her sex.

Perhaps one reason why Elizabeth broke off this match was the great dislike with which all her Protestant subjects regarded it; for the duke was a Catholic. The preachers condemned it from the pulpit, and said they were astonished that she had so soon forgotten the massacre of St. Bartholomew. A Puritan student of Lincoln's Inn, of the name of Stubbs, even wrote a violent book, called The Gulf in which England will be swallowed by the French Marriage. The imperious queen instantly ordered the book to be burnt by the common hangman; and both Stubbs and the publisher were condemned to have their right hands cut off, and to be imprisoned during her pleasure. Though Stubbs had written against what he called the degeneracy of the queen from her former virtues, yet he regarded her as the great protectress of the Protestant religion, and prayed for her safety. To such an extent did he carry this feeling, that when his right hand was severed from his body, he took off his hat with his left, and waving it over his head, cried, "God save the Queen!"

Elizabeth had acted with too much severity against the Catholics for her to believe it possible that they could be loyal subjects; and she was kept in constant fear of insurrections, plots against her life, or repetitions, in England, of the horrible massacre of St. Bartholomew. This made her (1584) very stern and suspicious; and the unhappy Catholics were driven into treasonous actions, and then punished for them. Catholic gentlemen were surrounded by spies, who reported their words and actions. Forged letters were even written to them, pretending to have come from the Queen of Scots; and if they so far fell into the snare as to reply to them, they were instantly arrested. The Earl of Arundel died in prison of melancholy and grief; while another nobleman, who had been also seized on suspicion, put a pistol to his breast, and destroyed himself. A gentleman of Cheshire, Francis Throckmorton, son of Sir John Throckmorton, was arrested in consequence of some intercepted letter, and after having been racked three times, he confessed that he was concerned, along with the Spanish ambassador, in a plot to promote an insurrection of the Catholics at home, and an invasion from abroad. On the strength of these confessions, the wretched man was condemned to be hanged and quartered as a traitor; and although he solemnly declared that the confession had been wrung from him to save himself again from the torture, the cruel sentence was executed. There is too much reason to believe that his dying protestations of innocence were true.

The Catholics sent a petition to the queen against these severities, and assured her that they were loyal subjects, who utterly detested any ideas of assassination. The stern Elizabeth sent the gentleman who presented it to prison, where he remained until his death. Still she was loved by her people generally; and when, in 1581, the Earl of Leicester and other courtiers started a society, called the Protestant Association, to protect her against all her enemies, all classes of people readily joined it. The members of it took an oath to defend the queen, to avenge her death or any injury committed against her, and to exclude any person from the throne on whose behalf any violence might be offered to her. Shortly after this, the parliament passed a law by which all Jesuits and popish priests were commanded to quit the country within forty days, and that if they remained beyond that time, or afterwards returned, they should be put to death as traitors. But the monstrous cruelty and unchristian bitterness of this law did not end here; for it also declared that all who were charitable enough to shelter or relieve such priests, were guilty of felony. The Catholic religion had before been abolished in England; but it was now regarded as a crime.

CHAPTER LXIII.

CONTINUATION OF THE REIGN OF QUEEN ELIZABETH.—A.D. 1585—1588.

AT length, in the summer of 1585, a real conspiracy to murder Elizabeth was brought to light, which at one time was nearly being successful in its object. At the head of it was an accomplished and enthusiastic young gentleman, of the name of Anthony Babington. He was a zealous Catholic, possessed considerable estates in Derbyshire, and was much interested in the fate of Mary, Queen of Scots, whom he had formerly seen while in the custody of the Earl of Shrewsbury, in whose household he had been a page.

Babington was persuaded, by an artful Catholic priest —John Ballard, who came to England in the character of an officer, under the name of Fortescue—that to murder Elizabeth and let Mary out of prison, would be an act deserving of glory in this world, and of salvation and eternal happiness in the next. He was not much shocked at this wicked suggestion; and when a man, named Savage, was pointed out to him who was ready to do the deed, he suggested that the plan was not a safe one, and assisted in finding five other persons ready to share with this fellow in the act of regicide. They were all persons of respectable families, and bore the names of Abingdon, Barnwell, Charnock, Filney, and Tichbourne. The conspirators contrived to let Mary, Queen of Scots, know what they intended; and that wretched woman, half maddened by her long and harsh captivity, consented to their plans, and wrote letters to Babington herself.

This plot was soon secretly known to Elizabeth and her council; for some treacherous popish priest, whom the conspirators trusted, betrayed them to the government. On discovering this, they took to flight; but all who were concerned in this wicked plot, to the number of fourteen, were arrested and condemned to death as traitors. There was great joy in London: the church bells rang merrily, and bonfires blazed at night in the streets, while the people thanked God for preserving the life of their queen and the Protestant form of religion. Many, however, pitied the conspirators on account of their youth, enthusiasm, and intelligence; but these guilty men soon found that superior qualities could never be pleaded as an apology for crime. They were all put to death as traitors in Lincoln's Inn Fields—the place in which they had been in the habit of meeting together to talk over their plans. Seven of them were executed on the 20th of September, 1586, and the other seven on the following day.

Babington's conspiracy to murder Elizabeth sealed Mary's fate. She had been moved about from castle to castle, and treated with great severity in each; but she was now hurried off to Fotheringay Castle, in Northamptonshire. It was resolved that she should be the cause of no more popish plots, and that this grim fortress should be the last scene of her life of crime and suffering. The Earl of Leicester is said to have proposed to have her secretly poisoned; and other statesmen suggested, we are told, that her confinement should be made so severe as to kill her by degrees. But, if these proposals were made, the English court refused to sanction anything so vile. It was, however, after the detection of Babington's conspiracy, resolved to place her on her trial, as being an accessory, and for other acts of treason, as they were called; though, in truth, Mary, who was not Elizabeth's subject, could never justly be tried for treason against her.

Early in October, the month after Babington's execution, thirty-six English commissioners, mostly noblemen, arrived with great solemnity at Fotheringay, and informed Mary that they were appointed to be her judges. The Scottish queen replied, that it seemed strange to her that Elizabeth should command her, as a subject, to submit to a trial and examination before subjects; that she was an independent princess, and would yield to nothing that might derogate either from her royal majesty or from the state of a sovereign. She concluded by telling them—"The queen says I am subject to the laws of England, and to be tried and judged by them, because I am under the protection of them. To this I answer, that I came into England to demand her aid and assistance, and have ever since been detained a prisoner; so that I could not enjoy the protection of the laws of England; nor could I ever yet understand what manner of laws they were."

Sir William Cecil, who had been created Lord Burleigh, reasoned with Mary, to induce her to submit to the authority of the commissioners; and threatened that, if she did not, they would proceed against her as absent and obstinate. She paid no attention to him; but Sir Christopher Hatton's arguments induced her to yield. He said, "You are accused, madam, of having conspired the destruction of our lady and queen anointed. If you be innocent, you wrong your reputation in avoiding a trial. We have been present at your protestations of innocence; but her majesty believes you guilty, and is heartily sorry for the appearances which lie against you. Lay aside, therefore, the fruitless claim of privilege from your royal dignity, which can now avail you nothing; trust to the better defence of your innocence; make it appear in open trial; and leave not upon your memory that stain of infamy which must attend your silence."

The trial commenced on the 11th of October, 1586, in the presence-chamber of the castle. At nine o'clock in the morning, Mary entered the hall, dressed in black velvet, with a veil of white lawn thrown over her. She was supported by her physician and another gentleman; for long confinement and ill-treatment had made a cripple of that once graceful and beautiful woman. After having bowed to the assembled lords, she looked around and exclaimed, "Alas! here are many counsellors; yet there is not one for me."

After the usual formalities of a court of justice, Elizabeth's serjeant opened the case against Mary by giving an account of the late conspiracy, and charging her with having known of it, approved it, assented to it, promised her assistance, and showed the way and means for effecting it. He then produced letters which Babington had written to her, and others which, he said, she had written to Babington and his associates. Mary answered, that she had never seen the person called Babington, nor had she ever received any letters from him, or written any to him. She admitted that she knew the Catholics of England were treated with severity; that they had complained to her of their sufferings; and that she had vainly solicited Elizabeth in their favour. She had received letters, without the writers' names, offering her assistance, which she had always rejected; and how was she, in her captivity, to find out who were the writers? She could not prevent people from writing to her; and Babington might have written her a letter, but she had never received it. In conclusion, she said—"If ever I have designed or consented to any practices against the life of my sister, the queen, I pray God that I may never obtain his mercy. I confess that I have often written to various persons as a captive and ill-treated princess, requesting their assistance to deliver me from these miserable prisons, in which I have been shut up nineteen years and some months; but I have never thought or written anything against the queen."

The chief evidence against Mary was contained in the confessions of Babington, and on admissions which had been extorted from Nane and Curl, her two secretaries. Mary replied, that she could not tell whether the confessions of Babington were really made by him or not; and she said that, if her adversaries had wished to discover the truth, they would have kept him as a witness instead of putting him to death. As to her secretaries, one, she said, was an honest though very simple man, but she suspected the integrity of the other; and she demanded that they should be confronted with her. According to the unjust custom then used in cases of high treason, this just demand was refused. After saying that perhaps her secretaries might have acted treacherously, or without her orders, she exclaimed—"Am I, a queen, to be convicted on such evidence as this? Is it not apparent that the majesty and safety of princes fall to the ground if they are to depend upon the writings and testimonies of their secretaries? I have delivered nothing to them but what nature dictated to me under the desire of recovering my liberty; and I claim the privilege of being convicted by nothing but my own word and writing. If they have written anything which may be hurtful to the queen, my sister, they have written it altogether without my knowledge, and let them bear the punishment of their offence." Finally, she declared that, "being a queen, she ought to be believed on the word of a queen."—After the trial had lasted two days, the court broke up without pronouncing sentence; and adjourned to the 25th of October, then to meet at Westminster. This was done at the command of Elizabeth, who wished first to hear an account of its proceedings.

There can be very little doubt that Mary had a guilty knowledge of the intentions of Babington, and that she had corresponded with him: still this trial was a great injustice; for Elizabeth had no right or power over her, except what she derived from violence. If Mary had been guilty of no other crime than consenting to the assassination of the woman who had deprived her of liberty, and made her life, for nearly twenty years, one long scene of torture, we should hardly be justified in condemning her severely; for though wrong, her conduct would be at least natural. But the judges of the wretched queen were determined to shed her blood: they did not consider whether such an act was right or wrong: they deemed it necessary for the safety of Elizabeth and the Protestant religion, and acted accordingly. After they had left Fotheringay Castle, they met at the Star-Chamber in London, and there passed sentence of death upon the Scottish queen. At the same time, they published a declaration, "that the sentence did nowise derogate from the title and honour of James, King of Scotland; but that he was in the same place, degree, and right as if the sentence had never been pronounced."

Elizabeth knew that to send Mary to the scaffold would very likely be to bring on herself the hatred and disgust of foreign princes, and she professed to be very much grieved in consequence of the sentence that had been passed.—The parliament had been summoned for the 29th of October. It met on that day: the session was opened by commission; and the first business brought forward was the case of Mary, whose execution the queen was begged to hasten, as an acceptable sacrifice to God. Elizabeth assented to the justice of the act; but declared that she could not overcome the impulses of what she was pleased to call her merciful nature. A few days after, she sent a message to the two houses, requesting them to consider if some other means could not be adopted. The Lords and Commons answered that nothing else could be done to ensure the safety of her life and the religion and peace of the country. Elizabeth then ordered sentence of death against her unhappy cousin to be proclaimed in London. At this the people were so delighted that they illuminated the city, rang the bells, lighted bonfires in the streets, and finished their unchristian triumph over a miserable woman by psalms and thanksgivings.

Mary received the news of her doom, not only with resignation, but with heroism. The King of France sent an ambassador to expostulate with Elizabeth on the subject, but without effect. Mary's son, James, who had been crowned King of Scotland in 1578, and was now in his twentieth year, also interfered; but in so cold a manner that it rather encouraged Elizabeth in her intention of putting his mother to death, than in persuading her from it.

On the 1st of February, 1587, Elizabeth, tired of the entreaties of her ministers and her Protestant subjects, placed her signature to the warrant for Mary's death, and then gave it to her secretary, Davison, to take to the Lord Chancellor to be sealed. Before Davison left her presence, we are told that she desired him to write to Sir Amias Pawlet, the gaoler of Mary, and give him a hint to despatch the Queen of Scots privately, so as to avoid the odium of a public execution. Davison hesitated, but did as the queen bid him; but Sir Amias, though a bitter, cruel man, absolutely refused to commit what would have been a murder, not an execution. This charge against Elizabeth rests on two letters, brought to light under suspicious circumstances, more than 100 years after they were written; and there are grave doubts as to its truth.

The fatal warrant having been sealed, the council sent it to Fotheringay, and directed the Earl of Shrewsbury, the Earl of Kent, and Sir Amias Pawlet, to put it into immediate execution; although, according to the declarations of the queen, it was not to have been acted upon until further directions were given. But Davison, in an Apology for his conduct, says, his orders were to act promptly. However this was, no time was lost after the document was placed in Davison's hands. The Earls of Shrewsbury and Kent arrived at Fotheringay Castle on the 7th of February. They were taken to Mary's chamber; and after causing the warrant to be read, desired her to be prepared to die at eight o'clock the next morning. The sudden news did not in the least terrify her; she listened in calm dignity; and then signing herself with the cross, declared that the information was welcome to her, and that she should leave the scene of all her sorrows without regret. She then desired that her confessor might be allowed to attend her: but this request was denied; and the Earl of Kent, who was a rigid Puritan, and hated Mary because she was a Catholic, brutally told her that her death would be the life of their religion; as, on the contrary, her life would have been the death of it.

After the two nobles had retired, she ordered her attendants to hasten supper, that she might have more time to arrange her affairs in this world, and prepare for the next. She said it was necessary to take some refreshment, lest the failure of her strength should depress her spirits the next morning, and she should be led to betray any unworthy weakness. She partook of a scanty meal, conversing during the time with her attendants almost with cheerfulness. Turning to her physician, she exclaimed—"Is not the force of truth great? They pretend that I must die because I conspired against the queen's life; but the Earl of Kent avowed, that there was no other cause for my death than the fears which, if I should live, they entertain for their religion. My constancy in the faith is my real crime; the rest is only a colour invented by interested and designing men." After supper, she called for some wine, and drinking to all her attendants, desired them to do the same to her. Her afflicted servants fell upon their knees, and drank to her in this posture, shedding many tears, and imploring her pardon for any past neglect in their duties. She comforted them, and, in return, asked their pardon for her offences towards them.

After this affecting scene, she distributed her dresses and trinkets among her servants; and having written some letters, remained for some hours in prayer. At two o'clock she laid upon her bed, while one of her maids read to her from the Lives of the Saints. At six she remarked that she had but two hours to live, and rising, she completed her toilet, and went into the oratory with her servants to pray. A little before eight her physician persuaded her to take some bread and wine; and she had scarcely done so, when a tap at the door announced the arrival of the sheriff and his attendants.

Taking a little ivory crucifix from the altar, she left the room, conducted by the sheriff and two other gentlemen; for, by a refined cruelty, her servants were not permitted to follow her. At the foot of the staircase she was received by the Earls of Shrewsbury and Kent. Her old steward, Sir Robert Melville, was there also waiting to see her. Falling upon his knees, the old man burst into tears, and said with a voice almost choked with emotion—"Madam, it will be the most sorrowful message that ever I carried, when I shall report in Scotland that my queen and dear mistress is dead." Mary bore the fearful ordeal through which she was passing with heroic firmness; but the tears stood in her eyes as she replied—"You ought to rejoice rather than weep; for the end of Mary Stuart's troubles is now come. Thou knowest, Melville, that all this world is but vanity, and subject to more sorrow than an ocean of tears can wash away. Tell my friends that I die true to my religion, to Scotland, and to France. God forgive them that have thirsted for my blood as the hart longeth for the water-brooks! O God! thou who art the Author of all truth, and truth itself, thou knowest the inmost recesses of my heart!—thou knowest that I was ever desirous to preserve an entire union between Scotland and England, and to obviate the source of all these fatal discords. Commend me, Melville, to my son, and tell him that I have done nothing that may prejudice his kingdom of Scotland."

Having parted from Melville, she begged that her servants might attend her to the scaffold. To this the stern Earl of Kent objected, saying they would only trouble her, or perhaps seek to dip their handkerchiefs in her blood, to keep as relics, which could not be allowed. Mary promised they should do nothing of the sort; and, after some consultation, her request was granted. Four men-servants and two of her maids attended her; and the procession of death then moved slowly forward to the great hall of the castle, in which the scaffold had been erected.

Mary mounted the steps without any change of countenance, and seated herself on a low stool covered with black velvet. The Earls of Kent and Shrewsbury stood on either side of her, and before her was the executioner and his assistant, both dressed in black. After the warrant had been read, Dr. Fletcher, a Protestant clergyman, rose and began an address, in which, under pretence of religious consolation, he cruelly insulted the unhappy Mary. He had the assurance to say that the Queen of England had shown a tender care of her, and the bigotry to assert that, unless she changed her religion, she must expect in an instant to fall into utter darkness—into a place where there shall be weeping, howling, and gnashing of teeth. The queen interrupted him once or twice, and at length said earnestly, "Trouble not yourself any more about this matter. I was born in this religion; I have lived in this religion; and I will die in this religion."

Turning from the dean, the queen prayed first in Latin, and then in English. Her devotions being ended, the executioners knelt, and desired her to forgive them; on which she replied, "I forgive you with all my heart; for now I hope you shall make an end of all my troubles." After this she began to disrobe herself; for she had dressed that morning with unusual care, and wore a rich black satin dress, with a long veil of white crape, and a high Italian ruff. When she was stripped to her petticoat, her two maids again burst into tears; but she turned to them with a cheerful smile, and said, "Do not cry; I have promised you should not." Then her maid, Kennedy, bound a handkerchief over her eyes, and the assistant executioner led her to the block. Her last words were, "Into thy hands, O Lord, I commend my spirit!" The axe then descended; but the hand of the executioner trembled, and it took a second blow before the head fell with a hollow sound on the boards of the scaffold. As it did so, the dressing of lawn came off, and although Mary was but in her forty-fifth year, the hair was as grey as that of a person of seventy. It is related that her lips moved up and down for a quarter of an hour after the head was severed from her body.

The executioner lifted the bleeding head from the ground, and holding it at arm's length, cried out, "God save Queen Elizabeth!" The vindictive Dr. Fletcher added, "So perish all her enemies." The Earl of Kent alone answered, "Amen!" All the other spectators looked on in a pitying and awe-struck silence. When the body was about to be removed, Mary's little pet dog was found nestled under her clothes. It required some force to take the faithful creature away; but still it would not leave the corpse, laying down mournfully between the head and shoulders. The unhappy queen, the crimes of whose early life were almost forgotten in the heaped-up misery she afterwards suffered, had endured a sad dreary imprisonment in England of nearly twenty years. Her execution took place on the 8th of February, 1587.

When Queen Elizabeth was informed of Mary's death, she burst into tears, and put on deep mourning. She threw all the blame on Davison and her ministers, whom she declared were guilty of an unpardonable crime, in putting her dear sister and kinswoman to death, contrary to her fixed determination, as the warrant was not to have been executed till her further orders. She even caused her secretary, Davison, to be arrested and sent to the Tower, for letting the warrant go out of his hands. He was also tried for disobedience, and condemned to pay a fine of £10,000; and he remained in prison for seventeen years; indeed, until he was released in consequence of the death of the queen.

Elizabeth also wrote a letter of apology to Mary's son, James, the King of Scotland, in which she described the execution of his mother as an unhappy accident, and appealed to the Supreme Judge of heaven and earth to attest her innocence. She said she abhorred dissimulation, and deemed nothing more worthy of a prince than sincere and open conduct; adding, that she loved him more dearly than herself; and trusted that he would consider every one his enemy who endeavoured, on account of the sad accident that had occurred, to excite any animosity between them. On receiving the news of the death of his persecuted mother, James burst into tears, and threatened to raise an army to avenge her fate: but he soon cooled down; and when Elizabeth granted him an addition to the pension she had long been paying him, this heartless man said no more about the matter, but became better friends with the English queen than before. Elizabeth pacified the court of France by similar means; and if she did give Davison the warrant, with an intention that it should be immediately acted upon, it is impossible to imagine greater falsehood and deceit than she practised. On Davison's trial, Sir Roger Manwood, the Lord Chief Baron, said, that "the instrument was not so peremptory and irrevocable as he took it; nor a sufficient warrant for any kind of proceeding against the Scottish queen, neither by his associates, nor any other." We would rather suppose, therefore, that Davison erred through a misconception of his instructions, than that Elizabeth was the depraved hypocrite she must otherwise have been.

From the commencement of her reign, Elizabeth had been nominally at peace with Philip II., of Spain; but a bold seaman, Sir Francis Drake, with three others—Cavendish, Frobisher, and Hawkins—had made repeated descents on the Spanish colonies, and had plundered Spanish vessels in the West Indies, Spanish America, and the Pacific Ocean. These unjustifiable raids produced angry negotiations; but Elizabeth apologised, restored a part of the booty, and peace was preserved. The connection between the queen and the Protestants of the Netherlands, however, excited the anger of Philip; whilst his bigoted attachment to the Roman faith caused him eagerly to join with the pope, Pius V., in the desire to bring back England to the Catholic church. Before the death of Pius, Philip had commenced his armaments for the invasion of England; and at the close of 1586, he had numerous vessels, in almost every harbour in Spain, fitting out for a descent upon this country. His preparations came to the knowledge of Elizabeth; who, in April, 1587, sent Sir Francis Drake, with a small fleet, to destroy the Spanish ships. He entered the harbour of Cadiz on the 19th of April, where he burned or sunk about thirty ships. From there he proceeded to Cape St. Vincent, and on his way took or destroyed nearly seventy more; capturing, besides, a large treasure ship, one of the richest prizes ever taken. He then returned home in triumph; and these exploits delayed the intended expedition against England for upwards of a year.

Though checked, Philip did not cease from his exertions, and Elizabeth prepared for the coming blow. The royal navy of England did not amount to more than thirty-six ships, many of which were very small ones. But the whole mass of the people gladly came forward to serve their queen, and save their country. Many wealthy persons fitted out ships at their own expense; and all the great towns of England were required to furnish vessels. The citizens of London gave a remarkable proof of their loyalty and patriotism. Having asked how many ships they were expected to supply, it was answered fifteen, when they of their own accord cheerfully furnished double that number. But Elizabeth had something more than ships at her command: she had brave and talented seamen—men who had almost lived upon the ocean; who had seen it in its storms and its calms; who loved it as their homes; and firmly believed that upon its azure bosom the flag of England was always to triumph. These men were commanded by the brave and prudent Lord Howard of Effingham, and under him were such courageous and experienced captains as Drake, Hawkins, and Frobisher. So zealous was the preparation of the people, that the English navy soon consisted of a fleet of 191 vessels, manned by 17,400 seamen. A land force was also collected: many of the regiments were certainly very inexperienced; but the whole amounted to an enormous number.

As it was expected that the Spaniards would attempt to sail up the Thames and attack London, Gravesend was strongly fortified, and a great camp formed just opposite to that town, at Tilbury fort, where 22,000 foot, and 2,000 horse, were stationed, under the Earl of Leicester. Elizabeth appeared, and reviewed her troops. Her conduct was very fearless, and just the thing to inspire courage in the hearts of all who beheld her. Then, before the assembled army, while the Earls of Essex and Leicester held her bridle-rein, she delivered the following eloquent speech to her soldiers:—"My loving people, we have been persuaded by some that are careful of our safety, to take heed how we commit ourselves to armed multitudes, for fear of treachery; but I assure you I do not desire to live to distrust my faithful and loving people. Let tyrants fear; I have so behaved myself, that, under God, I have placed my chiefest strength and safeguard in the loyal hearts and good-will of my subjects. And therefore I am come amongst you at this time, not as for my recreation or sport, but being resolved, in the midst and heat of the battle, to live or die amongst you all; to lay down, for my God and for my kingdom, and for my people, my honour and my blood even in the dust. I know I have but the body of a feeble woman; but I have the heart of a king, and of a King of England too; and think foul scorn that Parma or Spain, or any prince of Europe, should dare to invade the borders of my realm! To which, rather than any dishonour should grow by me, I myself will take up arms; I myself will be your general, judge, and rewarder of every one of your virtues in the field. I know already, by your forwardness, that you have deserved rewards and crowns; and we do assure you, on the word of a prince, they shall be duly paid you. In the meantime my lieutenant-general shall be in my stead, than whom never prince commanded a more noble and worthy subject; not doubting by your obedience to my general, by your concord in the camp, and your valour in the field, we shall shortly have a famous victory over those enemies of my God, of my kingdom, and of my people."

Dr. Lingard and others say that the queen did not visit the camp till the 9th of August, when all danger was over; and doubt whether this speech, which would not have been applicable at that time, was ever delivered. In a tract, however, entitled Copy of a Letter to Mendoza, published in 1581, and reprinted in the Harleian Miscellany, the writer, who says he was an "eye-witness," speaks of her majesty's repeated visits to the Tilbury camp, "day by day" before the armada was seen, and of her being received "with cries, with shouts, with all tokens of love, of obedience, of readiness and willingness to fight for her." We therefore follow the chroniclers and historians, who say this speech was addressed to the soldiers when the prospect of an invasion was before them, and they expected to have to fight the enemy on their native soil.

It was not at Tilbury alone that troops were collected. The capital was defended by an army of 28,000 men, under Lord Hunsdon, and 10,000 of the inhabitants were also in arms. A celebrated Italian, Frederico Giambelli, had fortified the banks of the Thames; and men were stationed at different points along the eastern and southern coasts, so that there was not a spot on which a hostile descent could be made, where 20,000 men could not be concentrated in a few hours. When it was known, therefore, that Philip's preparations were complete, and that his fleet, which had been blessed by the pope, and was styled the INVINCIBLE ARMADA, comprised 131 vessels, carrying 2,431 guns, with 20,000 troops on board, exclusive of the seamen, no fear as to the result was felt by the people of England.

When the armada was ready to sail, before it put to sea, Philip sent a brief note to Elizabeth, demanding—1st. That no further aid should be given to the Protestants in the Netherlands. 2nd. That she should restore the treasure captured by Drake. 3rd. That she should acknowledge the supremacy of the pope. "I will obey you at the time of the Greek kalends," wrote Elizabeth; which, as the Greeks did not reckon by kalends, was a contemptuous refusal of his demands.

The armada was collected in the port of Lisbon: on the 29th of May it sailed; and a gallant sight it must have been to have seen those giant ships riding over the blue waves, with their streamers and flags spread proudly to the breeze. Hope beat high in the breast of every Spaniard, who believed that the proud island heretics would crouch for mercy beneath the weapons of his countrymen. This pride was soon to receive a check. The very next day a storm arose: the Spanish fleet was scattered; a few of the smallest ships sunk, and the remainder forced to put into Corunna to refit. There was great joy when this news reached England, where it was said that the enemy's ships had suffered so much, they could not possibly proceed on their expedition this year. Upon this, Elizabeth, who professed and practised economy with a view to save expense, issued an order, which might have led to the ruin both of herself and the country. She commanded a letter to be written to Lord Howard, the English admiral, directing him to lay up some of the larger ships, and to discharge their crews. That patriotic nobleman replied, that rather than dismantle any of his ships, he would take upon himself to disobey his mistress, and keep them afloat at his own cost. They first sailed for the Spanish coast, to ascertain the position of the armada; and saw, and gave chase to, fourteen Spanish ships. The wind changing, Howard returned to Plymouth; where, with the kindred Howards, Lord Thomas and Lord Charles, Lord Sheffield, Drake, Hawkins, Frobisher, and many other gallant men, he kept his crews on the alert—all eager to meet the enemy, and sustain the honour of the English flag.

The armada soon repaired its damages, and again put forth to sea. Philip's plan was, that his fleet should come over to this country, drive away the English ships that it met on its way (for he had no idea that they would dare to fight), then sail up the Thames, land the whole of the Spanish army, which included volunteers from the noblest families in Spain, and thus conquer England at one blow.

On the 12th of July the armada left Corunna, and, on the 20th, it appeared in sight of the English fleet: it was sailing majestically along, in the form of a crescent, and covering, from point to point, no less a space than seven miles. Lord Howard permitted it to advance up the Channel, and, falling behind, merely hung upon its rear, and harassed it with skirmishes. The Spanish ships, though very large, were also very clumsy; and soon a number of them were left behind the rest. This was exactly what the English admiral wanted: the entire fleet was too formidable for him to attack altogether; but when it was disunited, there was no such difficulty. The English ships attacked those of the enemy that had fallen behind, and in a little while one great Spanish galleon was made a mere wreck, and another taken. This skirmish gave great spirit to the English; for they found that the size and height of the Spanish vessels was a disadvantage to them. They were unmanageable; more exposed to the fire of the English; and their cannon were placed so high that they shot over the heads of the latter.

The Spaniards collected their straggling ships; and the two fleets met near Portsmouth on the 23rd of July, and fought nearly the whole day. Night separated the combatants; and though both sides had suffered considerably, neither had gained any great advantage. The Spaniards began to fear that the English would not be conquered quite so easily as they thought at first; but the action was renewed occasionally during several days, and, on the 27th, the armada anchored at Calais. It was placed there in such an excellent position, like a line of strong floating castles upon the sea, that the English admiral saw that he could not encounter it without great danger. He therefore thought of a stratagem, which was successful. Smearing eight small ships with pitch, and filling them with tar, resin, and gunpowder, he got two brave captains to take them secretly, during the darkness of the night, right up to the Spanish fleet. Having effected this dangerous feat, the captains took to their boats, fired the trains, and returned in safety.

The explosion threw the Spaniards into the greatest fear and confusion: cutting their cables, most of the ships were launched out to sea, without knowing where they were going. The fire-ships burnt out, and the Spanish admiral gave a signal that his vessels might return in safety; but many of them were driven far out to sea, or stranded on the coast of Flanders. When the sun again rose, the English attacked the disordered fleet, and a battle of savage ferocity took place. The Spaniards fought with great bravery; but the chances of war were against them: twelve of their ships were taken or destroyed, and others greatly injured.

Disheartened by this blow, and seeing that the English were more likely to capture him than he to subdue them, the Spanish admiral hoisted sail, and the so-called Invincible Armada prepared to return home in disgrace. But the troubles of these arrogant invaders, who presumed to dictate a religion to the English people, and threatened to take from them all liberty, both of body and soul, were not yet over. A high wind prevented their passage through the Channel; so they resolved to sail through the North Sea, round England and Ireland, and home to Spain by that roundabout way. For some time the English fleet followed them; and it is probable that, had it not used nearly all its powder, the whole of the armada would have been captured or destroyed. But a fate nearly as disastrous awaited it. As it passed the Orkney Islands it was overtaken by a fearful tempest; and it seemed to the zealous Protestants, that the unseen, mysterious hand of an offended God was raised to smite their enemies, and complete the destruction that man had begun.

The Spanish sailors were struck with terror: they were unacquainted with the seas in those parts; their great ships were unmanageable; and they feared each hour to be thrown upon hidden rocks or quick-sands. In despair they yielded to the fury of the storm, and let their vessels drive without control. Some were wrecked upon the western isles of Scotland; some upon the shores of Norway; others were driven upon the Irish coast: and others sank with their miserable crews beneath the surging waves of the ocean. The fate of those poor wretches who reached the shore was scarcely better than that of those who perished at sea. In Scotland they were seized as prisoners, and in Ireland brutally murdered. Of the 131 vessels that sailed so proudly from Spain, only about 60 returned to it, and those in a miserably-shattered condition. The soldiers and sailors in them were so worn out with hardships and sickness, that they looked as if they had been the sweepings of hospitals, instead of the flower of the manhood of their nation. They excused their sad defeat and failure by wild tales of the desperate valour of the English, and of the stormy seas by which they were surrounded.

Though Philip was extremely hurt by this richly-deserved punishment, yet he received the news with remarkable fortitude. Falling upon his knees, he expressed himself resigned to the will of God, and thankful that the calamity was not greater. The Spanish priests who had blessed the expedition, and predicted its certain success, were at first much abashed. They were at a loss to understand how a Catholic king should have been thoroughly beaten by a nation of heretics. The lesson might have taught them some humility and toleration; but it only sharpened their bigotry and love of persecution. Soon recovering their usual confidence, they pretended that the Deity had suffered so great a calamity to fall upon the Spanish people, because they had permitted the infidel Moors to live amongst them.

CHAPTER LXIV.

CONCLUSION OF THE REIGN OF QUEEN ELIZABETH.—A.D. 1588—1603.

NOT long after the armada had been destroyed, the Earl of Leicester, Elizabeth's profligate favourite, was taken suddenly ill, and died on the 4th of September, 1588. Fond as she had once been of him, she did not regret him much. Her eye had been caught and her fancy captivated by another nobleman—the young, handsome, and accomplished Earl of Essex.

The winter of 1588 passed away; and, in February, 1589, parliament and convocation assembled. The expenses connected with the threatened invasion by Spain were laid before them; and the Commons, in anticipation of a renewed attempt on the part of Philip, voted a liberal supply.—At that time the English people longed to revenge themselves on the Spaniards for the alarm they had put them to. Elizabeth shared this feeling; and she took up the cause of Don Antonio, a Portuguese refugee of royal blood, who had some claim to the crown of that country, which was then under Spanish rule. But though she supported Antonio, she had not the means to aid him, as she had expended all her money, contracted a large debt, and needed the supply voted by parliament for other purposes. Upon this, a number of her subjects, at the head of whom was Sir Francis Drake, took the chief expense of the expedition upon themselves.

In a short time a fleet of 200 vessels, with Don Antonio on board, sailed to claim the crown of Portugal, and to take revenge upon the Spaniards. Drake and his companions first sailed to Corunna, where they burnt some ships of war, defeated an army of about 5,000 men, and gave the lower town to the flames. They afterwards proceeded to Lisbon; but that city contained a strong Spanish garrison, and the people were afraid to rise in favour of Don Antonio. Sickness and famine also appeared among the English; so that, after having inflicted some great cruelties, and experienced many sufferings, they were glad to sail home again, with a loss of about half their number.

For several subsequent years England was quiet; and few events of great historical importance took place, though the English fleets continually punished the Spanish king by attacking his vessels, and by other warlike actions. But Philip of Spain had recovered his spirits; and there was a talk of invading England with another tremendous army. The gallant Lord Howard of Effingham, who had repulsed the armada, thought that a new attack upon the Spanish coast would be the best means of striking terror into Philip, and making him keep a respectful distance from the white cliffs of old England. Accordingly, on the 1st of June, 1596, a noble fleet of 150 vessels, with 14,000 land troops on board of them, started from Plymouth, and sailed to the bay of Cadiz, where, having fought their way into the harbour, in defiance of a terrible firing from batteries and men-of-war, a fierce sea-fight took place. After a severe struggle, which lasted for six hours, the Spanish ships were obliged to give way, three of the largest of them being taken, and about fifty others plundered and burnt. The English mariners had fulfilled their errand of destruction; and the Earl of Essex, who commanded the land troops, resolved to imitate their example. Landing his soldiers, he attacked the city of Cadiz with impetuous fury, and forced it to surrender at the point of the sword. He permitted the inhabitants to ransom their lives; but all their wealth and rich merchandise fell into the hands of the victors. Such was the importance and riches of the city, that it was calculated the loss suffered by the Spaniards amounted to the enormous sum of 20,000,000 of dollars. The Earl of Essex, to whom this success was mainly owing, was a brave, enthusiastic young soldier; but he was quite as reckless as brave. He wished to remain at Cadiz, and keep it for the English as a means to help them to other conquests; but Lord Howard and the rest thought enough had been done, and insisted on returning home.

King Philip was extremely annoyed at the destruction of his wealthy city; and, although he so constantly got the worst of it, was not quite tired of fighting yet. To revenge the ruin of Cadiz, he prepared for another invasion of England, and the English government again collected vessels for the purpose of striking the first blow. On the 9th of July, 1597, a powerful English fleet sailed once more from Plymouth, under the command of the Earl of Essex, whose desperate valour had caused him to be regarded as a hero. But he was not quite so fortunate this time as in his former expedition. His ships were driven back by a storm; and so much time was lost in consequence, that when the fleet sailed again, on the 17th of August, he was unable to attack the Spanish coast. He succeeded, however, in capturing three large treasure-ships of that nation returning from Havannah, and valued at £100,000. Still his expedition was considered a failure in England; and when he returned, the queen received him in a stern and very cold manner. The favourite was a man of high spirit, and he retired from court in a fit of ill-temper. Elizabeth was so attached to him that she felt quite unhappy in his absence, and caused him to return by promoting him to the dignity of Earl-Marshal of England.

A peace with Spain was now talked about; but Essex strongly opposed it; and his reasons were thought so important, that although the war was not continued, no treaty of peace was entered into. Soon afterwards, on the 13th of September, 1598, Elizabeth's arch enemy, the bigoted tyrant, Philip of Spain, died in his seventy-first year. Elizabeth's famous minister, the wise and prudent Lord Burleigh, who had directed her councils for forty years, also went to his grave a short time before, at the age of seventy-eight; he died on the 4th of August. The queen was so much affected at the death of her old servant, that she shed tears. His son, Sir Robert Cecil, continued to serve her, and became in his turn a celebrated statesman.

Before Lord Burleigh died, the Earl of Essex had a curious quarrel with the queen. In a debate about the affairs of Ireland, which took place in her cabinet, Elizabeth spoke to the earl with that abusive sharpness which was common to her. Hurt by her words, he forgot the duty he owed to his sovereign and the politeness due to a lady, and turned his back upon her in contempt. Elizabeth's keen eyes flashed with anger at this insult, and giving her favourite a hearty box of the ears, she told him, in language more forcible than graceful, to go to the devil. The fiery young noble was filled with astonishment; and placing his hand on his sword, he swore he would not have taken such an insult even from her father, Henry VIII., himself. With these words he abruptly left the room, and retired, chafing with passion, to his country-house. One of his friends wrote begging him to return and sue for the queen's pardon. Essex sent a refusal; and he kept from court till Elizabeth (though much offended, as she was excessively fond of the most submissive attentions) recalled him, as she, no doubt, missed the compliments and sprightliness of her handsome favourite.

Ireland had long been an enormous trouble and expense to the English queen; and at this time the wild chieftains of that country were engaged in a rebellious war against her authority. Headed by the Earl of Tyrone, they had been fortunate enough to defeat a small English army, and were so delighted at their unexpected victory, that they resolved to drive the English altogether out of the country.

Alarmed at the serious turn things had taken, the queen sent the Earl of Essex to Ireland, with the title of governor of that country, and an army of 16,000 foot and 1,300 horse. She thought that, with such a force, so brave a soldier as Essex would soon compel the rebels to submit in tranquillity. The earl—who left London for Dublin at the end of March, 1599—was rather a brave man than a wise general; and, although he did his best, he was unable to conquer the powerful Tyrone, with whom, at last, on account of the sickness of his troops and their dread of the enemy, he was compelled to enter into a truce, which was concluded on the 8th of September. When Elizabeth heard of this ill-success she was extremely enraged, and being also offended at some peevish letters he had written to her and her council, she sent him a stern rebuke; but told him to remain in Ireland until he received her further commands.

The impatient noble feared that he should altogether lose the favour of the queen; and to prevent that, he determined to run the risk of disobeying her orders. He started instantly for England, and, on the 28th of September, arrived at the court before any one had become aware of his intentions. It was but ten in the morning, when Essex, splashed with mud, disordered by travelling, and a little excited with wine, passed through the rooms of state, and actually entered into the queen's bed-chamber. She had not long risen, and was sitting with her hair hanging over her face. Falling on his knees, he kissed her hand, and the coquettish old queen smiled and spoke kindly to the man for whom she had once felt a feeling of tenderness and attachment. Surprised as she was, still her manner was so gracious, that as the earl left her apartments, he was heard to thank God that though he had suffered much trouble, and many storms abroad, he had found a sweet calm at home.

Sir Robert Cecil, Lord Burleigh's son, hated Essex; and that day when he attended the queen, he represented that Essex had acted in direct opposition to her commands, in returning to England, and leaving Ireland in confusion. Elizabeth at once saw that her partiality for the earl had led her into a momentary forgetfulness of his fault; and, as she never suffered her attachments to master her judgment, when Essex waited upon her in the afternoon, he found the manner of his mistress changed. She called him to account for his conduct; and, in an imperative manner, commanded him to consider himself a prisoner in his own room. The next day he was examined before the lords of the council, and although his conduct was calm and submissive, he was committed to the custody of the lord-keeper.

Grief and disappointed ambition soon threw him into so severe an illness, that his life was in danger. On hearing this, the queen's affection returned for a time, and she sent her own physician to attend upon him, and also to say, that, if she thought such a step proper and consistent with her dignity, she would visit him herself. This royal attention was very consoling to the earl, and he soon began to recover; but his enemies persuaded the queen that his illness was all a sham to move her pity; and although she liberated him from confinement, she became almost as cold and stern as before. In his distress he sent to her a very humble letter, which ended with these words—"This farther degree of goodness doth sound in my ears as if your majesty spake these words: 'Die not, Essex, for though I punish thy offence, and humble thee for thy good, yet will I one day be served again by thee.' My prostrate soul makes this answer: 'I hope for that blessed day.' And in expectation of it, all my afflictions of body and mind are humbly, patiently, and cheerfully borne by me."

The constant accounts which the queen received of the disorders in Ireland, kept up her anger against the earl. Accordingly, she subjected him to a sort of trial before her privy council, which sentenced him to be deprived of his offices, and confined to his own house during her majesty's pleasure. Nor did her anger end here: he had long possessed a monopoly of sweet wines; and this privilege brought him in an immense sum of money. The royal patent by which he held this monopoly having expired, he petitioned the queen to renew it. His fortune had been so much injured by his extravagance and misfortunes, that its renewal was necessary to save him from ruin. The stern queen, however, denied his request, saying, in a contemptuous manner, that, in order to manage an ungovernable brute, he must be stinted in his provender.

This severity made the impetuous Essex desperate; and he entered into a wild, foolish conspiracy to remove Sir Robert Cecil and other courtiers, who were his enemies, forcibly from the presence of the queen. He was much loved by the people on account of his bravery and generosity, and he did all he could to win their affection more strongly. He secretly corresponded with the Catholics, and paid open court to their extreme foes, the Puritans; and he even went so far as to write to King James of Scotland, urging him to insist on an open declaration, by Elizabeth, of his right to succeed her. In his folly, he laughed at the person of the queen, saying publicly, that she was an old woman, and had grown as crooked in her mind as she was in her body. Elizabeth, who was in her sixty-eighth year, and still had the absurd vanity to believe she was extremely beautiful, was very irritated at this rude remark. She knew also of his secret correspondence; of his having formed a plan for seizing the palace; compelling her to summon a parliament; remove his enemies from her person, and remodel the government: and, on the 7th of February, 1601, she sent a command to him to appear before her privy council.

To go would have been to surrender himself to certain punishment, and probably to death, as a traitor. What should he do? His mind was soon made up to dare the worst; and the day after receiving the message he collected several noblemen and 300 gentlemen at his house. This desperate party was about to sally forth on some wild scheme (probably to attempt to seize the palace), when Egerton, the chancellor, presented himself, accompanied by the Earl of Worcester, Sir William Knollys, and the Lord Chief Justice Popham. Essex admitted them by a wicket-gate, but would not suffer their attendants to enter. On informing him that they came from her majesty, to demand the cause of such a tumultuous meeting, the passionate earl replied—"There is a plot laid for my life; letters have been forged in my name; men have been hired to murder me in my bed; mine enemies cannot be satisfied unless they suck my blood." The chief justice said he should explain his case, and the queen would act with impartiality; but such a tumult arose among the earl's followers, who wished to kill the messengers from the queen, that he placed them in an inner room for safety, and having bolted them in, set a guard over them.

The earl then rushed into the streets with his drawn sword in his hand, and was followed by most of his wild associates. Hurrying into the city, he called out —"For the queen! for the queen! a plot is laid for my life!" The citizens flock around in amazement, and many cried, "God bless your honour!" but none of them armed in his cause. Thus disappointed he went to the house of one of the sheriffs, and stopped there about two hours, debating what was best to be done. It ended in his resolving to return to Essex House; but he found the streets barricaded, and guarded by companies of armed men. A skirmish took place; several persons lost their lives; and the earl contrived to reach the river, enter a boat, and regain his own house. The doomed noble fortified the building (which was soon surrounded by an armed force), and resolved to stand on his own defence. At length some pieces of cannon were pointed against the edifice, and he surrendered.

Conduct of this character could not lightly be passed over; and Essex and his friend, Lord Southampton, who had shared in his insurrection, were, on the 19th of February, placed upon their trial as traitors. Essex pleaded not guilty, and called the Deity to witness that he had done nothing except in his own defence. But his treasonable actions had been committed in open day, in the sight of all men; and, as might have been expected, he was sentenced to suffer death as a traitor. Essex acted as if he expected this fate, saying that though he would not despise the mercy of the queen, he would make no cringing submission to obtain it. Southampton behaved very submissively, and, although he met the same sentence as his friend, was afterwards pardoned.

There was one event connected with this trial that must be deplored by every one who regrets that the loftiest human genius should be contaminated by the basest ingratitude. Francis Bacon, afterwards the great philosopher, Lord Bacon, though not one of the crown lawyers, voluntarily appeared as a prosecutor of the earl. That nobleman had been his patron and kindest friend, and had acted towards him with a generosity actually romantic. Having, on one occasion, vainly begged for Bacon the office of solicitor-general, the open-hearted noble presented him with an estate near Twickenham, worth about £2,000, to make up for the disappointment. Yet this very man, to obtain the queen's favour, did not hesitate to do all he could to procure the condemnation of one who had acted towards him in so liberal and kindly a manner. He compared the conduct of Essex to that of Pisistratus the Athenian, who, pretending to be in danger of assassination, inflicted some wounds upon himself, and having made the people believe that his enemies had done the violence, obtained a guard of soldiers to protect him, by whose assistance he afterwards established tyranny in his country. Well might Alexander Pope, a poet of a later age, exclaim—

"See how Bacon shined,
The wisest, greatest, meanest of mankind."

The unfortunate Essex was privately beheaded in the Tower, on the 25th of February, 1601. He bore his fate with calmness and dignity, and was much pitied by the nation. He was only thirty-four years old when, by his rashness and violence, he fell a victim to the offended laws of his country. He was a man of many talents, much literary taste, and a writer of great elegance and power. It is said that the queen was much grieved at his fate, and hesitated for a long time before she could prevail on herself to sign his death-warrant. Some momentary pang she might have felt; but her tenderness for him had long departed, and the stories about her anguish in consequence of his execution, appear to be without foundation. Some of Essex's friends and dependents were afterwerds put to death as accomplices in his treason. The unhappy earl had been so much beloved by the people, that the queen lost much of her popularity by his death.

On the 27th of October, 1601, Elizabeth met her last parliament. The brown shrivelled leaves, which every gust of wind swept from the almost bared branches of the trees, was a type of her condition. Age had done its work; and, although she was dressed more magnificently than ever, she was suffering from the decay of her constitution; her eye was dim, her hand trembled, and her step was feeble. The war in Ireland, which was not yet concluded, had cost her enormous sums, and she was extremely in want of money. This the Commons did not grudge her; but the reforming spirit was active amongst them, and they came prepared for a struggle. For some years the nation had been groaning under an oppression so monstrous, that at last it could scarcely be borne. This was the system of monopolies. The queen had, from time to time, rewarded the services of her servants or courtiers by granting them patents, which secured to them an exclusive right of selling some particular commodity, and of charging what price they pleased for it. These monopolies were exercised in a very extortionate manner, and a check was put upon all industry and commerce.—So impudent were some holders of them, that in certain places salt was raised from 1s. 4*d*. a bushel to 11*s*. or 15*s*. Many of the articles most necessary for subsistence or comfort were given over to some rapacious courtiers. Wine, coals, iron, lead, saltpetre, currants, starch, oil, glass, paper, leather, and other such things, were included in the list. When an account was read to the house, one member asked if bread was not in the number? "Bread!" cried every one with surprise. "Yes, I assure you," continued he, "if affairs go on at this rate, we shall have bread reduced to a monopoly before next parliament."

The Commons had, some time before, presented a petition to the queen against these monstrous abuses, or rather robberies of the people; but she had returned a stern refusal, and protected her courtiers in their oppressions. On the 20th of November, therefore, Mr. Laurence Hyde brought in a bill, the object of which was to prevent letters patent, granting monopolies, from being issued. For four days a violent debate took place in the house on this bill—such a debate as had never occurred within its walls before; and it was felt that the temper of the house threatened oratory with her servants to pray. A little before eight her physician persuaded her to take some bread and wine; and she had scarcely done so, when a tap at the door announced the arrival of the sheriff and his attendants.

Taking a little ivory crucifix from the altar, she left the room, conducted by the sheriff and two other gentlemen; for, by a refined cruelty, her servants were not permitted to follow her. At the foot of the staircase she was received by the Earls of Shrewsbury and Kent. Her old steward, Sir Robert Melville, was there also waiting to see her. Falling upon his knees, the old man burst into tears, and said with a voice almost choked with emotion—"Madam, it will be the most sorrowful message that ever I carried, when I shall report in Scotland that my queen and dear mistress is dead." Mary bore the fearful ordeal through which she was passing with heroic firmness; but the tears stood in her eyes as she replied—"You ought to rejoice rather than weep; for the end of Mary Stuart's troubles is now come. Thou knowest, Melville, that all this world is but vanity, and subject to more sorrow than an ocean of tears can wash away. Tell my friends that I die true to my religion, to Scotland, and to France. God forgive them that have thirsted for my blood as the hart longeth for the water-brooks! O God! thou who art the Author of all truth, and truth itself, thou knowest the inmost recesses of my heart!—thou knowest that I was ever desirous to preserve an entire union between Scotland and England, and to obviate the source of all these fatal discords. Commend me, Melville, to my son, and tell him that I have done nothing that may prejudice his kingdom of Scotland."

Having parted from Melville, she begged that her servants might attend her to the scaffold. To this the stern Earl of Kent objected, saying they would only trouble her, or perhaps seek to dip their handkerchiefs in her blood, to keep as relics, which could not be allowed. Mary promised they should do nothing of the sort; and, after some consultation, her request was granted. Four men-servants and two of her maids attended her; and the procession of death then moved slowly forward to the great hall of the castle, in which the scaffold had been erected.

Mary mounted the steps without any change of countenance, and seated herself on a low stool covered with black velvet. The Earls of Kent and Shrewsbury stood on either side of her, and before her was the executioner and his assistant, both dressed in black. After the warrant had been read, Dr. Fletcher, a Protestant clergyman, rose and began an address, in which, under pretence of religious consolation, he cruelly insulted the unhappy Mary. He had the assurance to say that the Queen of England had shown a tender care of her, and the bigotry to assert that, unless she changed her religion, she must expect in an instant to fall into utter darkness—into a place where there shall be weeping, howling, and gnashing of teeth. The queen interrupted him once or twice, and at length said earnestly, "Trouble not yourself any more about this matter. I was born in this religion; I have lived in this religion; and I will die in this religion."

Turning from the dean, the queen prayed first in Latin, and then in English. Her devotions being ended, the executioners knelt, and desired her to forgive them; on which she replied, "I forgive you with all my heart; for now I hope you shall make an end of all my troubles." After this she began to disrobe herself; for she had dressed that morning with unusual care, and wore a rich black satin dress, with a long veil of white crape, and a high Italian ruff. When she was stripped to her petticoat, her two maids again burst into tears; but she turned to them with a cheerful smile, and said, "Do not cry; I have promised you should not." Then her maid, Kennedy, bound a handkerchief over her eyes, and the assistant executioner led her to the block. Her last words were, "Into thy hands, O Lord, I commend my spirit!" The axe then descended; but the hand of the executioner trembled, and it took a second blow before the head fell with a hollow sound on the boards of the scaffold. As it did so, the dressing of lawn came off, and although Mary was but in her forty-fifth year, the hair was as grey as that of a person of seventy. It is related that her lips moved up and down for a quarter of an hour after the head was severed from her body.

The executioner lifted the bleeding head from the ground, and holding it at arm's length, cried out, "God save Queen Elizabeth!" The vindictive Dr. Fletcher added, "So perish all her enemies." The Earl of Kent alone answered, "Amen!" All the other spectators looked on in a pitying and awe-struck silence. When the body was about to be removed, Mary's little pet dog was found nestled under her clothes. It required some force to take the faithful creature away; but still it would not leave the corpse, laying down mournfully between the head and shoulders. The unhappy queen, the crimes of whose early life were almost forgotten in the heaped-up misery she afterwards suffered, had endured a sad dreary imprisonment in England of nearly twenty years. Her execution took place on the 8th of February, 1587.

When Queen Elizabeth was informed of Mary's death, she burst into tears, and put on deep mourning. She threw all the blame on Davison and her ministers, whom she declared were guilty of an unpardonable crime, in putting her dear sister and kinswoman to death, contrary to her fixed determination, as the warrant was not to have been executed till her further orders. She even caused her secretary, Davison, to be arrested and sent to the Tower, for letting the warrant go out of his hands. He was also tried for disobedience, and condemned to pay a fine of £10,000; and he remained in prison for seventeen years; indeed, until he was released in consequence of the death of the queen.

Elizabeth also wrote a letter of apology to Mary's son, James, the King of Scotland, in which she described the execution of his mother as an unhappy accident, and appealed to the Supreme Judge of heaven and earth to attest her innocence. She said she abhorred dissimulation, and deemed nothing more worthy of a prince than sincere and open conduct; adding, that she loved him more dearly than herself; and trusted that he would consider every one his enemy who endeavoured, on account of the sad accident that had occurred, to excite any animosity between them. On receiving the news of the death of his persecuted mother, James burst into tears, and threatened to raise an army to avenge her fate: but he soon cooled down; and when Elizabeth granted him an addition to the pension she had long been paying him, this heartless man said no more about the matter, but became better friends with the English queen than before. Elizabeth pacified the court of France by similar means; and if she did give Davison the warrant, with an intention that it should be immediately acted upon, it is impossible to imagine greater falsehood and deceit than she practised. On Davison's trial, Sir Roger Manwood, the Lord Chief Baron, said, that "the instrument was not so peremptory and irrevocable as he took it; nor a sufficient warrant for any kind of proceeding against the Scottish queen, neither by his associates, nor any other." We would rather suppose, therefore, that Davison erred through a misconception of his instructions, than that Elizabeth was the depraved hypocrite she must otherwise have been.

From the commencement of her reign, Elizabeth had been nominally at peace with Philip II., of Spain; but a bold seaman, Sir Francis Drake, with three others—Cavendish, Frobisher, and Hawkins—had made repeated descents on the Spanish colonies, and had plundered Spanish vessels in the West Indies, Spanish America, and the Pacific Ocean. These unjustifiable raids produced angry negotiations; but Elizabeth apologised, restored a part of the booty, and peace was preserved. The connection between the queen and the Protestants of the Netherlands, however, excited the anger of Philip; whilst his bigoted attachment to the Roman faith caused him eagerly to join with the pope, Pius V., in the desire to bring back England to the Catholic church. Before the death of Pius, Philip had commenced his armaments for the invasion of England; and at the close of 1586, he had numerous vessels, in almost every harbour in Spain, fitting out for a descent upon this country. His preparations came to the knowledge of Elizabeth; who, in April, 1587, sent Sir Francis Drake, with a small fleet, to destroy the Spanish ships. He entered the harbour of Cadiz on the 19th of April, where he burned or sunk about thirty ships. From there he proceeded to Cape St. Vincent, and on his way took or destroyed nearly seventy more; capturing, besides, a large treasure ship, one of the richest prizes ever taken. He then returned home in triumph; and these exploits delayed the intended expedition against England for upwards of a year.

Though checked, Philip did not cease from his exertions, and Elizabeth prepared for the coming blow. The royal navy of England did not amount to more than thirty-six ships, many of which were very small ones. But the whole mass of the people gladly came forward to serve their queen, and save their country. Many wealthy persons fitted out ships at their own expense; and all the great towns of England were required to furnish vessels. The citizens of London gave a remarkable proof of their loyalty and patriotism. Having asked how many ships they were expected to supply, it was answered fifteen, when they of their own accord cheerfully furnished double that number. But Elizabeth had something more than ships at her command: she had brave and talented seamen—men who had almost lived upon the ocean; who had seen it in its storms and its calms; who loved it as their homes; and firmly believed that upon its azure bosom the flag of England was always to triumph. These men were commanded by the brave and prudent Lord Howard of Effingham, and under him were such courageous and experienced captains as Drake, Hawkins, and Frobisher. So zealous was the preparation of the people, that the English navy soon consisted of a fleet of 191 vessels, manned by 17,400 seamen. A land force was also collected: many of the regiments were certainly very inexperienced; but the whole amounted to an enormous number.

As it was expected that the Spaniards would attempt to sail up the Thames and attack London, Gravesend was strongly fortified, and a great camp formed just opposite to that town, at Tilbury fort, where 22,000 foot, and 2,000 horse, were stationed, under the Earl of Leicester. Elizabeth appeared, and reviewed her troops. Her conduct was very fearless, and just the thing to inspire courage in the hearts of all who beheld her. Then, before the assembled army, while the Earls of Essex and Leicester held her bridle-rein, she delivered the following eloquent speech to her soldiers:—"My loving people, we have been persuaded by some that are careful of our safety, to take heed how we commit ourselves to armed multitudes, for fear of treachery; but I assure you I do not desire to live to distrust my faithful and loving people. Let tyrants fear; I have so behaved myself, that, under God, I have placed my chiefest strength and safeguard in the loyal hearts and good-will of my subjects. And therefore I am come amongst you at this time, not as for my recreation or sport, but being resolved, in the midst and heat of the battle, to live or die amongst you all; to lay down, for my God and for my kingdom, and for my people, my honour and my blood even in the dust. I know I have but the body of a feeble woman; but I have the heart of a king, and of a King of England too; and think foul scorn that Parma or Spain, or any prince of Europe, should dare to invade the borders of my realm! To which, rather than any dishonour should grow by me, I myself will take up arms; I myself will be your general, judge, and rewarder of every one of your virtues in the field. I know already, by your forwardness, that you have deserved rewards and crowns; and we do assure you, on the word of a prince, they shall be duly paid you. In the meantime my lieutenant-general shall be in my stead, than whom never prince commanded a more noble and worthy subject; not doubting by your obedience to my general, by your concord in the camp, and your valour in the field, we shall shortly have a famous victory over those enemies of my God, of my kingdom, and of my people."

Dr. Lingard and others say that the queen did not visit the camp till the 9th of August, when all danger was over; and doubt whether this speech, which would not have been applicable at that time, was ever delivered. In a tract, however, entitled Copy of a Letter to Mendoza, published in 1581, and reprinted in the Harleian Miscellany, the writer, who says he was an "eye-witness," speaks of her majesty's repeated visits to the Tilbury camp, "day by day" before the armada was seen, and of her being received "with cries, with shouts, with all tokens of love, of obedience, of readiness and willingness to fight for her." We therefore follow the chroniclers and historians, who say this speech was addressed to the soldiers when the prospect of an invasion was before them, and they expected to have to fight the enemy on their native soil.

It was not at Tilbury alone that troops were collected. The capital was defended by an army of 28,000 men, under Lord Hunsdon, and 10,000 of the inhabitants were also in arms. A celebrated Italian, Frederico Giambelli, had fortified the banks of the Thames; and men were stationed at different points along the eastern and southern coasts, so that there was not a spot on which a hostile descent could be made, where 20,000 men could not be concentrated in a few hours. When it was known, therefore, that Philip's preparations were complete, and that his fleet, which had been blessed by the pope, and was styled the INVINCIBLE ARMADA, comprised 131 vessels, carrying 2,431 guns, with 20,000 troops on board, exclusive of the seamen, no fear as to the result was felt by the people of England.

When the armada was ready to sail, before it put to sea, Philip sent a brief note to Elizabeth, demanding—1st. That no further aid should be given to the Protestants in the Netherlands. 2nd. That she should restore the treasure captured by Drake. 3rd. That she should acknowledge the supremacy of the pope. "I will obey you at the time of the Greek kalends," wrote Elizabeth; which, as the Greeks did not reckon by kalends, was a contemptuous refusal of his demands.

The armada was collected in the port of Lisbon: on the 29th of May it sailed; and a gallant sight it must have been to have seen those giant ships riding over the blue waves, with their streamers and flags spread proudly to the breeze. Hope beat high in the breast of every Spaniard, who believed that the proud island heretics would crouch for mercy beneath the weapons of his countrymen. This pride was soon to receive a check. The very next day a storm arose: the Spanish fleet was scattered; a few of the smallest ships sunk, and the remainder forced to put into Corunna to refit. There was great joy when this news reached England, where it was said that the enemy's ships had suffered so much, they could not possibly proceed on their expedition this year. Upon this, Elizabeth, who professed and practised economy with a view to save expense, issued an order, which might have led to the ruin both of herself and the country. She commanded a letter to be written to Lord Howard, the English admiral, directing him to lay up some of the larger ships, and to discharge their crews. That patriotic nobleman replied, that rather than dismantle any of his ships, he would take upon himself to disobey his mistress, and keep them afloat at his own cost. They first sailed for the Spanish coast, to ascertain the position of the armada; and saw, and gave chase to, fourteen Spanish ships. The wind changing, Howard returned to Plymouth; where, with the kindred Howards, Lord Thomas and Lord Charles, Lord Sheffield, Drake, Hawkins, Frobisher, and many other gallant men, he kept his crews on the alert—all eager to meet the enemy, and sustain the honour of the English flag.

The armada soon repaired its damages, and again put forth to sea. Philip's plan was, that his fleet should come over to this country, drive away the English ships that it met on its way (for he had no idea that they would dare to fight), then sail up the Thames, land the whole of the Spanish army, which included volunteers from the noblest families in Spain, and thus conquer England at one blow.

On the 12th of July the armada left Corunna, and, on the 20th, it appeared in sight of the English fleet: it was sailing majestically along, in the form of a crescent, and covering, from point to point, no less a space than seven miles. Lord Howard permitted it to advance up the Channel, and, falling behind, merely hung upon its rear, and harassed it with skirmishes. The Spanish ships, though very large, were also very clumsy; and soon a number of them were left behind the rest. This was exactly what the English admiral wanted: the entire fleet was too formidable for him to attack altogether; but when it was disunited, there was no such difficulty. The English ships attacked those of the enemy that had fallen behind, and in a little while one great Spanish galleon was made a mere wreck, and another taken. This skirmish gave great spirit to the English; for they found that the size and height of the Spanish vessels was a disadvantage to them. They were unmanageable; more exposed to the fire of the English; and their cannon were placed so high that they shot over the heads of the latter.

The Spaniards collected their straggling ships; and the two fleets met near Portsmouth on the 23rd of July, and fought nearly the whole day. Night separated the combatants; and though both sides had suffered considerably, neither had gained any great advantage. The Spaniards began to fear that the English would not be conquered quite so easily as they thought at first; but the action was renewed occasionally during several days, and, on the 27th, the armada anchored at Calais. It was placed there in such an excellent position, like a line of strong floating castles upon the sea, that the English admiral saw that he could not encounter it without great danger. He therefore thought of a stratagem, which was successful. Smearing eight small ships with pitch, and filling them with tar, resin, and gunpowder, he got two brave captains to take them secretly, during the darkness of the night, right up to the Spanish fleet. Having effected this dangerous feat, the captains took to their boats, fired the trains, and returned in safety.

The explosion threw the Spaniards into the greatest fear and confusion: cutting their cables, most of the ships were launched out to sea, without knowing where they were going. The fire-ships burnt out, and the Spanish admiral gave a signal that his vessels might return in safety; but many of them were driven far out to sea, or stranded on the coast of Flanders. When the sun again rose, the English attacked the disordered fleet, and a battle of savage ferocity took place. The Spaniards fought with great bravery; but the chances of war were against them: twelve of their ships were taken or destroyed, and others greatly injured.

Disheartened by this blow, and seeing that the English were more likely to capture him than he to subdue them, the Spanish admiral hoisted sail, and the so-called Invincible Armada prepared to return home in disgrace. But the troubles of these arrogant invaders, who presumed to dictate a religion to the English people, and threatened to take from them all liberty, both of body and soul, were not yet over. A high wind prevented their passage through the Channel; so they resolved to sail through the North Sea, round England and Ireland, and home to Spain by that roundabout way. For some time the English fleet followed them; and it is probable that, had it not used nearly all its powder, the whole of the armada would have been captured or destroyed. But a fate nearly as disastrous awaited it. As it passed the Orkney Islands it was overtaken by a fearful tempest; and it seemed to the zealous Protestants, that the unseen, mysterious hand of an offended God was raised to smite their enemies, and complete the destruction that man had begun.

The Spanish sailors were struck with terror: they were unacquainted with the seas in those parts; their great ships were unmanageable; and they feared each hour to be thrown upon hidden rocks or quicksands. In despair they yielded to the fury of the storm, and let their vessels drive without control. Some were wrecked upon the western isles of Scotland; some upon the shores of Norway; others were driven upon the Irish coast: and others sank with their miserable crews beneath the surging waves of the ocean. The fate of those poor wretches who reached the shore was scarcely better than that of those who perished at sea. In Scotland they were seized as prisoners, and in Ireland brutally murdered. Of the 131 vessels that sailed so proudly from Spain, only about 60 returned to it, and those in a miserably-shattered condition. The soldiers and sailors in them were so worn out with hardships and sickness, that they looked as if they had been the sweepings of hospitals, instead of the flower of the manhood of their nation. They excused their sad defeat and failure by wild tales of the desperate valour of the English, and of the stormy seas by which they were surrounded.

Though Philip was extremely hurt by this richly-deserved punishment, yet he received the news with remarkable fortitude. Falling upon his knees, he expressed himself resigned to the will of God, and thankful that the calamity was not greater. The Spanish priests who had blessed the expedition, and predicted its certain success, were at first much abashed. They were at a loss to understand how a Catholic king should have been thoroughly beaten by a nation of heretics. The lesson might have taught them some humility and toleration; but it only sharpened their bigotry and love of persecution. Soon recovering their usual confidence, they pretended that the Deity had suffered so great a calamity to fall upon the Spanish people, because they had permitted the infidel Moors to live amongst them.

CHAPTER LXIV.

CONCLUSION OF THE REIGN OF QUEEN ELIZABETH.—A.D. 1588—1603.

NOT long after the armada had been destroyed, the Earl of Leicester, Elizabeth's profligate favourite, was taken suddenly ill, and died on the 4th of September, 1588. Fond as she had once been of him, she did not regret him much. Her eye had been caught and her fancy captivated by another nobleman—the young, handsome, and accomplished Earl of Essex.

The winter of 1588 passed away; and, in February, 1589, parliament and convocation assembled. The expenses connected with the threatened invasion by Spain were laid before them; and the Commons, in anticipation of a renewed attempt on the part of Philip, voted a liberal supply.—At that time the English people longed to revenge themselves on the Spaniards for the alarm they had put them to. Elizabeth shared this feeling; and she took up the cause of Don Antonio, a Portuguese refugee of royal blood, who had some claim to the crown of that country, which was then under Spanish rule. But though she supported Antonio, she had not the means to aid him, as she had expended all her money, contracted a large debt, and needed the supply voted by parliament for other purposes. Upon this, a number of her subjects, at the head of whom was Sir Francis Drake, took the chief expense of the expedition upon themselves.

In a short time a fleet of 200 vessels, with Don Antonio on board, sailed to claim the crown of Portugal, and to take revenge upon the Spaniards. Drake and his companions first sailed to Corunna, where they burnt some ships of war, defeated an army of about 5,000 men, and gave the lower town to the flames. They afterwards proceeded to Lisbon; but that city contained a strong Spanish garrison, and the people were afraid to rise in favour of Don Antonio. Sickness and famine also appeared among the English; so that, after having inflicted some great cruelties, and experienced many sufferings, they were glad to sail home again, with a loss of about half their number.

For several subsequent years England was quiet; and few events of great historical importance took place, though the English fleets continually punished the Spanish king by attacking his vessels, and by other warlike actions. But Philip of Spain had recovered his spirits; and there was a talk of invading England with another tremendous army. The gallant Lord Howard of Effingham, who had repulsed the armada, thought that a new attack upon the Spanish coast would be the best means of striking terror into Philip, and making him keep a respectful distance from the white cliffs of old England. Accordingly, on the 1st of June, 1596, a noble fleet of 150 vessels, with 14,000 land troops on board of them, started from Plymouth, and sailed to the bay of Cadiz, where, having fought their way into the harbour, in defiance of a terrible firing from batteries and men-of-war, a fierce sea-fight took place. After a severe struggle, which lasted for six hours, the Spanish ships were obliged to give way, three of the largest of them being taken, and about fifty others plundered and burnt. The English mariners had fulfilled their errand of destruction; and the Earl of Essex, who commanded the land troops, resolved to imitate their example. Landing his soldiers, he attacked the city of Cadiz with impetuous fury, and forced it to surrender at the point of the sword. He permitted the inhabitants to ransom their lives; but all their wealth and rich merchandise fell into the hands of the victors. Such was the importance and riches of the city, that it was calculated the loss suffered by the Spaniards amounted to the enormous sum of 20,000,000 of dollars. The Earl of Essex, to whom this success was mainly owing, was a brave, enthusiastic young soldier; but he was quite as reckless as brave. He wished to remain at Cadiz, and keep it for the English as a means to help them to other conquests; but Lord Howard and the rest thought enough had been done, and insisted on returning home.

King Philip was extremely annoyed at the destruction of his wealthy city; and, although he so constantly got the worst of it, was not quite tired of fighting yet. To revenge the ruin of Cadiz, he prepared for another invasion of England, and the English government again collected vessels for the purpose of striking the first blow. On the 9th of July, 1597, a powerful English fleet sailed once more from Plymouth, under the command of the Earl of Essex, whose desperate valour had caused him to be regarded as a hero. But he was not quite so fortunate this time as in his former expedition. His ships were driven back by a storm; and so much time was lost in consequence, that when the fleet sailed again, on the 17th of August, he was unable to attack the Spanish coast. He succeeded, however, in capturing three large treasure-ships of that nation returning from Havannah, and valued at £100,000. Still his expedition was considered a failure in England; and when he returned, the queen received him in a stern and very cold manner. The favourite was a man of high spirit, and he retired from court in a fit of ill-temper. Elizabeth was so attached to him that she felt quite unhappy in his absence, and caused him to return by promoting him to the dignity of Earl-Marshal of England.

A peace with Spain was now talked about; but Essex strongly opposed it; and his reasons were thought so important, that although the war was not continued, no treaty of peace was entered into. Soon afterwards, on the 13th of September, 1598, Elizabeth's arch enemy, the bigoted tyrant, Philip of Spain, died in his seventy-first year. Elizabeth's famous minister, the wise and prudent Lord Burleigh, who had directed her councils for forty years, also went to his grave a short time before, at the age of seventy-eight; he died on the 4th of August. The queen was so much affected at the death of her old servant, that she shed tears. His son, Sir Robert Cecil, continued to serve her, and became in his turn a celebrated statesman.

Before Lord Burleigh died, the Earl of Essex had a curious quarrel with the queen. In a debate about the affairs of Ireland, which took place in her cabinet, Elizabeth spoke to the earl with that abusive sharpness which was common to her. Hurt by her words, he forgot the duty he owed to his sovereign and the politeness due to a lady, and turned his back upon her in contempt. Elizabeth's keen eyes flashed with anger at this insult, and giving her favourite a hearty box of the ears, she told him, in language more forcible than graceful, to go to the devil. The fiery young noble was filled with astonishment; and placing his hand on his sword, he swore he would not have taken such an insult even from her father, Henry VIII., himself. With these words he abruptly left the room, and retired, chafing with passion, to his country-house. One of his friends wrote begging him to return and sue for the queen's pardon. Essex sent a refusal; and he kept from court till Elizabeth (though much offended, as she was excessively fond of the most submissive attentions) recalled him, as she, no doubt, missed the compliments and sprightliness of her handsome favourite.

Ireland had long been an enormous trouble and expense to the English queen; and at this time the wild chieftains of that country were engaged in a rebellious war against her authority. Headed by the Earl of Tyrone, they had been fortunate enough to defeat a small English army, and were so delighted at their unexpected victory, that they resolved to drive the English altogether out of the country.

Alarmed at the serious turn things had taken, the queen sent the Earl of Essex to Ireland, with the title of governor of that country, and an army of 16,000 foot and 1,300 horse. She thought that, with such a force, so brave a soldier as Essex would soon compel the rebels to submit in tranquillity. The earl—who left London for Dublin at the end of March, 1599—was rather a brave man than a wise general; and, although he did his best, he was unable to conquer the powerful Tyrone, with whom, at last, on account of the sickness of his troops and their dread of the enemy, he was compelled to enter into a truce, which was concluded on the 8th of September. When Elizabeth heard of this ill-success she was extremely enraged, and being also offended at some peevish letters he had written to her and her council, she sent him a stern rebuke; but told him to remain in Ireland until he received her further commands.

The impatient noble feared that he should altogether lose the favour of the queen; and to prevent that, he determined to run the risk of disobeying her orders. He started instantly for England, and, on the 28th of September, arrived at the court before any one had become aware of his intentions. It was but ten in the morning, when Essex, splashed with mud, disordered by travelling, and a little excited with wine, passed through the rooms of state, and actually entered into the queen's bed-chamber. She had not long risen, and was sitting with her hair hanging over her face. Falling on his knees, he kissed her hand, and the coquettish old queen smiled and spoke kindly to the man for whom she had once felt a feeling of tenderness and attachment. Surprised as she was, still her manner was so gracious, that as the earl left her apartments, he was heard to thank God that though he had suffered much trouble, and many storms abroad, he had found a sweet calm at home.

Sir Robert Cecil, Lord Burleigh's son, hated Essex; and that day when he attended the queen, he represented that Essex had acted in direct opposition to her commands, in returning to England, and leaving Ireland in confusion. Elizabeth at once saw that her partiality for the earl had led her into a momentary forgetfulness of his fault; and, as she never suffered her attachments to master her judgment, when Essex waited upon her in the afternoon, he found the manner of his mistress changed. She called him to account for his conduct; and, in an imperative manner, commanded him to consider himself a prisoner in his own room. The next day he was examined before the lords of the council, and although his conduct was calm and submissive, he was committed to the custody of the lord-keeper.

Grief and disappointed ambition soon threw him into so severe an illness, that his life was in danger. On hearing this, the queen's affection returned for a time, and she sent her own physician to attend upon him, and also to say, that, if she thought such a step proper and consistent with her dignity, she would visit him herself. This royal attention was very consoling to the earl, and he soon began to recover; but his enemies persuaded the queen that his illness was all a sham to move her pity; and although she liberated him from confinement, she became almost as cold and stern as before. In his distress he sent to her a very humble letter, which ended with these words—"This farther degree of goodness doth sound in my ears as if your majesty spake these words: 'Die not, Essex, for though I punish thy offence, and humble thee for thy good, yet will I one day be served again by thee.' My prostrate soul makes this answer: 'I hope for that blessed day.' And in expectation of it, all my afflictions of body and mind are humbly, patiently, and cheerfully borne by me."

The constant accounts which the queen received of the disorders in Ireland, kept up her anger against the earl. Accordingly, she subjected him to a sort of trial before her privy council, which sentenced him to be deprived of his offices, and confined to his own house during her majesty's pleasure. Nor did her anger end here: he had long possessed a monopoly of sweet wines; and this privilege brought him in an immense sum of money. The royal patent by which he held this monopoly having expired, he petitioned the queen to renew it. His fortune had been so much injured by his extravagance and misfortunes, that its renewal was necessary to save him from ruin. The stern queen, however, denied his request, saying, in a contemptuous manner, that, in order to manage an ungovernable brute, he must be stinted in his provender.

This severity made the impetuous Essex desperate; and he entered into a wild, foolish conspiracy to remove Sir Robert Cecil and other courtiers, who were his enemies, forcibly from the presence of the queen. He was much loved by the people on account of his bravery and generosity, and he did all he could to win their affection more strongly. He secretly corresponded with the Catholics, and paid open court to their extreme foes, the Puritans; and he even went so far as to write to King James of Scotland, urging him to insist on an open declaration, by Elizabeth, of his right to succeed her. In his folly, he laughed at the person of the queen, saying publicly, that she was an old woman, and had grown as crooked in her mind as she was in her body. Elizabeth, who was in her sixty-eighth year, and still had the absurd vanity to believe she was extremely beautiful, was very irritated at this rude remark. She knew also of his secret correspondence; of his having formed a plan for seizing the palace; compelling her to summon a parliament; remove his enemies from her person, and remodel the government: and, on the 7th of February, 1601, she sent a command to him to appear before her privy council.

To go would have been to surrender himself to certain punishment, and probably to death, as a traitor. What should he do? His mind was soon made up to dare the worst; and the day after receiving the message he collected several noblemen and 300 gentlemen at his house. This desperate party was about to sally forth on some wild scheme (probably to attempt to seize the palace), when Egerton, the chancellor, presented himself, accompanied by the Earl of Worcester, Sir William Knollys, and the Lord Chief Justice Popham. Essex admitted them by a wicket-gate, but would not suffer their attendants to enter. On informing him that they came from her majesty, to demand the cause of such a tumultuous meeting, the passionate earl replied—"There is a plot laid for my life; letters have been forged in my name; men have been hired to murder me in my bed; mine enemies cannot be satisfied unless they suck my blood." The chief justice said he should explain his case, and the queen would act with impartiality; but such a tumult arose among the earl's followers, who wished to kill the messengers from the queen, that he placed them in an inner room for safety, and having bolted them in, set a guard over them.

The earl then rushed into the streets with his drawn sword in his hand, and was followed by most of his wild associates. Hurrying into the city, he called out —"For the queen! for the queen! a plot is laid for my life!" The citizens flock around in amazement, and many cried, "God bless your honour!" but none of them armed in his cause. Thus disappointed he went to the house of one of the sheriffs, and stopped there about two hours, debating what was best to be done. It ended in his resolving to return to Essex House; but he found the streets barricaded, and guarded by companies of armed men. A skirmish took place; several persons lost their lives; and the earl contrived to reach the river, enter a boat, and regain his own house. The doomed noble fortified the building (which was soon surrounded by an armed force), and resolved to stand on his own defence. At length some pieces of cannon were pointed against the edifice, and he surrendered.

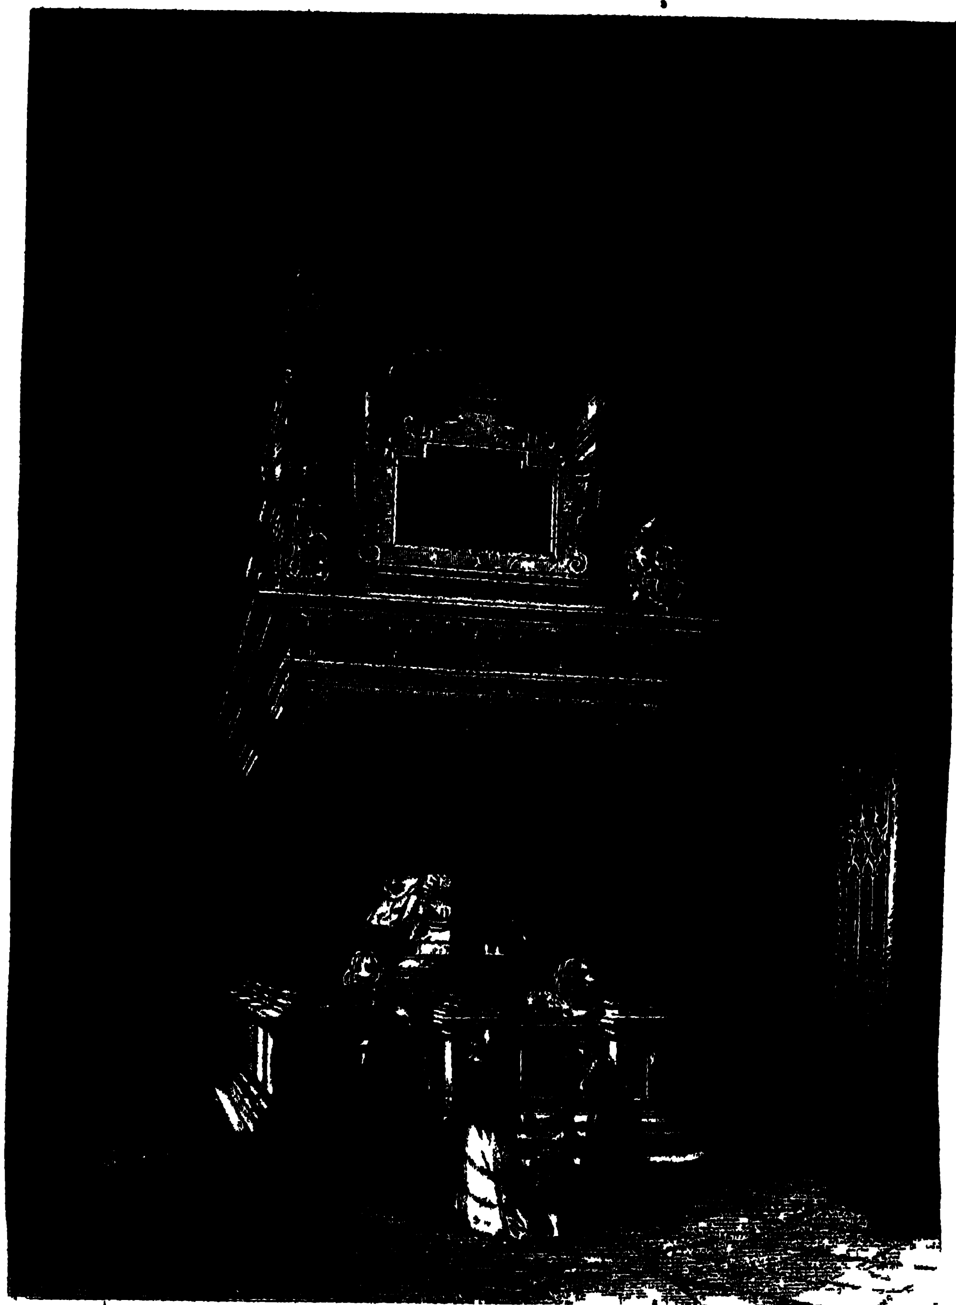
Conduct of this character could not lightly be passed over; and Essex and his friend, Lord Southampton, who had shared in his insurrection, were, on the 19th of February, placed upon their trial as traitors. Essex pleaded not guilty, and called the Deity to witness that he had done nothing except in his own defence. But his treasonable actions had been committed in open day, in the sight of all men; and, as might have been expected, he was sentenced to suffer death as a traitor. Essex acted as if he expected this fate, saying that though he would not despise the mercy of the queen, he would make no cringing submission to obtain it. Southampton behaved very submissively, and, although he met the same sentence as his friend, was afterwards pardoned.



There was one event connected with this trial that must be deplored by every one who regrets that the loftiest human genius should be contaminated by the basest ingratitude. Francis Bacon, afterwards the great philosopher, Lord Bacon, though not one of the crown lawyers, voluntarily appeared as a prosecutor of the earl. That nobleman had been his patron and kindest friend, and had acted towards him with a generosity actually romantic. Having, on one occasion, vainly begged for Bacon the office of solicitor-general, the open-hearted noble presented him with an estate near Twickenham, worth about £2,000, to make up for the disappointment. Yet this very man, to obtain the queen's favour, did not hesitate to do all he could to procure the condemnation of one who had acted towards him in so liberal and kindly a manner. He compared the conduct of Essex to that of Pisistratus the Athenian, who, pretending to be in danger of assassination, inflicted some wounds upon himself, and having made the people believe that his enemies had done the violence, obtained a guard of soldiers to protect him, by whose assistance he afterwards established tyranny in his country. Well might Alexander Pope, a poet of a later age, exclaim—

——— "See how Bacon shined,
The wisest, greatest, meanest of mankind."

The unfortunate Essex was privately beheaded in the Tower, on the 25th of February, 1601. He bore his fate with calmness and dignity, and was much pitied by the nation. He was only thirty-four years old when, by his rashness and violence, he fell a victim to the offended laws of his country. He was a man of many talents, much literary taste, and a writer of great elegance and power. It is said that the queen was much grieved at his fate, and hesitated for a long time before she could prevail on herself to sign his death-warrant. Some momentary pang she might have felt; but her tenderness for him had long departed, and the stories about her anguish in consequence of his execution, appear to be without foundation. Some of Essex's friends and dependents were afterwards put to death as accomplices in his treason. The unhappy earl had been so much beloved by the people, that the queen lost much of her popularity by his death.

On the 27th of October, 1601, Elizabeth met her last parliament. The brown shrivelled leaves, which every gust of wind swept from the almost bared branches of the trees, was a type of her condition. Age had done its work; and, although she was dressed more magnificently than ever, she was suffering from the decay of her constitution; her eye was dim, her hand trembled, and her step was feeble. The war in Ireland, which was not yet concluded, had cost her enormous sums, and she was extremely in want of money. This the Commons did not grudge her; but the reforming spirit was active amongst them, and they came prepared for a struggle. For some years the nation had been groaning under an oppression so monstrous, that at last it could scarcely be borne. This was the system of monopolies. The queen had, from time to time, rewarded the services of her servants or courtiers by granting them patents, which secured to them an exclusive right of selling some particular commodity, and of charging what price they pleased for it. These monopolies were exercised in a very extortionate manner, and a check was put upon all industry and commerce.—So impudent were some holders of them, that in certain places salt was raised from 1*s.* 4*d.* a bushel to 14*s.* or 15*s.* Many of the articles most necessary for subsistence or comfort were given over to some rapacious courtiers. Wine, coals, iron, lead, saltpetre, currants, starch, oil, glass, paper, leather, and other such things, were included in the list. When an account was read to the house, one member asked if bread was not in the number? "Bread!" cried every one with surprise. "Yes, I assure you," continued he, "if affairs go on at this rate, we shall have bread reduced to a monopoly before next parliament."

The Commons had, some time before, presented a petition to the queen against these monstrous abuses, or rather robberies of the people; but she had returned a stern refusal, and protected her courtiers in their oppressions. On the 20th of November, therefore, Mr. Laurence Hyde brought in a bill, the object of which was to prevent letters patent, granting monopolies, from being issued. For four days a violent debate took place in the house on this bill—such a debate as had never occurred within its walls before; and it was felt that the temper of the house threatened a crisis, the consequences of which no one could foresee. The wise and prudent queen prevented it, however, and saved her fast-declining popularity, by sending, on the 25th of November, a message to the parliament, that she would abolish all those monopolies which should be proved to be injurious to her people.

The joy and gratitude of the Commons exceeded description: they were prepared for an angry struggle; but this timely submission of their sovereign instantly disarmed them. One member declared, with tears in his eyes, that if a sentence of everlasting happiness had been pronounced in his favour, his joy could not have been greater than it then was. The house voted the queen a liberal supply of money, and a committee of the members waited upon her on the 30th of November, when the Speaker expressed their gratitude in a very fulsome and extravagant speech.

In the last year of Elizabeth's life, Tyrone and the rest of the Irish rebels were defeated, and tranquillity restored to that country, by Lord Mountjoy, who succeeded Essex as lord-lieutenant. The queen's long career was now closing; and although everything was done by her courtiers to render her life happy, and to make her forget that she was old and infirm, yet she sunk into a deep melancholy, from which no one could arouse her. Many inquiries were made as to the cause of her grief; and a romantic story has been told about it, which is, however, entitled to very little credit. It was said that, in a moment of fondness, she gave the unfortunate Earl of Essex a ring, and told him to keep that as a pledge of her affection; for whatever prejudices or anger she might at any time be induced to feel against him, yet, if he sent her that ring, the sight of it would recall her former tenderness, and she would listen favourably to his excuse. Essex, it was added, kept this gift to the last extremity; but when condemned to die, he gave it to the Countess of Nottingham, and requested her to deliver it to the queen. The husband of the countess hated Essex, and persuaded her not to fulfil the charge she had undertaken; and the consequence was, that Elizabeth was so vexed at what she thought the obstinacy of her favourite, that, after many struggles between resentment and affection, she signed the warrant for his execution. When at the point of death, the countess was seized with remorse for the treacherous part she had acted, and having induced the queen to visit her, she craved her pardon and revealed her own cruel conduct. The astonished Elizabeth burst into a furious passion—shook the dying woman in her bed, and crying out, that "God might pardon her, but she never would," abruptly left the room, and from that moment resigned herself to the wretchedness of profound sorrow and despair.

This account of the cause of the queen's melancholy is generally believed: though some suppose that it arose from constant suffering, want of sleep, and a dread of death. She could not be persuaded to take to her bed, from a fear that she should never rise from it again; and for several days she sat or lay on cushions placed upon the floor. During this time she was oppressed with burning fever, and such an accumulation of phlegm in her throat, that she was sometimes in danger of being strangled by it. Her attendants at length induced her to go to bed; for it was plain that her last hour was approaching. The next day, Sir Robert Cecil, together with the chancellor and the lord admiral, begged her to mention whom she desired to be her successor. With a slight start she gave this mysterious and singular answer—"I will have no rascal to succeed me!"

The courtiers looked at each other with amazement; and then Cecil asked her for a more particular explanation. She replied that she would have a king to succeed her; and who could that be but her cousin, the King of Scots? Whitgift, the Archbishop of Canterbury, then offered up prayers, and advised her to fix her thoughts upon God. She answered she did so, nor did they at all wander from Him. Soon afterwards her speech failed, and she sank into a sort of torpor. At three o'clock in the morning of the 24th of March, 1603, this famous sovereign died gently, without any seeming pain or struggle. She was in the seventieth year of her age, and the forty-fifth of her reign.

In the character of this great princess there was a strange mixture of virtues and vices; and although her reign produced much good to the English nation, it is hard to say which were the most prominent. She possessed uncommon talents, and an iron will that broke down opposition and triumphed over difficulties; was familiar with Greek and Latin; and wrote or translated several books herself. She was active, wise, subtle, and had great readiness of address. She was a woman of immense ambition; always dignified in her manner; sometimes proud even to haughtiness, though occasionally extremely condescending. Attached to her people, and careful of their property, her care in this respect amounted to parsimony; but she was sometimes generous. She was loved by her subjects, especially by the Protestants, who, until long after the death of Mary Stuart, believed that the prosperity of the reformed religion depended upon her existence. With an arbitrary temper she united wisdom, and always knew when to yield to the just demands of her people. Though she treated the Catholics with great severity, it was not only on account of their religious tenets, but because she believed them to be disloyal to herself, and desirous of placing Mary upon the English throne. Elizabeth was no bigot; and could she have relied upon the Catholics as faithful subjects, would no doubt have granted them a liberal toleration. Though rather capricious, her affection for her male favourites was sometimes powerful, yet her passions were always under her control. It should be added, that her strength of mind was shown by the fact, that surrounded as she was by men of remarkable talents, she never suffered any of them to gain an ascendancy over her. However much she needed their advice, she had always the tact to remain their sovereign, and not descend to be their companion.

Here ends the list of her good qualities; and they were many: the reverse of the picture is very displeasing. She had a strong disposition to tyranny, which was checked sometimes by her sound sense, but more often by the opposition of her people. She was heartless, unforgiving, and cruel. Ridiculously vain; frivolously fond of dress; strangely envious; and very bitter in her hatred; sometimes coarse in her conversation; and a great swearer. But her greatest vice was her insincerity: she was constantly acting a false part, and seemed positively fond of dissimulation. Even if, in one or two things we have mentioned, Elizabeth has been misrepresented, still her conduct to Mary, Queen of Scots, will remain a lasting blot upon her character. If her faults had not been redeemed by virtues, she would have been despicable; but, mingled as they were, they formed a woman whom few could have loved, but a sovereign whom, to this day, all Englishmen remember with a feeling of great admiration.

CHAPTER LXV.

THE GREAT ENGLISHMEN OF THE REIGN OF QUEEN ELIZABETH.

THE time during which Elizabeth governed England, or the Elizabethan age, as it is called, produced so many great and brilliant men, especially in literature, that it is necessary to devote a chapter to a very brief account of the most famous of them. Foremost of all stood those two wonderfully-gifted men, the prince of poets and the prince of philosophers—William Shakspeare and Francis, Lord Bacon. Though in widely different paths, they were, perhaps, equal in genius; but great as both were, Shakspeare deserves the pre-eminence, because, unlike the lordly philosopher, no dark shadow obscures the brilliancy of his name.

Very little is known with certainty of the life of Shakspeare; but the main facts of it are as follows:—His father was a respectable townsman of Stratford-on-Avon, where he carried on the trade of a wool-stapler. William was born on the 23rd of April, 1564, and was one of a family of eight children. He was educated at the free grammar-school of his native town; and before he reached the age of nineteen he married Anne Hathaway, the daughter of a substantial yeoman, who lived in the neighbouring village of Shottery. Anne was nearly eight years older than her youthful husband; and although the marriage seems to have been a love match, it did not turn out a very happy one.

When he was about one-and-twenty, Shakspeare went to London, literally to seek his fortune. There is an old story, that he and several foolish companions shot a deer in the park of a neighbouring magistrate, Sir Thomas Lucy, of Charlcote; and that he went to London to avoid the anger of that gentleman; but many doubts are held about its truth. As he was very fond of poetry and acting, on arriving in the metropolis he applied to the players, and was employed in some way about the theatre. First he became an actor, and then a writer of plays, which were so full of exquisite poetry and humour, that in a few years he was considered the greatest poet of his time. But he had many trials to undergo, and many difficulties to overcome, before he arrived at that point. Though naturally a very cheerful man, his troubles were at one time so great, and his prospects so dark, that he almost fell into despair; but he was patient, industrious, and persevering, and at last made a handsome fortune; became a favourite of the court; and his plays were frequently presented before Queen Elizabeth, who was so pleased with them, that she rewarded the poet with many an approving smile. He lived after the death of Elizabeth, and became quite as great a favourite with her successor, James I. In the year 1613, Shakspeare retired to his native town, which is a place of great rural beauty, to pass the rest of his life in tranquillity. Unhappily, he did not enjoy the result of his industry very long: he died during the month of April, 1616, on his 52nd birthday. He was buried in the calm, solemn-looking old church of Stratford-on-Avon. A few years after his death a monument was erected over his grave, on which was placed an epitaph in Latin, worthy of his illustrious memory. It is thus rendered into English:—

"In judgment a Nestor—in genius a Socrates—in art a Maro:
The earth covers him; the people mourn for him; Olympus has him."

There are some more lines in English, very complimentary, but not remarkable in any other way. Though much admired in his own time, Shakspeare has been thought a great deal more of since his death; and he is now considered the greatest poet that England, or perhaps the world, ever produced. A modern writer says—"Poetry is in some minds a disease, a passionate outburst of frenzy, or a piteous wailing to the stars about the wrongs done on earth; but in Shakspeare it was an ever-varying and refreshing fountain, wholesome and cheering. His mind was so finely balanced, that it is difficult to say which faculty predominated in it—judgment, imagination, fancy, wit, humour, or benevolence. Each in its turn bore sway, and each united in producing an inexpressible charm throughout his works. I cannot describe him otherwise than by saying that he possessed a combination of intellectual gifts. He was a mind of gigantic power, and that, too, in all directions: in most things he would have been great—as distinguished, perhaps, as a statesman or a warrior, as a poet."

Francis Bacon, who is spoken of in the last chapter, and who eventually became Baron of Verulam and Viscount of St. Alban's, was born on the 22nd of January, 1561. His father was Sir Nicholas Bacon, who, for the first twenty years of Elizabeth's reign, held the great seal of England. When a boy, Francis showed that he possessed a very powerful intellect; and as the death of his father obliged him to follow some profession for a livelihood, he chose the law. Lord Burleigh was his uncle; but that distinguished statesman disliked his nephew, and would do nothing for him. For a long time he struggled with what may be called poverty for a man in his position in society; and how he was assisted by the generous Earl of Essex, and how ungratefully he turned against his friend, has already been mentioned. He even blackened the character of that nobleman after his execution, in a paper which he wrote at the command of the queen. So severe was he upon the memory of his unhappy patron, that his conduct provoked general disgust.

When James ascended the English throne, Bacon was received into his favour. Having obtained the honour of knighthood, he soon afterwards married an attractive young lady, named Alice Barnham, the daughter of a wealthy alderman, and was made solicitor-general. He now began to publish those wonderful and profound works, which have gained for him the names of the apostle and reformer of modern philosophy. In 1605 appeared his work On the Advancement of Learning; and, in 1610, that On the Wisdom of the Ancients. The next year he became judge of the Marshalsea Court, and registrar of the odious Star-Chamber. In 1619, he was created Lord High Chancellor of England, and raised to the peerage. In the January of 1620, he entered his sixtieth year, and soon afterwards produced his great work, called the Novum Organum, or the nature of things—a book so extraordinary as to draw forth eloquent praises from the most distinguished men in Europe.

It might have been expected that a life so brilliant and so far advanced would have been closed without dishonour. It is painful to say that this was not the case. He was accused, in the year 1621, by the House of Commons, of accepting bribes in his office of chancellor, and of giving false judgments for money. Twenty-three charges of corruption were brought against him; and the great philosopher was compelled humbly to confess his guilty conduct, and throw himself on the mercy of the House of Lords. When a number of nobles called upon him to inquire whether his confession was really signed by himself, he replied in a voice made tremulous by a profound sense of degradation—"My lords, it is my act, my hand, my heart. I beseech your lordships to be merciful to a broken reed." The peers felt for the fallen scholar, and treated him with respect. But he was sentenced to pay a fine of £40,000; to be imprisoned during the king's pleasure; and declared to be incapable of ever again holding any place or employment.

Still, such was the admiration held of his great talents, that King James released him from the Tower, remitted his fine, took him again into favour, and gave him a pension of £1,200 a year. He then continued his philosophical studies, wrote several other works, and died in the year 1626, at the age of sixty-five. He perished a martyr to those noble pursuits which had occupied the best and purest part of his life. Having thought that snow might be used in preventing animal food from becoming putrid, he stepped from his carriage near Highgate, and entering a cottage, bought a fowl, and stuffed it with snow with his own hands. While thus employed, he felt a sudden chill, and was soon so indisposed that he was carried to a house in the neighbourhood, belonging to his friend the Earl of Arundel. There he got rapidly worse, and died in about a week afterwards.

In an eloquent essay on the life and philosophy of Lord Bacon, by that delightful writer, Macaulay, the author says—"What was the end which Bacon proposed to himself? It was, to use his own emphatic expression, 'fruit.' It was the multiplying of human enjoyments, and the mitigating of human sufferings." Again, in comparing the ancient philosopher (Plato) with the modern one (Bacon), the same writer remarks —"To sum up the whole, we should say that the aim of the Platonic philosophy was to exalt man into a god. The aim of the Baconian philosophy was to provide man with what he requires while he continues to be man. The aim of the Platonic philosophy was to raise us far above vulgar wants. The former aim was noble, but the latter was attainable. Plato drew a good bow; but, like Acestes in Virgil, he aimed at the stars; and therefore, though there was no want of strength or skill, the shot was thrown away. His arrow was indeed followed by a track of dazzling radiance, but it struck nothing. Bacon fixed his eye on a mark which was placed on the earth, and within bow-shot, and hit it in the white. The philosophy of Plato began in words, and ended in words—noble words indeed—words such as were to be expected from the finest of human intellects, exercising boundless dominion over the finest of human languages. The philosophy of Bacon began in observations, and ended in arts."

Next to Shakspeare, the most famous poet of the time of Queen Elizabeth was Edmund Spenser. The work upon which his reputation stands is an allegorical poem, of great beauty, called the Faëry Queen. It is extremely imaginative and romantic, and the language is gorgeously eloquent—indeed dazzling, on account of its uninterrupted brightness; but, for that very reason, apt to fatigue those who read much of it at a time. Spenser was born in London, in the year 1553, and educated at the university of Cambridge. Having dedicated a work, called the Shepherd's Calendar, to a brother poet (Sir Philip Sidney), that gentleman procured him a valuable appointment in Ireland. He lived for some time in that country, returning occasionally to England; and having, on one of these visits, dedicated a part of his Faëry Queen to Elizabeth, she graciously conferred on him a pension of £50 a year. He was ruined by the Irish rebellion, under the Earl of Tyrone, which compelled him to flee into England to save his life. His house had been set on fire by the rebels; and, in the confusion of flight, his infant child was left behind, and perished in the flames. These misfortunes broke the heart of the gifted poet, and he died a few months afterwards—on the 16th of January, 1599, when but in the meridian of life; for he had not reached his forty-sixth year. It is said that he died in great poverty; but this has been doubted, because he was buried in Westminster Abbey, at the expense of the liberal Earl of Essex, who, it is rationally supposed, would not have allowed him to want. Several brother poets attended his funeral, and, in admiration of their departed friend, threw copies of verses into his grave.

The name of Sir Philip Sidney is usually mentioned after that of the musical Spenser; but, though very famous as a poet in his own time, he owed his reputation partly to his accomplishments as a soldier and a statesman. He was born at Penshurst, in Kent, on the 29th of November, 1554. His most distinguished work is a pastoral romance, which, in honour of his sister, who had married the Earl of Pembroke, he called The Countess of Pembroke's Arcadia. It is a mixture of prose and verse; but it is not much to the taste of modern readers. He also wrote The Defence of Poetry; Astrophel and Stella; and some minor pieces. He was considered the very model of an accomplished gentleman; and after a life spent in literature and the exercise of chivalry, was killed by a musket-ball in the year 1586, at the battle of Zutphen, in the Netherlands. His humanity was as great as his talents. While lying upon the field of battle, mangled with wounds, and parched with that feverish thirst which they occasion, a bottle of water was brought to relieve him. As he was about to raise it to his lips, he saw a wretched soldier near him, who seemed to be suffering more severely than himself, and he immediately gave him the bottle, saying, "This man's necessity is greater than mine."

Sir Walter Raleigh was distinguished as a writer, traveller, soldier, and statesman. The incidents of his life are numerous, and so varied that they read like a romance. He was born in 1552, at Budleigh, in Devonshire: his father was a gentleman of that county. Sir Walter won the favour of Elizabeth by a graceful, though extravagant, act of politeness. The queen was one day walking, attended by a crowd of courtiers, when her path was obstructed by a muddy puddle. On observing this, Raleigh immediately took off his richly embroidered velvet cloak, and spread it upon the ground before her, as a foot-cloth. At the age of seventeen Raleigh made one of a volunteer corps, composed of a hundred gentlemen, whom Queen Elizabeth permitted to go to France in aid of the Huguenots. He served in France five years, and subsequently in the Netherlands, as a volunteer under the Prince of Orange. Returning from the continent in 1576, and finding that his half-brother, Sir Humphrey Gilbert, had obtained a patent to colonise any part of North America not settled by the allies of England, he engaged with a considerable number of gentlemen to go out to Newfoundland; but the expedition proved unsuccessful, and he returned to England in 1579, after having been exposed to several dangers. The following year he proceeded to Ireland, in command of a company of the royal troops sent to suppress the rebellion raised by the Earl of Desmond, and became so conspicuous for his bravery in quelling the insurgents, that he was most graciously received at court; and soon after, his handsome person and attractive manners so far gained him the favour of the queen, that he was knighted, made Captain of the Guard, Seneschal of the County of Cornwall, and Lord Warden of the Stannaries; and he was also presented with a large grant of the forfeited estates of the Earl of Desmond, and a lucrative patent for licensing the vendors of wine in England. In the year 1584 he got up a society for making discoveries and settlements in North America. Having led an expedition to the New World, he returned to England, and wrote a book about his travels, full of absurd stories. He said that he had visited the fabled El Dorado, or land of gold, and that in it was a city called Manoa, which shone with gold and silver, and was so large that it took two days to walk through it; that there was a nation composed of Amazons, or warlike women, and a tribe of men whose heads were placed in their bosoms. Raleigh subsequently, in connection with a relation of his, Sir Richard Grenville, attempted to found the settlement of Virginia, to which Sir Walter gave that pretty name in honour of Elizabeth, who was a virgin queen. Almost the only fruit of this expedition, which cost Raleigh a large sum, was the introduction of tobacco and potatoes into England.—Sir Walter was very greedy and avaricious, and his character was a strange mixture of virtues and vices: unfortunately, the latter have thrown a dark shado over his otherwise brilliant reputation. He bitterly hated the Earl of Essex; and, having helped to procure his condemnation, had the ill-feeling secretly to witness his execution from a window of the armoury. His career of prosperity ended with the life of Elizabeth; and some years afterwards (in 1618), he himself perished by the hands of the executioner. What led him to so terrible an end forms part of the history of the next reign.

After Shakspeare, the two most famous dramatic poets of that age were Christopher Marlowe and Ben Jonson. Of the first very little is known. He was a writer of some genius; but his works are extravagant and bombastic; and his conduct was extremely wild and dissipated. He perished in the early summer of his life, being killed in a tavern during a quarrel about a worthless woman.

Of Ben Jonson we have the fullest particulars; for he was a very vain man, and continually writing about himself. He was born in 1574, and was the son of a clergyman, whose death left his family in great poverty. His widow, therefore, married a man of the homely trade of a bricklayer, and Benjamin was brought up to that occupation. This was not to his taste; so he left home, enlisted as a private soldier, and was engaged in actual warfare in Holland. On his return to England he determined to become an author, and by some means he contrived to enter the university of Cambridge; but he was too poor to be able to remain there long. He then obtained an engagement as an actor at a small theatre in Shoreditch, called the Curtain; but having killed a fellow-performer in a duel, he was sent to prison, and narrowly escaped being put to death as a murderer. While in confinement he was converted to the Romish church by a Catholic priest who attended him; but after remaining a member of that faith for twelve years, he returned to the Protestant communion. On being set at liberty he turned dramatist; and at length won the favour of James I., who made him poet-laureate—that is, his own poet, who was to celebrate every important event which might happen in the royal family. He lived also to enjoy the favour of Charles I.; but he was improvident and died in poverty. The cause of his death was an attack of palsy, which terminated his existence in 1637.—He is an author of whose talents most people speak with great respect, but whose works are very little read. They show a great deal of learning and carefulness, but little or no genius. They are extremely indecent, and quite unfit to be read aloud. His comedies, though they have a good deal of humour, are vulgar, forced, and unnatural; and his tragedies are more learned and declamatory than eloquent or touching. The characters he creates are rather oddities than copies from nature: he drew the fashions and absurdities of his day, and not the emotions by which men and women are influenced in all times and ages; still, there are passages in his poems which are dignified and noble. He was buried in Westminster Abbey, which shows that he was much thought of in his own time.

There is still another poet—or rather poetess—who has not yet been mentioned. We think it is not generally known that Queen Elizabeth herself wooed the muses, in a style little, if at all, inferior to that of the writers whose names are handed down to us as the greatest geniuses of the age in which they lived. A specimen of her majesty's talents in this direction is appended. It is a "love poem," or rather a "lament," written when the projected matrimonial alliance with the Duke d'Anjou finally came to an end. At this time the duke had left England, after his interview with the queen. We have not given extracts from the other writers of this period, as it would far exceed our limits; but as these verses of Elizabeth's will be a novelty to many, if not to the majority, of our readers, we think they should have a place. They certainly prove that there was a manifest struggle between duty and passion when Elizabeth sacrificed her own inclinations to the wishes of her people and parliament, by giving up her marriage with the Duke d'Anjou. The verses are preserved in the Ashmolean collection.

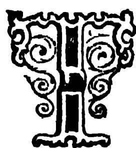
"ON MOUNT ZEUR'S DEPARTURE.

"I grieve, yet dare not shew my discontent;
I love, and yet am forced to seem to hate;
I dote, but dare not what I ever meant;
I seem stark mute, yet inwardly doe prate;
I am, and am not—freeze, and yet I burn;
Since from myself, my other self I turn.

"My care is like my shadow in the sun—
Follows me flying—flies when I pursue it;
Stands and lives by me—does what I have done:
This too familiar care doth make me rue it.
No means I find to rid him from my breast,
Till by the end of things it be suppressed.

"Some gentler passion steal into my mind
(For I am soft, and made of melting snow);
Or be more cruel, Love, or be more kind,
Or let me float or sink, be high or low;
Or let me live with some more sweet content,
Or die, and so forget what love e'er meant.



"Eliza Regina."

Amongst the other famous men of this period may be reckoned Lord Burleigh, the great statesman; and his son, Sir Robert Cecil: the learned Bishop Jewel, whose famous book, the Apology for the Church of England, was translated into seven different languages, and said to have had more effect in bringing about the Reformation than any other work ever published: Richard Hooker, a celebrated clergyman, who acquired a great reputation by writing a work to defend the established church from the attacks of the Puritans: and Sir Thomas Gresham, a London merchant, who built the first Royal Exchange, and endeavoured to erect a university in the metropolis. Sir Francis Drake and Sir John Hawkins were also contemporary with Elizabeth; and as the valour and abilities of these brave navigators greatly assisted in first making the English name terrible at sea, it will be necessary to give a short sketch of their lives. Drake was born at Tavistock, in Devonshire, in the year 1545. His father, who was a staunch Protestant, had, during the reign of Queen Mary, taken up his residence in Kent, to avoid being persecuted on account of his religion. He was subsequently appointed vicar of Upnor, near Chatham; and his celebrated son Francis was bound apprentice to a neighbour, the master of a vessel engaged in the coasting trade. On the death of the latter, young Drake engaged in the royal navy, under his relative Sir John Hawkins, and was distinguished for the courage he displayed in the last adventure of Hawkins against the Spaniards. It was here Drake gained his reputation, but lost his property; and a desire to revenge himself on the Spaniards took possession of him. He soon joined with other adventurers in fitting out a vessel, and made some money by various enterprises that must be considered of a piratical nature. In 1570, he obtained a commission from Elizabeth, and was subsequently employed against his old enemies the Spaniards. Having visited South America, he entered two of the Spanish colonies, and brought home a rich booty. He subsequently equipped three frigates at his own expense, and with these served under the Earl of Essex in Ireland. His services were so highly appreciated at court, that he was favourably received; and Queen Elizabeth did him the honour to partake of an entertainment given on board his ship, on which occasion he received the honour of knighthood. He further distinguished himself, in 1587, by the strenuous efforts he made to upset the designs of the Spaniards; and when the Invincible Armada approached these shores, his daring, as we have already recorded, contributed largely to its total discomfiture. At a later period he represented Plymouth in the House of Commons, and was often employed against the Spaniards. His last experiment, connected with an attempt to cross the isthmus of Darien, proved unfortunate. He lost many men from sickness, and died himself in 1595, fuller of honours than of years. His old companion in arms, Hawkins, was born at Plymouth, in 1520. In 1562 he equipped a small fleet, some merchants participating in his venture; and having procured, partly by purchase and partly by violence, 300 negroes, he carried his human cargo to Hispaniola, and there sold them. He was the first European who introduced the inhuman traffic of the slave-trade into the West Indies. He engaged in other expeditions of a similar character; but at length, having been made a rear-admiral, he served his country against the Spanish Armada, receiving from Elizabeth the distinction of knighthood for the services he had rendered. In 1595, he was selected, in conjunction with Drake, to command an armament sent against the Spanish colonies in the West Indies, where he died in the same year. He was the founder of an hospital at Chatham for poor and sick seamen.

Many more such men there were, deserving honourable mention;—men who contributed to make the time in which they lived a glorious period, in spite of all its wrongs—a period on which every Englishman reflects with an excusable national pride and respectful admiration.

CHAPTER LXVI.

THE REIGN OF JAMES THE FIRST.—A.D. 1603—1606.

HE royal family of Tudor perished with Queen Elizabeth, and her successor was the first member of THE HOUSE OF STUART that governed England.

James was thirty-seven years of age when he became King of England. He had been married, fourteen years before, to the Princess Anne, a daughter of the King of Denmark, on which account the lady was called Anne of Denmark. Therefore James, on his accession, was of a mature age, and a husband and a father. He was a considerable scholar, and had written several books, especially one upon witchcraft; but he was a very unkingly person in his appearance and manners. He had light, meaningless, goggle eyes; his tongue was too large for his mouth; and this gave him, not only an impediment in his speech, but a disagreeable habit of slobbering over his dress, which was generally slovenly, and sometimes even dirty. He had also a weakness in his legs, which made him waddle in his walk; he talked with a broad Scottish accent; and was altogether very ungraceful and undignified.

On receiving news of the death of Elizabeth, James started from Edinburgh on the 5th of April, and travelled, in a very leisurely manner, to London, where he arrived on the 7th of May. At Newark-upon-Trent, a thief, who had contrived to mingle with his attendants, was taken in the act of picking a pocket. James ordered him to be hanged at once, without any trial, saying a rope was the best cure for such offences. As no one dared to expostulate, the command was obeyed; but the people looked very serious at this unpromising beginning of a reign.

The new king wished to win the affection of the nation; and to obtain it he knighted nearly every gentleman that entered his presence. Elizabeth had been very slow in conferring honours; but titles cost James nothing, and he gave them away with a profusion that excited ridicule. Before he had been six weeks in England he had created 237 new knights. Sir Robert Cecil became his minister, and was made Lord Cecil; afterwards he was called Viscount Cranborne; and at last Earl of Salisbury. Elizabeth had been buried without much pomp, in Westminster Abbey, before James arrived at London; and the new sovereign was crowned, in the same venerable building, on the 25th of July, 1603. There was much feasting, and many shows and pageants; but it must have been rather a melancholy ceremony; for, notwithstanding the time of year, the sky was black with clouds, it rained incessantly, and the plague raged in London.

Immediately after James's coronation, he was waited on by ambassadors from the European states, most of whom were anxious to obtain the friendship of England: to all, the king's answer was, "Peace at home and abroad! above all things, peace."
